Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have alluded be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HERMISTON SCS UNIT TO RECEIVE TOP AGRICULTURE AWARD

The U.S. Department of Agriculture has notified Thomas P. Helseth, Soil Conservation Service Oregon State conservationist, that the agency's Hermiston work unit office is to receive a superior service award in recognition of outstanding assistance given cooperators of the West Umatilla and Boardman soil conservation districts in Umatilla County.

In its announcement, the Department said the Hermiston staff is one of two offices in the United States to be honored this year among field units working with some 2,800 districts.

Hermiston SCS technicians to be honored include the present staff technicians Louis A. Parton, soil conservationist; Robert F. Gobel, engineering aid, and Edward E. Weber, soil conservation aid, all of Hermiston.

Former Hermiston staff members now assigned to other districts will also be cited for their part in the development of the West Umatilla and Boardman districts. They include Robert E. Swanson, soil conservationist, Eagle Valley, Idaho; Charles R. Buzzard, soil scientist, Grants Pass, Oreg.; Robert Morland, civil engineer, Portland; and Donald S. Leach, soil conservationist, Clatskanie, Oreg.

Assistance given by the SCS technicians helped the districts' cooperators solve such major problems as wind erosion, drainage and restoration of alkali lands, improvement of irrigation systems and seeking and management of irrigated pastures.

Some 490 farmers and ranchers now are cooperating in the program of the districts, 375 of which are following complete farm plans. One hundred more farmers have plans underway.

Soil conservation work carried out on 450 of these farms in the West Umatilla and Boardman districts since 1946 has resulted in a $1,400,000 basic increase in income for the landowners.

At the time the districts were formed there were few irrigated pastures. Today, under conservation planning, there are around 4,000 acres of improved pastures, which have brought an increase in milk and beef production valued at $300,000.

Irrigation water problems, the need for improved distribution systems and methods of water application were other problems faced by the new districts.

Irrigation demonstrations, and "show-me" tour to well-run irrigated farmlands were some of the techniques used to improve operating methods.

A total of 11,350 acres have been leveled for better surface irrigation, 3,500 acres put under sprinkler systems and improved water application work has been carried out on 16,000 acres.

Improved irrigation methods stepped up the amount of land under irrigation by 15 percent and boosted the annual farm income of district cooperators $750,000.

Drainage of wet lands and treatment of alkali-ridden areas paid off in the reclamation of more than 3,500 acres and an increase in crop production of $100,000 on 95 farms.

Wind erosion, long a major land problem on unprotected grainlands, was solved by laying out crosswind stripcropping, grass seedlings, and establishing a protective cover on soils.

In carrying out wind erosion and soil saving practices, cooperators completed 12,000 acres of wind stripcropping, used crop residues on 22,000 acres and retired 3,100 acres under the Federal soil bank program.

These good land use practices have brought increased production to 175 operators of dryland wheat and irrigation crop enterprises valued at $250,000.

In addition to the assistance given the districts by Hermiston SCS technicians in farm and ranch planning activities, farmers received help from the Oregon Extension Service and State experiment stations, irrigation districts, chambers of commerce, service clubs, schools, 4–H Clubs.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to extend my personal congratulations again to all those receiving this deserved honor.

PLYWOOD PRODUCTION AND MILL PRICES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Plywood Men Face New Price Famine," published in the New York Times of Sunday, August 7, 1960.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 7, 1960]

PLYWOOD MEN FACE NEW PRICE FAMINE

(By John J. Abele)

The Douglas-fir plywood industry again is confronted with a price famine in the midst of production plenty.

Prices for quarter-inch sanded panels declined last week to $60 a thousand square feet, the lowest level since just after World War II. A downward trend has prevailed for most of the last year. The price last summer was $76. Earlier in 1959 it was $85, a 3-year high.

The latest decline occurred despite a fairly good level of business although homebuilding, a major market, has not been as strong as expected earlier.

The basic reason behind the price slide was that new productive capacity has been increasing at a faster rate than sales, which have been climbing substantially. Prices declined as supply outpaced demand. Production was 7 percent ahead of new orders in the first half of 1960.

Price problems such as this have been a recurring growing pain of the plywood industry, one of the major growth industries of the postwar economy. Production last year amounted to a record of 7,700 million square feet, four times the level of 10 years earlier. Output this year is expected to reach a new peak of 8,500 million square feet, according to a recent statement by C. Henry Bacon, president of the Douglas Fir Plywood Association.

Demand generally has been rising along with production, spurred on in large measure by the aggressive merchandising program of the association, which this year will spend $5,500,000 for promotion purposes. Plywood is used widely in the construction of industrial plants, public buildings, roads, bridges, and stores as well as in home construction. Growth in nonhousing fields is demonstrated by the fact that production has soared in recent years despite a fairly stable level of new housing starts.

POINT OF NO RETURN

The prevailing price before the recent decline was $64 a thousand square feet, a level that many manufacturers consider to be the point of no profitable return. The Evans Products Co., for example, announced that it would close down four plants in Oregon rather than meet the new price.

Other producers were considering production cutbacks as a means of getting supply back in balance with demand. MacMillan, Bloedel and Powell River, Ltd., said it would curtail production at two plants in British Columbia. It said the reduction was "unavoidable" because of reduced demand. Other leading manufacturers, however, said they planned to continue present operations.

Representatives of some large producers interviewed last week were inclined to believe that the present price weakness would probably continue for the rest of the year. Others felt that production cutbacks would "dry up" some of the oversupply and bring some improvement in prices before then. They also expressed hope that a pickup in homebuilding and the general economy would improve market conditions.

BIG PRODUCERS FAVORED

With many producers complaining that they can't make money at present price levels, the question arises as to why production continues. There are several reasons, most which favor the larger producers whose operations are integrated from timberlands to marketing outlets.

Manufacturers who have their own timber supplies usually can make profits on the conversion of the timber into finished supplies. This is not so for producers who have to buy logs on the open market at fairly high and stable price levels. They get caught in a squeeze between high raw material costs and low prices for finished products.

Improvements in operating efficiency—most noticeable in the newer large mills—also are helping some manufacturers to reduce their production costs and thus be in a position to accept lower prices for their products. Greater utilization of the wood from each log and the use of lower grade species also are contributing to lower operating costs.

Still another advantage accrues to plywood companies that buy a large part of their requirements from other manufacturers. They pay present market prices for this production and so are not hurt when prices go down. A prime example of this kind of operation is the United States Plywood Corp., the largest in the business, which manufacturers only one-third of its requirements and buys the other two-thirds from outside suppliers.

Diversification into the production of related products also has softened the blow of lower prices for some large producers. Fir plywood accounts for 35 to 40 percent of the business of United States Plywood and the Georgia-Pacific Corp., another leading producer. The rest is in hardwood plywood, plywood specialties, particle board, lumber, paper, or other products.

The International Paper Co., and the Weyerhaeuser Co., are other large plywood producers but plywood is almost a sideline in view of their much larger interest in such fields as lumber, paper, and packaging.

The effect of diversifiation was demonstrated in the recent semiannual report of Georgia-Pacific. Despite lower prices of plywood, the company posted record sales and earnings for the period.

EMPLOYMENT OF CERTAIN RETIRED PERSONNEL BY FEDERAL AND DISTRICT GOVERNMENTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, out of order, I send to the desk a bill for introduction, with the request that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

I introduce this bill which I hope will effect a fuller use of mature and experienced professional manpower, here in the District of Columbia, without costing the city any money. The plan would, also, I hope, be of help to the Federal Government. The bill is a simple one. It provides that any person who is retired from the Federal Government service, may, if he has all the qualifications required by the Board of Education, of Washington, D.C., be appointed to teach in Washington's public schools, and draw his Federal retirement pay, as well. The bill further provides as a complementary provision, that any professional employee of the Board of Education may on his retirement, accept a position in the Federal Government, and continue to draw his earned retirement pay. Such a plan is both practical and just.

At present, any teacher who is retired under the laws of any State in the Union may accept a position in the Federal Government, for which he may be qualified, and any person, retired under the Federal employees' retirement law, may accept a position in any school system in the United States, for which he may be qualified, except in the District of Columbia.

Some years ago we passed a bill making retired teachers eligible for service as substitutes in the schools of Washington, without having such appointment, in any way impair their pension. The proposal in this bill simply extends the principle of the earlier bill, now a law.

A number of qualified Federal workers are interested in doing a few years teaching, after having had a period of service in the Federal Government and similarly a number of teachers are interested in rounding out their careers with a few years in Government service.

The bill involves no additional costs to either the Federal Government or the Washington public schools, and is so far as I have heard not controversial. As it would be of some help in recruiting much-needed professional manpower, and as no additional cost is involved, I hope we may give early favorable consideration to it.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3832) to authorize the employment of retired personnel of the Federal Government by the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, and to authorize the employment of retired personnel of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, by the Federal Government, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any former employee of the Federal Government who has been retired under the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, shall, if otherwise qualified under the rules of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, be eligible for appointment to the position for which he may be qualified under the rules of the Board, and shall draw the pay or compensation authorized for the position to which he may be appointed, in addition to the pension he is authorized to receive under the Civil Service Retirement Act.

SEC. 2. Any former employee of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia who shall have been retired under the Act for the retirement of public school teachers in the District of Columbia, approved April 7, 1946 (60 Stat. 875), as amended, shall, if otherwise qualified under the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission, be eligible for appointment to the position for which he may be qualified under the rules of the said Civil Service Commission, and shall draw the pay or compensation authorized for the position to which he may be appointed, in addition to the pension he is authorized to receive under the Act for the retirement of public school teachers in the District of Columbia, as amended.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS DURING SENATE SESSIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the majority leader about the schedule next week, particularly with respect to hearings. The Committee on Foreign Relations had considered scheduling some hearings. Will the leadership be disposed to allow us to meet while the Senate is in session?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas that I am proud to be a member of the party which has produced the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think the work he did today was outstanding. His work is always of a very high character.

When the Senate reconvened for this session, I understood the Senator's committee had some important business which would require hearings to be held during the sessions of the Senate, and I obtained consent for the Committee on Foreign Relations to hold hearings during the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of this session.

I pay tribute to the Senator for his efforts and for the manner in which he has conducted the public business.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, did I correctly understand the majority leader to say that there would be no further yea-and-nay votes tonight?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

MARY ELIZABETH HOBACK, MISS WEST VIRGINIA, IS A WORTHY REPRESENTATIVE OF THE STATE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, this past Saturday the finals for the Miss West Virginia contest were held in Clarksburg, in our Mountain State. It was my privilege to be present during a part of the program of that 3-day event.

Miss Mary Elizabeth Hoback, of Bluefield, was chosen from a group of 15 West Virginia girls possessed of poise, personality, delightful demeanor, demonstrated talent, and, of course, unquestioned beauty.

The Clarksburg Junior Chamber of Commerce was the sponsor of this statewide pageant, with the cooperation of the jaycees in the West Virginia organization.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, the Associated Press article which tells of Miss Hoback, her background, and her hopes for the future. This attractive young woman says that she is proud to be a Mountaineer and that she is deeply interested, with other West Virginians, in our efforts to build a better State.

It is for that particular reason that I have given this statement, and submit the news story for printing in the RECORD. I also express genuine tribute to Miss Hoback and to the other young women of West Virginia who are a very important segment of the population of our State.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Parkersburg News, Aug. 9, 1960]

"I'M A MOUNTAINEER," SAYS MARY HOBACK—MISS WEST VIRGINIA PROUD OF HOME STATE

BLUEFIELD.—Scenic Miss West Virginia is a gal who wants to stay in West Virginia, and a performer who writes her own copy.

Dark-haired Mary Elizabeth "Beth" Hoback will go to Atlantic City in September with the avowed purpose of representing "her" State.

Said she, "I'm a Mountaineer."

Referring to the State's not overly optimistic publicity of late, she said, "I'm not ashamed of West Virginia. If we don't stick with it (the State), we can't build it up."

Reducing her logic to bicycling, one of her favorite pastimes, she quipped, "Down in North Carolina (where she is in college) you ride a bike for miles on the flatlands. But in West Virginia you pump and push up the hills, and coast down the other side. I like to coast down those mountains."

The 18-year-old sophomore at Flora MacDonald College in Red Springs, N.C., relied on a dramatic reading to win the talent division of the State contest at Clarksburg last week.

To win the bathing suit competition she relied on a sincere smile and her first appearance in a new white bathing suit (36–24–36).

In the Atlantic City competition, she said, the dramatic reading will be changed from "The Crucifixion," which she read at Clarksburg, to "The Mysterious Forest," a composition she wrote as a senior in high school.

A fan of Henry David Thoreau, Beth classes him as an "early day beatnik."

"I think people should be different. To be different all you have to do is be yourself. There's no one else like you."

A college degree is first on her list of objectives. She plans to study physical therapy, but as yet isn't sure where she will study.

"I would like to go to school in West Virginia. There's a good school of physical therapy at the new medical center at West Virginia University."

She studied her first year in North Carolina under a full scholarship from her Presbyterian Church; a grant from the college, and a working scholarship, under which she earned while attending classes.

"I don't think my parents could afford to send me otherwise."

Along with physical therapy, Beth plans to study dramatics for a possible stint in television or the theater, but "I'm not certain."

Currently, she does commercials for a live Saturday morning television show (WHIS–TV, Bluefield), and some modeling.

College, however, may have to temporarily take a back seat. Miss Hoback says she probably will not be in school this fall, because of a whirlwind tour of personal appearances after the pageant.

Marriage fits a vague category somewhere after college, but there's nothing in the foreseeable future, she claims. "I'm dating several boys that I like."

Miss Hoback, who will be 19 December 18, is "against going steady, until I'm ready to get married—there is one boy, though." That one boy though is West Point Cadet Banks Hudson, 20, whom she met in June of this year.

West Virginia's Miss America package stands 5 feet 4 inches, and weighs at present 117 pounds.

The Miss America Pageant will be Beth's fifth contest. So far she has never lost. Last year's titles included Miss East River Swimming Pool; Miss Claytor Lake; and Miss Bluefield. The fourth was the West Virginia crown.

"Atlantic City will be different. There are so many things I don't know about. There will be awfully strong competition but I will try hard."

Beth is a daughter of Mrs. Helen Neal, of Bluefield, and Robert Hoback, of Philadelphia. She has a 13-year-old sister, Sharon; and a 2-year-old brother, Marty. She named him after a current boy friend.

Her schedule calls for her first airplane flight, to Clarksburg Tuesday afternoon for pictures and choosing part of her wardrobe; back to Bluefield Friday, and on to New York City later, to choose an evening gown.

Locally, the big celebration is tentatively set for August 19, during the West Virginia-Virginia all-star football game at Bluefield.

The junior chamber of commerce which sponsored her entry, is planning an official welcome, in the presence of some 8,000 persons expected for the football game. Other personal appearances are in the planning stage.

MIGRANT SCHOOL PROGRAM GROWS

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor visited California last month, bringing to eight the number of States in which the subcommittee has conducted field trips or hearings. In California, as in the other States, we were impressed with the difficulties faced by all those concerned with the education of the children of migrant farm laborers.

We found new evidence of the need for well planned Federal help to those educators who so often have only a few busy weeks to work with the migrant youngsters. We received much testimony indicating that local officials favor the kind of approach offered in bills I have introduced to improve the educational opportunities not only for the children but for the migrant adults too.

The visit also indicated, I believe, the need for comparison of educational opportunities among States. One provision of the bills I introduced would do just that—it would encourage pooling of data about educational programs and methods in the many States that now have programs.

There is much to learn, I believe, from the programs now under way. In the Newark (N.J.) Evening News of July 18, 1960, for instance, Reporter Dawes Thompson, gives a vivid description of summer school effort under way in New Jersey this year. As he points out, New Jersey officials admit that there is much more to be done, but they are probably doing more than in many other States. Mr. President, the article gives information that may be of much help in other States visited by the migrant workers. I ask unanimous consent that the Evening News article be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIGRANT SCHOOL PROGRAM GROWS—NEW JERSEY LEADS STATES IN HELPING CHILDREN OF FARM LABORERS

(By Dawes Thompson)

TRENTON.—When New Jersey's summer school program for children of migrant farm labor families went into full swing this morning, twice as many enthusiastic youngsters as ever before passed through the classroom doors.

A program of giving a semblance of education, though only for 6 weeks, to 300 children of southern farmworkers in 15 classrooms may not seem herculean, even though it served only half that number a year ago. Yet New Jersey's Migrant Labor Board boasts that no other State matches its efforts.

This is the program's 14th year of operation and since its inception it has enjoyed the enlightened leadership of a man who is the product of the big management side of New Jersey agriculture. He is John W. Seabrook of Bridgeton, migrant labor board chairman.

FOUR SCHOOLS

The four schools, in Cranbury, Freehold and Fairton in Cumberland County and Woodstown in Salem, have no hope of producing Rhodes scholars from the ever-traveling group of 6- to 12-year-olds. In fact, few will ever get to high school. Lacking even vocational training, the chances are the children will follow in the footsteps of their 80-cent-an-hour, crop-picking parents.

The youngsters' education is handicapped not only by constant movement—following the planting and harvesting of crops annually between Florida, where they get only brief winter schooling, and New Jersey. They suffer also from lack of enforcement of compulsory education and antichild labor laws in States to the South, according to migrant board officials.

All the State-hired teachers can do is to instill some familiarity with the three R's, the social graces and the living habits of a world never seen by the children, who are 80 percent Negro and 20 percent Puerto Rican.

Yet Labor and Industry Commissioner Raymond F. Male and his special assistant on migrant education, Simeon A. Moss, a former Princeton public schoolteacher, say the annual 6-week courses produce results as gratifying as the enthusiasm and high attendance rate.

LOCAL DISINTEREST

There are plenty of problems. For instance, the introduction of the program in Woodstown this year is faced with a Spanish-speaking enrollment of more than half. But the Puerto Rican Migration Service, an island government agency, is lending a hand.

Local boards of education in problem areas, aside from the four locations, generally are not interested in the program. The West Windsor School Board in Mercer County recently refused to rent the migrant board badly needed classroom space.

The board's staff has found the Monmouth-Middlesex-Mercer area, as a rule, less willing to help than are southern counties like Cumberland and Salem. Single classrooms, at least, are needed for still neglected children in the West Windsor, Upper Burlington, and Hammonton-Vineland areas.

Buses had to be provided to carry the children on rides of up to 45 minutes each way and free lunches must be prepared. Increased weight and improved health during the courses suggest that the lunches probably are the best meals the children get.

In addition to the $25,000 being spent this year on the four summer schools, compared to $12,000 in 1959, the State's preventable diseases division has enlarged programs for migrant children and adults on polio, dental trouble, tuberculosis, and venereal disease.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR FULBRIGHT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I wish to pay a modest tribute to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I think he richly deserves it. I have not always agreed with him, but I must say in his behalf that when he brings to this floor a treaty or a bill from his committee, he knows what is in it, and he is always prepared to meet every argument and to defend the position which he and the majority of his committee take.

I think he did a superb job in connection with the Antarctic Treaty, in disclosing its purposes and functions and the ground it covers and the commitments it makes. So I salute him for a job well done.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I certainly appreciate the kind words of the minority leader. They touch me very deeply. I wish to express my great appreciation for the assistance the minority leader, particularly, has given in connection with this very difficult matter.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we begin debate upon the minimum wage bill known as the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960.

The bill has two major purposes. First, it will raise the minimum wage now received by 2½ million workers from $1.00 to $1.25 an hour. Second, it will extend the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to 5 million additional employees, chiefly in large-scale interstate retail and service industries, thereby guaranteeing these employees a fair minimum wage and a just premium for overtime.

Conscience and good business sense join in demanding the enactment of this measure. The bill will extend to the lowest paid workers in the country—to 3½ million men and women and their families—a fairer opportunity to share our high standard of living. To pass them by—to water down the help they need—or merely assume that prosperity at the top will someday reach them—shocks the conscience of those who care.

The increases in purchasing power resulting from a higher minimum wage will help to restore consumer demand required to put our idle industrial capacity back to work; and, what is equally important, it will serve as a source of protection to employers who pay a decent wage and who must compete with employers who pay a substandard wage. The elimination of unfair competition based upon substandard wages will protect fair-minded employers anxious to maintain fair labor standards.

The pending bill is the result of long and careful study. It originally came from our Labor and Public Welfare Committee last summer. The Labor Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare held hearings on 10 days, in which it heard 77 witnesses. The relevant bills were reviewed in executive sessions in the course of which all members of the subcommittee, on both sides, made helpful contributions. The committee bill embodies a wide consensus of opinion among Senators from both sides of the aisle. The minority views are signed by only three Senators.

The full extent of the changes to be made in the present law is summarized in a memorandum which I ask unanimous consent to have printed after my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit 1.)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, at this point I desire to speak only of the principal provisions.

MINIMUM WAGE

The bill raises the minimum wage applicable to employees now covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act in three stages: To $1.15 an hour, effective January 1, 1961; to $1.20 an hour, on January 1, 1962; and, on January 1, 1963, to $1.25 an hour.

In one sense, this is not new legislation. The Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted in 1938 in order "to protect this Nation from the evils and dangers resulting from wages too low to buy the bare necessities of life and from long hours of work injurious to health." When the original 40-cent minimum became inadequate Congress raised it to 75 cents and later to $1 an hour. Now economic progress again requires a higher wage if we are to carry out the central purpose. An increase from $1 to $1.25 an hour is necessary to put those wage earners who earn the minimum in the same position, relative to other segments of the economy, that they occupied after the 1955 amendment. Thus the present bill merely extends to lower paid workers the gains already achieved by more fortunate groups through increased productivity and collective bargaining.

Just a few figures make the point clear. In 1955, when the present $1 minimum was established, the average hourly earnings of employees in manufacturing industries were $1.88. By March 1960, average hourly earnings had increased 41 cents, or 22 percent. To maintain the same cents per hour differential, the statutory minimum would have to be raised to $1.41. To maintain even the same relative position, it would have to go immediately to $1.22 an hour instead of the $1.15 recommended by the committee. A small part of the change in average hourly earnings is probably the result of shifts into higher paid types of employment; but the comparison demonstrates beyond doubt that failure to enact the increases recommended by the committee would remit 2½ million wage earners to a declining status.

The need for action is the more acute because of the sharp increase in the number of employees dependent for a fair wage upon congressional action. In 1955 roughly half a million workers covered by the act were receiving either the statutory minimum wage or an hourly rate no more than 5 cents higher. The latest figures available show that 1⅓ million workers covered by the act are receiving either the statutory minimum or a rate no more than 5 cents higher. This is 2½ times the earlier figure.

Consider the meaning of this trend to the workers affected. Since 1955, there has been a 15-percent rise in productivity. They shared none of this gain. There has also been a 10-percent rise in the cost of living. The workers dependent upon the minimum wage have therefore suffered a 10-percent decline in real earnings—in their ability to provide food, clothes, homes, and health for their families.

Let me be still more precise. There are 35,000 workers in the apparel industry in New York City alone who depend upon the Fair Labor Standards Act for a fair minimum wage. The New York City Department of Welfare regards $74 a week as the minimum budget for health and safety for a family of four—a man and wife and two children. Working the standard 40 hours, a man would earn only $40 a week at the present minimum—$34 short of the pay check needed. Even the proposed minimum of $1.25 would leave his earnings $24 short of the sum required to support his family. In some families more than one person is employed; but even if the man and wife both worked full time every week, the present statutory minimum would hardly cover the budget; expenses rise when both adults are working.

The proposed increases will not injure business firms. They are not inflationary. They will not cause significant unemployment. If the dangers fancied by the minority were real, I would join them in opposing the measure. The welfare of the business community is essential to a prosperous economy. To drive firms out of business or to force them to curtail operations would defeat our very purpose. But the same arguments were presented against minimum wage legislation in 1938, 1949, and 1955. History disproved them. On each of these three occasions increases far sharper than those we propose today were put into effect without injury to employers, inflation or unemployment. The fancied dangers were never realized.

The experience after the 1955 amendments is the most instructive because their impact is traced in a careful study prepared by the U.S. Department of Labor. The Department found that the increase from 75 cents to $1.00 an hour did not substantially affect any of the standard statistical series measuring trends in hours of work, employment, or consumer prices. The impact was too small to be discernible in relation to overall economic activity.

More detailed study of 15 low-wage industries showed that employment rose in some industries after the $1 minimum was put into effect and declined in others. Evidently the change in the minimum wage was not a determinative factor. In order to obtain a still broader view, the study was extended in six communities so as to include both covered and noncovered industries. During the 2 months following the statutory increase employment in the covered industries rose in one, fell in two, and was virtually unchanged in the others. These changes in employment can hardly be attributed to the statutory increase but it is interesting to note that 3 years after the statutory increase employment in the same communities had risen 20 percent in the industries subject to the act and only 14 percent in those outside the statute.

In short, the Labor Department's study fully supports the conclusion that the 1955 minimum wage increase did not result in any substantial changes for the Nation in either price levels or employment.

The increases now proposed can have no greater impact. In 1955 the increase was 25 cents an hour, or an average of 15 cents for each employee directly affected. In 1960 the increase will be only 15 cents, or an average of 9 cents for each employee directly affected. Put another way, the 1955 increase raised the statutory minimum 33⅓ percent, whereas the 1960 increase will be only 15 percent. The increase in the total wage bill will also be markedly smaller. Since the 1955 increase was readily absorbed by the economy, we are bound to conclude that it can now absorb the smaller 1960 increase. The 5-cent-an-hour increases in 1960 and 1961 are no larger than might be expected in collective bargaining.

The exaggerated fear of adversely affecting costs, prices, and employment apparently results from the fallacious assumption that an increase in the statutory minimum requires corresponding wage increases all up and down the line. Secretary Mitchell disposed of this argument in his testimony before the House Labor Committee.

As to the allegation that there is an upward, forward movement immediately corresponding to the wage increase, that experience has shown that this does not happen.

Any increase in the minimum would undoubtedly require some adjustment of the wages of other employees of the same business even though they earn more than the statutory minimum, but the increases would taper off rather quickly. As I pointed out earlier, since 1955 average hourly earnings have increased much faster than the statutory minimum. Generally speaking, wages at the bottom of the scale can be brought up to their old relationship without unduly narrowing differentials.

It would be naive to deny that there will be no dislocations. In a few instances there may be an undesirable compression of the wage structure. But, fairly read, both history and the available studies show that the increases can be absorbed without damage to business, inflationary price increases, or unemployment.

NEW COVERAGE

The committee bill would extend to 5 million additional wage earners the guarantees of a fair minimum wage and a reasonable premium for overtime employment.

The major expansion of coverage brings under the act retail and service establishments whose annual gross sales exceed $1 million. Establishments grossing less than $1 million a year will not be affected. They will also continue to benefit from the present section 13(a)(2) exemption. I emphasize the point, because there has been widespread misunderstanding. The bill does not touch ordinary inns, hotels, restaurants, or motels in any part of the country. For example, a motel owner who charged $15 a unit and maintained 180 units which he rented every night of the year would be too small for the bill to affect him.

Likewise, the bill does not apply to the independent grocer or druggist, the country store, or even the independent department stores and supermarkets found in most American cities. Ninety-seven percent of all retail enterprises would not be affected.

We are concerned only with the large metropolitan department stores and vast chains which now dominate the retail industry. Their outlets spread through many States. The management is centralized. Prices are often uniform. Goods are purchased in large quantities from all over the Nation, often at prices which cannot be obtained by independent smaller merchants. Their operations depend upon the channels of interstate commerce. And where hotels and other service establishments are large enough to gross a million dollars, their conditions of employment also become matters of national import and concern.

It is grossly inaccurate to describe these million-dollar enterprises as local businesses which ought not to be regulated by the Federal Government. In 1938 the point was doubtful, but the constitutional power of Congress has now been established.

Many Federal statutes already apply to such large retail enterprises—the pure food and drug laws, the Wool Products Labeling Act, the Sherman Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act and the National Labor Relations Act. The NLRB conducts elections among the employees whom this bill would bring under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Their employers obtain Federal assistance against boycotts and picketing. Last year their trade associations were outspoken lobbyists for additional Federal restrictions upon the rights to strike and picket. At the present session some of them are actively sponsoring Federal legislation for resale price maintenance. Bringing under the Fair Labor Standards Act the employees of retail and service establishments grossing $1 million in annual sales conforms the law to otherwise uniform pattern of social legislation. There is no merit to the argument that the bill changes the balance between State and Federal authority.

The extension of coverage to retail and service establishments which gross $1 million annually will not even indirectly affect smaller businesses. Experience shows that a high-wage employer can move into a community with relatively little affect upon the wage scale of smaller local industries unless there is a shortage of qualified labor. Similarly, the wage scales of large metropolitan department stores and multiunit chains will exert no great influence upon smaller businesses.

I think it is vitally important that the Congress act upon this legislation in this session. We are talking about workers in the areas not now covered receiving $40 a week in January 1961.

I cannot believe that there is any employer in the country dealing in businesses of the size we are now discussing that cannot pay $40 a week. Some months ago the Bureau of Labor Statistics found it cost a single woman $51.50 to get by, even on a minimum standard, in an urban center of the United States.

We have been very careful in providing for the rise in amount to those who are going to be newly covered. It is a 3-year rise. There has been a steady increase in wages in this country every year, particularly in the manufacturing industries, for those that are widely organized who seek large-scale increases. Yet those who are unorganized, at the bottom of the ladder, who are unable to organize effectively, are the ones left behind. I point this out to any Senator who is concerned, in good faith, about the continuation of unemployment, because it is a problem which concerns us. We want to pay a decent wage. We do not want to pay wages so high that workers are thrown out of work.

In the newly covered area—and that is the area of controversy—we provide $1, and then a 3-year rise, before the figure of $1.25 is reached. By 1964, I believe those working in interstate activities, and getting $1.25 an hour, which is $50 a week, will find that amount is too low, because the cost of living is steadily rising.

The fiscal burden of an inadequate minimum wage law lies upon the community, and thus upon every taxpayer. In New York City, 44 percent of the families to whom relief is extended include those who are wage earners but whose incomes are inadequate. An economic burden also lies upon competitors whose ability to pay a just wage is frustrated by unfair, low-wage competition. But the burden which should concern us most lies upon the American conscience. We can no longer tolerate growing patches of poverty and injustice in America—substandard wages, unemployment, city slums, inadequate medical care, inferior education, and the sad plight of migratory workers. The enactment of this bill is only one step, but an essential step, forward, as we cross this frontier to grasp the high opportunities which face the Nation.

MEMORANDUM RE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The bill (S. 3758) reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act has two major purposes. First, it will raise the minimum wage now received by 2½ million workers from $1.00 to $1.15 an hour—and 2 years later to $1.25 an hour. Second, it will extend the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to 5 million additional employees, chiefly in large-scale interstate retail and service industries, thereby guaranteeing these employees a fair minimum wage and a just premium for overtime. Other minor changes are explained below.

The committee bill is the result of long and careful study. The Labor Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare held hearings on 10 days, in which it heard 77 witnesses. The relevant bills were then reviewed in executive sessions. The committee bill embodies a wide consensus of opinion among Senators from both sides of the aisle. The minority report is signed by only three Senators.

MINIMUM WAGE

The bill raises the minimum wage applicable to employees now covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act in three stages: to $1.15 an hour, effective January 1, 1961, to $1.20 an hour on January 1, 1962, and on January 1, 1963, the minimum will become $1.25 an hour.

In one sense, this is not new legislation. The Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted in 1938 in order "to protect this Nation from the evils and dangers resulting from wages too low to buy the bare necessities of life and from long hours of work injurious to health." When the original 40-cent minimum became inadequate Congress raised it to 75 cents and later to $1 an hour. Now economic progress again requires a higher wage in order to carry out the central purpose. The increase from $1 to $1.25 an hour is necessary to put those wage earners who earn the minimum in the same position, relative to other segments of the economy, that they occupied after the 1955 amendment. Thus, the present bill merely extends to lower paid workers the gains already achieved by more fortunate groups through increased productivity and collective bargaining.

Just a few figures make the point clear. In 1955, when the present $1 minimum was established, the average hourly earnings of employees in manufacturing industries were $1.88. By March 1960, average hourly earnings had increased 41 cents, or 22 percent. To maintain the same cents-per-hour differential, the statutory minimum would have to be raised to $1.41. To maintain even the same relative position, it would have to go immediately to $1.22 an hour instead of the $1.15 recommended by the committee. A small part of the change in average hourly earnings is probably the result of shifts into higher paid types of employment but the comparison demonstrates beyond doubt that failure to enact the increases recommended by the committee would remit 2½ million wage earners to a declining status.

The need for action is the more acute because of the sharp increase in the number of employees dependent for a fair wage upon congressional action. In 1955 roughly half a million workers covered by the act were receiving either the statutory minimum wage or an hourly rate no more than 5 cents higher. The latest figures available show that 1⅓ million workers covered by the act are receiving either the statutory minimum or a rate no more than 5 cents higher. This is two and one-half times the earlier figure.

The trend is highly damaging to the workers affected. Since 1955, there has been approximately a 15-percent rise in the productivity of labor. Workers receiving the minimum statutory wage shared none of this progress. There has also been a 10-percent rise in the cost of living. The workers dependent upon the minimum wage therefore suffer a 10-percent decline in real earnings—in their ability to provide food, clothes, homes and health for their families.

The point can be illustrated still more precisely. There are 35,000 apparel workers in New York City who depend upon the Fair Labor Standards Act for a fair minimum wage. The New York City Department of Welfare regards $74 a week as the minimum budget for health and safety for a family of four—a man and wife and two children. Working the standard 40 hours, a man would earn only $40 a week at the present minimum—$34 short of the pay check needed. Even the proposed minimum of $1.25 would leave his earnings $24 short of the sum required to support his family. In some families more than one person is employed; but even if the man and wife both worked full-time every week, the present statutory minimum would hardly cover the budget; expenses rise when both adults are working.

It may be argued that, despite the importance of raising the minimum, the businesses affected cannot afford to pay higher wages. The argument is important. The welfare of the business community is essential to a prosperous economy. To drive firms out of business or to force them to curtail operations would also defeat our very purpose by creating unemployment. Obviously, the money with which to pay the proposed $1.15, $1.20, and $1.25 minimums must come from employers in the first instance. The question is whether they can fairly be asked to absorb the increases—or can recover them through economies resulting from increases in managerial efficiency or worker productivity—or can pass them on to the community in price increases without causing inflation.

Here experience provides the answer. There is no need for speculation. The same arguments were presented against minimum wage legislation in 1938, 1949, and 1955. History disproved them. On these three occasions sharper increases than those proposed in the committee bill were put into effect without injury to employers, inflation or unemployment.

The 1955 amendments are the most instructive because they are the most recent and also because their impact is traced in a careful study prepared by the U.S. Department of Labor in 1957. The Department found that none of the standard statistical series regularly used to measure trends in hours, employment, or consumer prices was substantially affected by the increase from 75 cents to $1 an hour. Whatever impact the increase may have had was too small to be discernible in relation to overall economic activity.

More detailed study of 15 low-wage industries showed that employment rose in some industries after the $1 minimum was put into effect and declined in others. Apparently the change in the minimum wage was not a determinative factor.

In order to obtain a broader view, the study was extended in six communities to include both covered and noncovered industries. During the 2 months following the statutory increase employment in the covered industries rose in one, fell in two, and was virtually unchanged in the others. These changes in employment can hardly be attributed to the statutory increase but it is interesting to note that 3 years after the statutory increase employment in the same communities had risen 20 percent in the industries subject to the act and only 14 percent in those outside the statute.

In short, the Labor Department's study fully supports the conclusion that the 1955 minimum wage increase did not result in any substantial changes for the Nation in either price levels or employment.

The increases now proposed can have no greater impact. In 1955 the increase was 25 cents an hour, or an average of 15 cents for each employee directly affected. In 1960 the increase will be only 15 cents, or an average of 9 cents for each employee directly affected. Put another way, the 1955 increase raised the statutory minimum 33⅓ percent, whereas the 1960 increase will be only 15 percent. The increase in the total wage bill will also be markedly smaller. Since the 1955 increase was readily absorbed by the economy, we are bound to conclude that it can now absorb the smaller 1960 increase. The 5 cents an hour increases in 1960 and 1961 are no larger than might be expected in collective bargaining.

The exaggerated fear of adversely affecting costs, prices, and employment apparently results from the fallacious assumption that an increase in the statutory minimum requires corresponding wage increases all up and down the line. Secretary Mitchell disposed of this argument in his testimony before the House Labor Committee:

"As to the allegation that there is an upward, forward movement immediately corresponding to the wage increase, that experience has shown that this does not happen. * * * Even in the low-wage industries, workers paid $1 or more prior to March of 1956 did not receive increases proportional to those received by workers paid less than $1, so that I do not think it is true that an increase in the minimum wage is immediately reflected in an increase of the same kind in all other levels in our wage scales."

Any increase in the minimum would undoubtedly require some adjustment of the wages of other employees of the same business even though they earn more than the statutory minimum, but the increases would taper off rather quickly. As pointed out above, average hourly earnings have increased much faster since 1955 than the statutory minimum. This means that the wage structure was pulled out. Generally speaking, it can now be compressed again to the old relationships without distortion.

NEW COVERAGE

The second set of major amendments proposed by the committee bill would extend to 5 million additional wage-earners the guarantee of a fair minimum wage and place reasonable ceilings upon their hours of employment. The Fair Labor Standards Act now covers 23.7 million workers. The amendments would extend its coverage to the following groups: (1) 3½ million employees in interstate retail and service establishments whose annual sales exceed $1 million; (2) 1 million employees who are not presently covered although they work side-by-side with presently covered employees in establishments which affect interstate commerce; (3) 150,000 employees in laundries or dry-cleaning establishments whose annual sales exceed $1 million; (4) 107,000 employees of local transit companies; (5) 41,000 telephone switchboard operators; (6) 100,000 seamen; (7) 32,000 employees engaged in fish processing.

The committee recognized hardship might result if these industries were suddenly subjected to the full impact of the statutory minimum wage. The bill establishes a graduated scale applicable to all newly covered employees.

During first year after effective date, $1 an hour.

During second year after effective date, $1.05 an hour.

During third year after effective date, $1.15 an hour.

During fourth year and thereafter, $1.25 an hour.

Similarly the bill establishes a graduated scale of hours for employees newly covered.

During first year after effective date, no overtime requirement.

During second year after effective date, overtime after 44 hours.

During third year after effective date, overtime after 42 hours.

During fourth year and thereafter, overtime after 40 hours.

The major expansion of coverage lies in extending the act to retail and service establishments whose annual gross sales exceed $1 million. Establishments grossing less than $1 million will not be affected. They will continue to benefit from the present section 13(a)(2) exemption. The point is important because there has been widespread misunderstanding. The bill does not touch ordinary inns, hotels, restaurants or motels in any part of the country. For example, a motel owner who charged $15 a unit and maintained 180 units which he rented every night of the year would be too small for the bill to affect him.

Likewise, the bill does not apply to the independent grocer or druggist, the country store, or even the independent department stores and supermarkets found in most American cities. Ninety-seven percent of all retail enterprises would not be affected.

The bill affects only large metropolitan department stores and the vast chains which now dominate the retail industry. Their outlets spread through many States. The management is centralized. Prices are often uniform. Goods are purchased in large quantities from all over the Nation, often at prices which cannot be obtained by independent merchants. Their operations depend upon the channels of interstate commerce. And where hotels and other service establishments are large enough to gross a million dollars their conditions of employment also become matters of national import.

It is nonsense to describe these million dollar enterprises as local businesses which ought not to be regulated by the Federal Government. In 1938 the point was doubtful, but the constitutional power of Congress has now been established. Many Federal statutes already apply to such large retail enterprises—the Pure Food and Drug laws, the Wool Products Labeling Act, the Sherman Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act and the National Labor Relations Act. The NLRB conducts elections among the employees whom this bill would bring under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Their employers obtain Federal assistance against boycotts and picketing Last year their trade associations were outspoken lobbyists for additional Federal restrictions upon the rights to strike and picket. At the present session some of them are actively sponsoring Federal legislation for resale price maintenance. Thus, bringing under the Fair Labor Standards Act the employees of retail and service establishments grossing $1 million in annual sales conforms the law to the otherwise uniform pattern of social legislation. There is no merit to the argument that the bill changes the balance between State and Federal authority.

The extension of coverage to retail and service establishments which gross $1 million annually will not indirectly affect smaller businesses. Experience shows that a high wage employer can move into a community with relatively little effect upon the wage scale of smaller local industries unless there is a shortage of qualified labor. Similarly, the wage scales of large metropolitan department stores and multi-unit chains will exert no great influence upon smaller businesses.

The other change in coverage will correct a historic accident. In 1937 and 1938, there was grave uncertainty concerning the constitutional power of the Congress to enact a minimum wage law. Various constitutional theories were suggested. The Senate bill followed one course; the House took another. The conference report based coverage on the work of the individual employee. Under the present law, therefore, a worker is covered only if he himself is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. The nature of the employer's business is irrelevant. Thus, there may be two employees, working side-by-side in the employ of the same employer, one of whom is protected by the statutory minimum wage and one who is not. For example, a wholesaler's order clerk who typed orders for goods purchased out of State would be entitled to the statutory minimum, but the billing clerk at the next desk who typed bills for customers inside the State would lack the same protection. The distinction is arbitrary and capricious.

The Fair Labor Standards Act is apparently the only statute under which coverage depends upon the work of the individual employee. The supposed constitutional justification no longer exists. Accordingly, the committee bill puts coverage upon an establishment basis, as under other labor legislation.

The change will greatly simplify enforcement of the statute. Employers and the officials of the Wage and Hour Division will be able to determine the status of all employees in an establishment without checking the individual work of every employee. The inequity between employees in the same establishment will be abolished.

The justification for applying the proposed new minimum wage to the newly covered employees is the same as the reasoning which supports the increase in the minimum. The employees have the same needs. Their wages have fallen behind average hourly earnings to the same, and possibly a greater, extent than the wages of employees earning the statutory minimum. They are equally entitled to share in economic progress.

The effect of other specific changes in coverage or exemptions is explained in the following paragraphs:

Laundries: Section 3(t)(2) of the bill will bring under the act employees in laundries and drycleaning enterprises with gross annual sales of $1 million or more, on the same wage and overtime scale as retail and service enterprises.

Of the total 448,000 workers in approximately 64,000 plants in the industry, the bill brings under the act an additional 150,000 workers employed in 1,800 plants in enterprises with $1 million or more in annual gross receipts. The remainder, 300,000 employees and 62,000 plants, about 97 percent of the total, will continue to be specifically exempt. Because cleaning plants are predominantly single unit, small plants, the bill will affect relatively few establishments in that industry.

This bill also adds a specific provision dealing with a situation where a presently exempt laundry or drycleaning establishment, with $250,000 or more in annual sales, competes substantially in the same metropolitan area with another laundry or drycleaning establishment which is not exempt under section 13(a)(3) of the act because it derives less than 50 percent of its annual receipts from sales made within the State, one of the requirements for exemption under that section. The amendment contained in a proviso added to section 13(a)(3) of the act, would treat both of these competing laundries or drycleaning establishments alike and neither would be exempt.

Local transit enterprises: The bill in section 3(t)(3) brings under the act any enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce which is "engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier." Employees of such enterprises will be brought under the minimum wage provisions of the act on the same minimum wage scale as retail and service enterprises; but they will continue to be exempt from the overtime requirements.

Gasoline service stations: Section 3(t)(5) brings under the act any gasoline service station which has an annual gross volume of sales of $250,000 or more. It should be noted that with respect to gasoline service establishments, the test applies to each separate establishment. This would be true whether the establishment is part of a chain operation or whether it is independently owned.

Employees of a gasoline service establishment which has less than $250,000 in annual gross sales will continue to be exempt from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the act under the provisions of the exemption in section 13(a)(2) of the act, even if it is part of an enterprise with more than $1 million in annual sales.

First processing, canning or packing fruits or vegetables: Employees employed in "the first processing of, or in canning or packing perishable or seasonal fresh fruits or vegetables, or in the first processing, within the area of production (as defined by the Secretary), of any agricultural or horticultural commodity during seasonal operations, or in handling, slaughtering, or dressing poultry or livestock" are now completely exempt from the overtime requirements of the act for a period of 14 workweeks in the aggregate in each calendar year by virtue of the exemption contained in section 7(c) and, in addition, they are exempt under section 7(b)(3) for another period of 14 workweeks in the aggregate during which overtime compensation is required only for work in excess of 12 hours a day or 56 hours a week.

The bill proposes to reduce somewhat these exemptions so as to provide a period of 10 weeks in the aggregate each year of complete exemption from overtime plus an additional period of 10 weeks in the aggregate each year during which overtime compensation will be required only for hours worked in excess of 12 in a day or 56 in a week.

The bill does not make any change in the other exemptions for agriculture and agricultural processing.

Seafood processing: The present law provides a complete exemption from both the minimum wage and overtime requirements for fishing operations and for the processing of seafood. Seafood canning, however, is now covered by the minimum wage under the existing law and has an exemption only from the overtime requirements.

The only change the bill makes in these exemptions is with respect to the processing of seafood. Employees engaged in such activities are brought under the minimum wage provisions on the same scale as newly covered employees in retail and service enterprises. They will continue to be exempt from the overtime requirements.

Telephone switchboard operators: The act in section 13(a)(11) now provides an exemption from both the minimum wage and overtime requirements for "any switchboard operator employed in a public telephone exchange which has not more than 750 stations."

The bill limits the exemption to "any switchboard operator employed by an independently owned public telephone exchange which has not more than 750 stations."

Seamen: The present act in section 13(a)(14) provides a complete exemption from both the minimum wage and overtime provisions for all seamen. The bill amends this exemption so as to cover for minimum wage requirements only those seamen who are employed on an American-flag vessel. They will continue to be exempt from overtime requirements.

The bill also contains a special provision which permits the calculation of wages for newly covered seamen to be made on the basis of a period longer than a workweek, such as an entire voyage. In calculating the hours worked by a seaman for the purpose of the act, only those hours need to be counted when the seaman is actually on duty.

Automobile salesmen: The bill adds a new section 13(b)(8) to the act exempting from the overtime requirements "any employee employed as an automobile salesman by an establishment engaged in the business of selling automobiles or trucks."

Small area broadcasters: The bill provides a new exemption from the overtime requirements but not from the minimum wage requirements, for any employee employed as an announcer, news editor, or chief engineer by a radio or television station which has its major studio in a city or town of not more than 50,000 population, according to the latest decennial census, provided that the city or town is not located within a "standard metropolitan area" with a total population in excess of 50,000, as defined and designated by the Bureau of the Census.

PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

The bill would extend to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands the same coverage as on the mainland. Wage rates for such employees as well as for those already covered, are, however, set differently than on the mainland because of the special provisions contained in the act.

Those employees already covered will have their wage rates increased from year to year by the same percentages as the rates of mainland employees, but they will go into effect either 60 days after the effective date for the mainland or 1 year from the effective date of the most recent wage order, whichever is later. The first percentage increase in the rates will, however, be subject to appeal for review by special industry committees appointed by the Secretary of Labor. Such an appeal will have to be made by the industry involved, or by employers in the industry employing a majority of employees in the Puerto Rican or the Virgin Islands industry.

AMERICAN SAMOA

While the provisions of the act, as amended by the fair labor standards amendments of 1960, will also apply to American Samoa, the procedures for establishing minimum wages and overtime standards for such employees will remain the same as now provided in the present law. Thus no changes in the minimum wages or maximum hours for such employees are made by the bill except to set the higher standards as the new objectives of the committees and the Secretary in determining the minimum rates and maximum hours that shall apply to presently covered and newly covered workers in American Samoa.

WORKWEEK STANDARD

The bill adds, in several places in sections 6 and 7 of the act, the words "in any workweek." It is recognized that both the courts and the Department have interpreted the act so that the workweek is taken as the standard in determining its applicability. This is stated in title 29, Code of Federal Regulations, part 776, section 776.4.

The insertion of the words "in any workweek" in sections 6 and 7 of the act are designed to include in the statute the standards now being followed under the act.

PENALTIES AND INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

Under the present provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Secretary of Labor has no authority to require the payment of minimum wages and overtime compensation not paid in compliance with the law, except where an employee requests that an action be brought by the Secretary.

The bill amends sections 16 and 17 of the act so as to establish a more effective method of enforcement by authorizing the Federal courts to order the payment of the actual amount of unpaid minimum wages or overtime compensation to employees in injunctive actions brought under section 17. In this way, employers found by the courts to be unlawfully withholding from employees minimum wages and overtime compensation required to be paid them under the act could be required to make payment of the amounts found due by the courts without the necessity of the employee or employees involved initiating or requesting such action.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I compliment the Senator from Massachusetts for the statement he has made in explanation of the economic and legal philosophies of the bill which our committee has brought to the Senate with only three Senators, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, signing the minority views.

It has been my privilege to be associated with the Senator from Massachusetts for approximately 2 years as the coauthor of the original bill that was introduced in the Senate. We have brought to the Senate a committee version of a minimum wage bill, but I think it is due the Senator from Massachusetts to point out that we have succeeded in retaining at least the economic and legal philosophies, and principles on which those philosophies are based, as set forth in the original Kennedy-Morse-Roosevelt bill.

Mr. President, as one of the coauthors of the original bill, I would have the RECORD show tonight, as we start debate on this subject matter in the Senate, that I think there are many shortcomings in the committee bill; and I would prefer that it went much further in implementing the very sound economic and legal philosophies of the original Kennedy-Morse-Roosevelt bill.

But we try to be realists in the legislative process, and we have brought forth a bill which, in my judgment, is deserving of the support of the majority of the Senate, as it has received the support of a large majority in the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

Mr. President, supporting this bill in its present form does not mean that we are not free to support amendments to it on the floor of the Senate, or even offer some amendments if, in our judgment, the situation warrants it.

Furthermore, it does not mean that by supporting this bill from the committee we consider that we have passed any final Fair Labor Standards Act in the Congress, because I think session by session, for some years to come, it will be necessary for us to attempt to improve the Fair Labor Standards Act.

INCREASE IN COVERAGE

Our bill, as we have brought it to the Senate, will increase the coverage by some 5 million workers. The Senator from Massachusetts tonight has used the round figure of 5 million. I think that is a fair estimate, but none of us can be certain of the identical figure. The experts from the Department of Labor have assured us it will be in the neighborhood of 5 million.

The original bill which we introduced would have covered some 7 to 7½ million. In my judgment, there are at least a minimum of 11 million employees that ought to be covered, in the very near future, who are not now covered; and, in round numbers, there are some 22 million workers in this country that fall within the coverage of the commerce clause of the Constitution, who are not covered, but who, I hope, will be covered in the next few years.

In committee I offered a series of amendments that would seek to correct by eliminating exemptions what I think are some gross injustices that will continue to exist even under the bill we are offering the Senate. I would have the Senate keep in mind, if one wants to use the word "leniency," that this bill is lenient in connection with exemptions.

We have a practical problem in connection with the passage of general welfare legislation in a field such as minimum wages or social security or any of the subject matters that affect social reform and social improvement and social justice in our body politic.

It is necessary to get one vote more than one-half, to pass legislation. Thus we say that sometimes it is necessary to go more slowly than some of us think we should go in justice to the people of our country. As one who believes we should move even more rapidly, I am realistic enough to know that with this bill we shall be moving forward; we shall not be standing still.

MANY NEWLY COVERED ALREADY RECEIVING MINIMUM WAGE

I wish to point out, because I think we owe it to our colleagues in the Senate to do so, that when we talk about increasing the coverage by some 5 million workers it is not as good as it sounds, because a substantial number of them are already receiving the minimum wage, and a surprising percentage of them are even already receiving overtime. However, I think it is sound legislation to have these workers covered on the lawbooks. That is what we shall be doing for those employees under the bill.

It is also true that we are adding a considerable number of employees who are not receiving the minimum wage and who are not receiving the advantages of overtime payments.

I recognize the pressures which are on us in our States to seek to obtain an exemption for this group or an exemption for that group. I was the subject, along with every other Senator, of such pressures. I took the position, however, as the RECORD will show, that we ought to abolish all exemptions. I proposed such an amendment in the Senate committee. I will say for the RECORD tonight that I intend to work, as long as I have the privilege of serving the people of my State with the trust of being a Senator, for the elimination of the exemptions. We are not ready to go that far now, but in the interests of economic and social justice that ought to be our goal. Many of the exemptions which are written into the bill which we are offering the Senate are artificial, and discretionary, resulting in unfair discrimination within the American economy. That is always the risk we run when we start granting exceptions to one group or to another.

OREGON AUTO DEALERS

Last Sunday afternoon, as I told my friend the chairman of the subcommittee on which it has been my privilege to serve, the Senator from Massachusetts, a committee of automobile dealers waited on me in my home in Eugene, Oreg. The day before in a meeting the dealers had passed a resolution to send the committee to visit me on Sunday afternoon.

They came on Sunday afternoon rather than on Monday because they knew I was leaving for Washington, D.C., Sunday night. As they said, had that not been the case they would not have brought up the matter on the Sabbath, but they would have waited until Monday.

They made the argument—and there is a considerable amount of merit in their position—that the requirement of an automobile agency having to do a gross business of a million dollars is a very arbitrary one, and it will result in unfair discrimination against many automobile agencies to the competitive advantage of smaller agencies which are equally able to pay the minimum wage and also are equally able to grant the overtime premium wage.

The chairman of this committee happened to be the head of the Chevrolet agency in my hometown of Eugene, Oreg. He said: "Senator, you know, with our cars selling at from $3,000 for certain models up to as high as more than $4,000, it does not take very many automobile sales to result in a gross figure of more than a million dollars. When we add to that the supply division and the mechanic division of our garage, we are considerably over the million-dollar mark, but we are in competition with some smaller automobile agencies in our locality which do not gross a million dollars; so this provision puts us at a disadvantage."

I would be the first to admit that it is difficult to justify drawing the line at a million dollars. I think it would be better, if we could get the votes, to eliminate the million-dollar figure entirely and to take the position that any automobile agency ought to pay the minimum wage. I think that would be fair to all concerned.

DIFFICULTY IN SETTING STANDARDS

I know a case can be made with some plausibility in respect to the million-dollar gross income figure in the retail establishments, but again, except for the little family store, except for the little family operation, I think it is pretty difficult to make the million-dollar figure, as a basis for determining whether a store is to be exempt or is not to be exempt, stand up in a logical argument.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. I should like to finish this point.

When a business establishment incorporates or is a partnership establishment of some substance, which has executives to operate the business, when there is a retail establishment which is far removed from the old idea of the little corner grocery store operated by mother and father and the children, a case can be made for no exemption, and there should be a requirement for paying a minimum wage and overtime.

ABILITY TO PAY IS NOT ONLY ISSUE

The argument with which we are confronted—and we are met with it at almost every conference we have with anyone who wants to talk to us about the Fair Labor Standards Act—is that a proposal for an increase in the minimum wage is going to put employers out of business. I have lived with that argument now for more than a quarter of a century in my work in the field of labor relations. That is the argument which is made on the wage issue in every labor case one arbitrates. I first ran into it in 1934 in the first labor case I ever arbitrated.

I repeat what I have held in many decisions, which was a ruling held by leaders in the field of labor arbitration long before I arbitrated my first case. It was set forth, so far as my recollection goes, for the first time in a decision by Louis Brandeis, later one of the great Justices of the United States Supreme Court, who for many years was one of the great arbitrators, mediators, and labor lawyers in the field of labor economics. He pointed out as early as 1910 that the question of ability to pay on the part of an employer is not an issue which should have any standing in the consideration of what the wages ought to be when one is considering the issue of what is a wage which will maintain a standard of living of health and decency in a given establishment.

I take the point of view, which I have stated so many times, that the private enterprise system does not mean freedom to exploit human beings. I have taken the position many times that no employer in this country has the right to pay a wage less than what will support health and decency. Therefore, the question of ability to pay is generally excluded as an issue in any labor arbitration case or any wage case.

But the question of ability to pay does become a factor to be given weight when the evidence shows that the employer is paying a wage of health and decency. Then those sitting in judgment have not only the right but the clear duty to evaluate the evidence as to the ability of the employer to pay higher wages.

SUBSTANDARD WAGES REPRESENT EXPLOITATION

I take the position that no employer in our free enterprise system in America has any moral right to exploit his workers. He should not be allowed the legal privilege of exploiting his workers by having them subsidize his business by paying wages less than a wage of health and decency.

PERHAPS A SUBSIDY IS NECESSARY

I take the position that in a free economy such as ours there is a moral responsibility on the part of the Government to see to it that fellow Americans are not exploited by employers merely because they are economically stronger than the economically weak employees, who have no other choice but to work in the plants of such employers or not work at all.

So we come to the issue of whether workers should subsidize employers in "low wage" businesses or whether all the taxpayers of the country should subsidize them. Thus, as I offered a series of amendments in the Labor Committee, to bring more and more workers under the coverage of the bill, I was met with the argument that some businesses cannot pay more. I suggested that if it is a subsidy that they need, then the subsidy ought to come from all the taxpayers of the country and not from workers.

I am ready to support at any time anyone who wishes to offer such legislation. I do not think it is necessary to do so. I do not think it is necessary to do this in order to pass legislation that will require the payment of a decent minimum wage. But if there are those who are very much concerned about the fact that minimum wage legislation will put employers out of business because they cannot pay the minimum wage, then I take the position that it is the moral responsibility of all the people of this country to subsidize such employers.

My constructive suggestion—at least I hope it is a constructive suggestion—is to establish a procedure whereby the economic status of such an employer will be adjudged, and if there is a finding that he cannot pay a minimum wage and stay in business, assuming that he is operating efficiently and economically, and if it is adjudged further that it is in the public interest that he stay in business, then let us give him a Federal tax deduction for the amount of money necessary to increase his wage payments over the amount of money that he is paying as a fair minimum wage.

Let us recognize the burden of all the taxpayers of the country, rather than having employees to be exploited by taking less than a minimum wage.

My statement applies to a group of employees that I described while the Senate Labor Committee was considering the bill. I speak of the thousands of workers who, Mr. Goldberg, the expert who was assigned to us by the Labor Department to provide us with the statistical data in evaluating the amendments on the minimum wage bill, told us today have wages ranging around 53 cents an hour.

Does anyone really believe that in the year 1960, with all our boasts and expressions of pride about our economy, we can justify a wage of 53 cents an hour for fellow Americans, even though they may be laundry workers, and even though the color of their skin may be black? It is a great social injustice. In my judgment, it is an economic wrong that ought to be removed.

I regret that our bill does not cover a good many so-called service trade workers who are getting below $1 an hour.

EXPERIENCE IN THE PAPER PRODUCTS INDUSTRY

In 1939 I served as chairman of the Paper Products Industry Board, which in those days the law required to be appointed for the consideration of any proposals for increases in minimum wages. At that time there were many thousands of workers in the paper products industry in this country who were getting 25 cents an hour, but in 1939 the maximum wage that could be paid under the Fair Labor Standards Act was 40 cents an hour.

Those boards were composed of representatives of labor, representatives of industry, and representatives of the public. That hearing, held in Washington, D.C., lasted, as I recall, for about 10 days. I listened to able counsel for the employers in that case trying to justify 25 cents an hour as the pay for workers in the paper products industry.

One of the public members of the board was Professor Raushenbush, professor of economics at the University of Wisconsin. She is the daughter of the great Louis Brandeis. When we had been in session for several days, Professor Raushenbush said that her father and mother would like to have the public members come to their home for tea.

It was one of the richest experiences of my life as I sat at the feet of the great Justice Brandeis and listened to his discussion of some of the early problems which confronted us in this country when the labor movement was beginning to win new rights. With a twinkle in his eyes he said, "Well, what is the main argument of the employers in the case?"

I said, "Mr. Justice, the burden of their argument is that they do not have the ability to pay more; they will go broke if they pay more."

He laughed and said, "They have not changed their arguments since 1910, have they?"

Mr. President, that is a bewhiskered argument, the argument that they cannot pay a fair and decent living wage.

We granted the 40 cents an hour. I was sufficiently interested in the case to follow through, to see how many of these paper products businesses would go out of business because we granted the 40 cents an hour minimum wage, increasing it from 20 cents. Two years later not one company had gone out of business because of the increase in wages.

After I had been in the Senate 4 years, I happened to be in the hometown of the employer representative, and I was shown the great paper and pulp establishment of which he was president. I met him with the officers of that corporation. He introduced me by saying, "Senator MORSE is a man whose decision you had to learn to swallow in 1939."

My reply was, "Having just looked at your beautiful plant and at your operations, I have come to the conclusion that your employees have been able to do a lot more swallowing since 1939 as the result of the decision that we handed down."

LAUNDRY WORKERS UNDERPAID

I want to make this observation, with regard to the service trade employees, such as the laundry workers. In 1942, during the war, the War Labor Board had a case before it which required a review of the wages in the laundry industry. The record will show that the attorneys for one segment of the laundry industry tried to justify a 19-cent-an-hour wage for the laundry workers in 1942.

They are the same group of workers who now are underpaid. I was shocked, as was every other member of the 12-member board, as we tried that case. When the case was completed, the Board unanimously voted the opinion that they asked me to write, which increased the wages of the laundry workers from 19 cents an hour to 40 cents an hour. We were told that it would put a great many laundries out of business. Here again subsequent reports made to us by the Department of Labor failed to bear out the hue and cry and the fear argument that was raised by the proprietors of laundries, that they would have to close shop if we granted a minimum wage of 40 cents an hour.

Likewise, I believe if we were to include these workers in the bill we would find that few laundries, few small bus station operators, few hotels, few of the so-called service trade establishments would go out of business because they were required under the law to pay a fair and decent minimum wage.

IMPORTANT FOR US TO PASS A BILL

I return to my introductory remarks. We are confronted with realities. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has very clearly stated the position of the majority of the committee. We are offering a bill which is a great improvement over the status quo. It is the least we should do in this session of Congress. Therefore, on the basis of that general approach to this subject matter, I am pleased to join the Senator from Massachusetts in recommending the adoption of the bill as the committee has reported it to the Senate.

If the Senator from Colorado wishes me to yield to him, I shall be pleased to do so; otherwise I will yield the floor.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I have had some experience with automobile dealers in my State. It is the same experience that the able Senator from Oregon has referred to. The difficulty seems to be with the automobile dealers in my State, who are concerned about the automobile salesmen. I do not speak for all of them, of course. I was under the impression, as I understood the Kennedy bill, that automobile salesmen were exempt from the provisions of the bill, because most of them are working on commission, some of them making $10,000 a year. However, they do not earn their money all in 1 month or in the form of a stable salary. It may be that in one period of time, perhaps in 1 week, they will work 70 hours, while in another week they do not work so hard. I should like to have an explanation of what this bill means to the automobile salesmen, because a great misconception has arisen, particularly on the part of people who are not affected by the bill. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Massachusetts has already pointed out that a great deal of misinformation has been circulated among the automobile agencies of the country with respect to the bill as it affects salesmen.

The bill does not cover auto salesmen for overtime, and even as to the other employees, there is a $1 million gross income requirement.

Mr. CARROLL. Assume the situation of an automobile dealer. On the very point the able Senator from Oregon has stressed, many automobile dealers in my State, because of sales, supplies, and other factors, including mechanical operations and repairs, have gross incomes exceeding $1 million. Let us assume this provision applies to automobile dealers. I want to make it clear in the RECORD that it does not apply to automobile salesmen. Is that correct?

Mr. MORSE. Essentially, that is my understanding.

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume the law does apply because the dealer has a gross income of $1 million.

Mr. KENNEDY. Supplementing what the Senator from Oregon has said, the bill does not cover automobile salesmen, so far as overtime is concerned. It covers them so far as the minimum wage is concerned. As the Senator from Colorado knows, automobile salesmen are paid, in nearly every case, more than the minimum wage. They are exempted from overtime.

Mr. MORSE. The automobile dealers are not concerned about the minimum wage; they are concerned about paying overtime. The bill specifically exempts salesmen from the overtime provision.

Mr. CARROLL. The man I had in mind is a small dealer, even though he grosses more than $1 million, when he takes into consideration his capital investment. One of the chief concerns, at least of this one dealer, was the reporting provided under the bill, which he has not heretofore had to do, because he has been exempt.

I said I would look into the question when the bill was under debate. But as I heard the bill presented by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and listened to the clarification given by the able Senator from Oregon, both of whom are members of the committee, it seems to me that if the particular individual were exempt by the bill, there would not be much reporting.

I know from years of experience under the act—I do not mean personal experience, but as I have read the history of the act—that employers would have to keep a type of record, so that some spot checking could be made.

Mr. MORSE. If he is exempt from overtime under the bill, the records he has to keep are minimal.

Mr. CARROLL. But the able Senator from Oregon says that the salesman is not subject to the overtime provision.

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. We are not talking about the minimum wage. I think we have handled the automobile salesmen, as I now understand it.

Let us go back to the automobile mechanics. Most automobile mechanics in my area make far more than the minimum wage. Is this more than a minimum wage bill? Is there a provision for overtime for mechanics? Is this not only a minimum wage bill, but an overtime bill, as well?

Mr. MORSE. It is a fair labor standards bill; and a fair labor standards bill covers both wages and overtime. So, of course, mechanics will be covered by the overtime provision, and as to mechanics, the employer will have to keep a record of how much they are paid.

I have heard arguments made that there is a need to simplify the reporting system under the Fair Labor Standards Act, but I wish to make it clear that once employers come under the overtime provisions they must keep the same kind of record any other employer will have to keep with respect to overtime.

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume a mechanic is making $3 an hour, to use a round figure, as of now, under present employment conditions. We now include mechanics in the bill. Does the overtime provision of the bill require the payment, therefore, of time and one-half for overtime over 40 hours?

Mr. MORSE. Of course.

Mr. CARROLL. That is one of the purposes of the bill?

Mr. MORSE. Of course. There are many reasons, as a matter of policy, for such a requirement; but one reason, I may say, is to encourage a broader distribution of work opportunities.

Mr. CARROLL. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that another reason may be observance of the law itself.

Mr. MORSE. Of course. We start with that premise. In the first place, we go back to the argument of the Fair Labor Standards Act. One of the cardinal reforms of the New Deal, and one of its purposes, was to meet the economic depression. One of the purposes of the New Deal was to help to create more job opportunities. Therefore, including the overtime requirement would have a tendency to cause the employer to employ more persons at straight-time rates.

Mr. CARROLL. I know of the Senator's vast experience in this field. When was the first minimum wage law passed?

Mr. MORSE. In 1938.

Mr. CARROLL. This information may be contained in the committee report; I am sure it is in the hearings.

Mr. MORSE. It is in the report.

Mr. CARROLL. What was the population of the country at that time? What was the national income at that time?

Mr. MORSE. I could not pass that examination except by estimating.

Mr. CARROLL. What has been the rate of increase in the cost of living since that time?

Mr. MORSE. The increase in the cost of living has been substantial; but there is one important statistic I want the Senator to keep in mind. When the minimum wage was set in 1938, it was 25 cents an hour. The average wage being paid was 63 cents an hour, a difference of 38 cents.

The difference between the minimum wage set by law and the average wage in the country then, was much less than the difference between the minimum wage now, of $1, and the average wage in the country. Today the gap is $1.29.

As the Senator from Colorado implies, the population of the Nation has increased at a rapid rate. My guess would be that as against 180 million now, in 1938 it was probably in the neighborhood of 138 million or 140 million.

Mr. CARROLL. I should say 120 million. I think the population increases at the rate of about 3 million a year.

Mr. MORSE. The increase in the cost of living has been terrific.

Mr. CARROLL. Would not the Senator from Oregon say, therefore, that the minimum we are talking about is the wage paid to the lowest economic income group in the country? Is it not that group which is especially affected by the bill?

Mr. MORSE. That is the group we are talking about.

Mr. CARROLL. When was this subject last passed upon?

Mr. MORSE. In 1955 amendments were made.

Mr. CARROLL. I was not in the Senate in 1955. What was the position of the Republican Party on the minimum wage in 1955?

Mr. MORSE. The distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is present. I never speak for the Republicans, but he can, and I believe he can answer that question.

Mr. CARROLL. What were the Republicans advocating in 1955?

Mr. MORSE. It was my statement the last time the Fair Labor Standards Act was amended that there is an unfinished job in regard to coverage. That was in 1955. We have been waiting for 5 years to do our clear duty, in my judgment, in regard to the coverage problem. We now have an opportunity to improve the situation.

The bill does not begin to go nearly so far as I think it ought to go.

May I interrupt for one further moment on the coverage matter?

In my formal remarks I said that of the 4.5 million to 5 million new workers who would be covered by the law, a substantial percentage of them already are receiving a wage which equals the minimum and a substantial percentage of them also are getting overtime payments. So as to them we are merely making it legal now, in the sense we are bringing them under the written law.

But if we could cover the additional workers between the 5 million, in round numbers, let us say, that we are adding to the coverage, by means of this bill, and the 11 million that I would like to cover, it would be found that a large majority of the workers between the 5 million and the 11 million do not now get either the minimum wage or the overtime payments; and they are the workers who really are suffering the most in the wage and overtime structure in the country.

That is why I think that although by means of this bill we shall make some improvement, we never should forget the approximately 6 million more people who, in my judgment, should be covered in the very near future.

Mr. CARROLL. Will the Senator refresh my memory—for I was not a Member of the Senate in 1955. It is my distinct recollection, however, that at that time the administration was advocating a 90-cent minimum wage. It is my recollection that in that year the Congress did pass a $1 minimum wage bill.

Mr. MORSE. There were many proposals. However, I shall speak only for myself.

Mr. CARROLL. But what does the record show?

Mr. MORSE. The record will show what the Senator from Colorado states.

Mr. CARROLL. I want to know whether as a result of making the change, in 1955, from 90 cents to $1, there was any catastrophic economic effect because of that 10-cent difference.

Mr. MORSE. On the contrary, I happen to think that the economy was strengthened. I think that as we increase the purchasing power of the mass of the people, we strengthen the economy and help expand it; and many times I have expressed the truism that every economist will state—namely, that the great need in our country is to ever expand our private-enterprise economy. I do not think the surface of it has yet been scratched.

Mr. CARROLL. Will not the Senator agree that in the 1955 bill, some of the retail trades were exempted?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. As regards the pending bill, what is the position of the administration? Does it stand for $1.10 or $1.15?

Mr. MORSE. A member of the staff has pointed out that in 1955 we did not change any exemptions. They had been there ever since 1938.

Mr. CARROLL. In other words, Congress did not then extend the coverage?

Mr. MORSE. That is right.

Mr. CARROLL. What is the position of the administration today? In 1955 it was for 90 cents. Will the Senator state for the record what is the position of the administration today? He knows what the record is, for he is a member of the committee.

Mr. MORSE. Well, once I attempted to speak for the Republican Party. But I gave that up; and the Senator will not get me to speak for it tonight. [Laughter.] I simply give this general answer: It was not good.

Mr. CARROLL. Regardless of whether it is good or bad, I wish to know what it is. The Senator from Oregon is a member of the committee, and the evidence was submitted before him. What does the evidence reflect as to the position of the administration?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I shall be glad to relieve him of his embarrassment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am not at all embarrassed; I am simply trying to be kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDWATER. I appreciate that.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to say the administration was against most of the proposals which those of us on the Democratic side of the table made. But there were some great exceptions among Republican Senators—to their everlasting credit.

Mr. CARROLL. But what did the administration propose? I want to know what is in the record, and then I shall be happy to discuss this matter further.

Mr. MORSE. I always believe in calling on the best qualified witness. So I am very happy to yield to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], to permit him to speak as to the Republican position.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I merely wish to answer the question the Senator from Colorado has propounded to my friend, the Senator from Oregon, because I realize that the Senator from Oregon looks with rather longing eyes, at times, back to his former association, and I realize that sometimes he wishes he had not made the change. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORSE. I never experienced that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Well, at times I have seen the Senator from Oregon look at us with rather soulful, yearning eyes; and I thought I detected some regret on his part at making such a great mistake.

Mr. MORSE. No; my regret is that I was such a poor evangelist while I was on that side of the aisle. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDWATER. The position of the administration is that it would accept $1.15 an hour, with a limited coverage. I cannot state the exact amount of that limitation of coverage, but I would judge it to be somewhere between one and one-half million and two and one-half million. That is as far as I can go. It is necessary for them to rely on the judgment of the Secretary of Labor.

According to my knowledge, we have not heard on that score from the President, other than that he would entertain a change to this $1.15 amount, with limited coverage.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator. Will he state again what the coverage is?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have said that it is not clear to me, but I would judge it to be somewhere between 1½ million and 2½ million. I think the administration is trying to get at the retail businesses which truly are in interstate commerce.

I think the House bill probably would reflect the thinking of the administration—and I am speaking only on the basis of my own guessing—about as well as anything we could come to—retail establishments with at least five stores in two or more States.

Mr. MORSE. It is my understanding that Representative AYRES, of the House, who, I think it is fair to say, is one of their leaders in the matter of minimum-wage legislation—is reported to have said that the administration would look with favor upon the coverage as contained in the House bill. It is my understanding that would be in the neighborhood of 1 million employees.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think this is an important question. The fact is that when the Secretary of Labor came before our committee, in May of last year, and gave the administration's position, the administration was opposed to any increase in the minimum wage. The administration did favor extending the coverage to 2½ million workers not now covered, of whom the majority—as the Senator from Oregon has pointed out—were already receiving a $1 minimum wage.

It was not until a later date, in testifying before the House committee—after some months had passed—in response to the position we had taken, that the administration indicated—as the Senator from Arizona has indicated—that it would accept $1.15. The administration was dragged to it, because the position it took in response to our first effort was in opposition to lifting the minimum wage even 1 cent, even though it had not been changed since 1956.

Mr. MORSE. On the ground that it would be inflationary.

Mr. KENNEDY. And what is true of the position of the administration in regard to this bill is also true of the position of the administration in regard to the bill for medical assistance to the aged and the bill for Federal aid to education and the Housing Act and the area redevelopment bill—every one of these pieces of legislation which were discussed in the President's message this week. The original position of the administration was always in opposition to any action. It was only when it appeared that we would take action anyway that, finally, the reluctant compromise came forth from the administration—namely, that it would accept a different position.

So I am glad the Senator brought up the history of the matter.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator. This is exactly what we need to have in the debate.

We have the history as to 1955. What is the difference? It is the difference between 90 cents and $1—in other words, 10 cents. No economic catastrophe happened after that.

I am very happy to have the information from the very able Senator from Massachusetts. In the beginning there was no relenting on the part of the administration. As the able Senator from Oregon has said, the administration said this would be inflationary. But because we blazed the trail and fought for these economic and social programs, now the administration is willing to go to $1.15 and to have a little bit more coverage.

What are we asking for? The very clear and lucid statement of the Senator from Massachusetts should allay all the fears of all those who have become "steamed up" by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. This happens in my own area. I have received hundreds of letters from small businessmen who are not covered by this bill at all. All the automobile dealers are stirred up about this bill. And I hope the RECORD tonight will satisfy them.

I want to make one correction in the RECORD. They do not have to report anything. All they have to do is keep their books in shape, if I understand the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I say to the Senator that I think we are discussing a very important point in the consideration of domestic legislation. Both parties are now committed to extending the minimum wage and increasing it. There is no difference between the general recommendation made by the President of the United States on Monday and the position which the Senator from Oregon and I and the Senator from Colorado take. It is, however, when we look into the specifics that the differences arise in the positions of the two parties.

We both favor an increase, but our party favors $1.25, and the other party reluctantly is willing to accept $1.15. It favors area redevelopment, but the bill is hopelessly inadequate, and it is only in answer to legislation that we put forward. So while the general vocabulary may be identical, while the President may call for these programs, if people will examine the record—and I hope they do—they will find that they opposed the bill in the first place, and this is a sop, which did not represent a conviction, but was only a political move.

Mr. CARROLL. That was my experience in the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Ten years ago we began to reform and reexamine the social security program for the first time since the days of Franklin D. Roosevelt. We had the same trouble with social security.

I can remember our fighting for reforms at that time. All we wanted to do then was to move the maximum from $3,000 to $3,900. The Republicans knocked it down. We finally established the maximum at $3,600, when some of us were trying to establish it at $4,200.

The able Senator from Massachusetts well chose the slogan, "The challenge of a new frontier." We must blaze the way. We are the pioneers in reforms for economic justice. We have had to pull the Republicans, kicking and screaming, into the 20th century.

Mr. MORSE. I should add with reference to our earlier discussion that while the Wages and House Division does not send out a set of forms and reports to be filled out, employers do have to keep a set of books available to the investigators under the Fair Labor Standards Act and that, in many instances, quite a different set of books would be kept by them voluntarily if they were not subject to this inspection. Then, as the inspector comes in at the time he studies the books, he sometimes calls for additional information, which the critics say is nothing but redtape.

I am always willing to take a look at the administrative procedure in connection with some of these laws to see whether or not we are unduly increasing the clerical and bookkeeping work of the businessmen of the country.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. What I sought to do at the very beginning was to establish one or two factors. It was not really to engage in criticism of the Republicans or in a eulogy of the Democrats. I merely wanted to show that in 1955 we were in the bargain-basement business for 10 cents, 90 cents for the administration, and we took one for a dollar, with no increase in coverage. I am an old hand at this, because I saw the increase in social security in 1950 to 11 million persons. I saw the Republican administration come in year after year and increase the coverage. I commend them for it, but they have had to be hauled and pulled step by step into a program that is good for the family life of America.

I make one final point. I commend the Senator from Arizona for telling us what the Republican position is—not his position, he says, but their position. Their position is for a little coverage. Their position is for a little increase. Just think of this bargain-basement treatment for 10 cents, a thin dime. We are asking for a little more coverage, for perhaps 2 or 3 million more Americans, for the lowest group in the economic pyramid, in the strongest, richest nation in the world, when we pour money into other nations all over the world; and some of our own people are complaining.

I say to the able Senator from Massachusetts that when this message goes out over the country and we are able to overcome the propaganda of the various chambers of commerce, they will not be able to stand up with their position. How can this administration defend its position—10 cents difference and a few hundred thousand less coverage?

The able Senator from Oregon is right. We ought to move forward in a broader field, and we should do it in this very modest bill.

If I correctly understood the able Senator from Massachusetts, it will be 3 or 4 years before a minimum wage of $1.25 is achieved. I say we should not bind ourselves. In the next year we will move ahead again, as we must, because we have an expanding economy and the cost of living index increases year by year.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

COUNTRY AWAITS ACTION

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from Colorado very much for his very worthwhile contribution to this debate.

Before yielding the floor, I wish to make these final comments. I am very glad the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Massachusetts have brought out the position of some of the Republican administration leaders in respect to their proposals for Fair Labor Standards Act Amendments. It is well for it to be shown in the RECORD.

But, Mr. President, speaking only for myself, the problem before us must not be approached as a partisan problem at all, because, irrespective of party affiliation, Democrat or Republican or Independent, I am satisfied that there are many millions of people in our country who agree that we ought to proceed to do social and economic justice for the many exploited workers in America who are not receiving at the present time a decent minimum wage.

I say most respectfully that I think it will be a great mistake if we make it a partisan issue, because there are a great many Republican officeholders in this country who disagree with many of their top leaders with regard to this Fair Labor Standards Act issue.

I think we are truly dealing here not with a political issue in the narrow sense at all, but instead with an economic and legal issue: How far we should go in 1960 to do greater economic and social justice to these thousands and thousands of fellow Americans who at the present time are the victims of exploitation in this country?

I propose, Mr. President, that we issue a welcome beyond political affiliation for support from all Americans, irrespective of party, for the bill described by the Senator from Massachusetts in his able presentation this evening. The bill represents a great step forward in producing greater social and economic justice for those who are being wronged in our economy today by being required, as a matter of economic circumstances, to work for less than a wage of health and decency.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it shall be my purpose during the debate to occupy the floor in my own right. I have asked the very diligent and devoted Senator from Oregon to yield so that I may say tonight, at this late hour—that I join with him and with the Senator from Colorado in commending the clarity with which the Senator from Massachusetts has explained the philosophy of as well as some of the actual provisions of the measure now before us for consideration.

I trust it is not inappropriate to indicate I was a Member of the House of Representatives in 1938 and its Committee on Labor, and the privilege and the responsibility was given me of cosponsoring the initial Fair Labor Standards Act. I am gratified to again have, 22 years later, the continuing privilege and the further responsibility of being a cosponsor of the proposed legislation now deserving our affirmative determination.

With no attempt to wave a flag, I recall the economic conditions and the human difficulties of a quarter of a century ago, and I remember well the unconscionably long hours, the unconscionably short pay, and the unconscionably bad working conditions under which millions of men and women who then toiled in America struggled.

Mr. President, I embrace this opportunity to share with these gentlemen who have spoken the desirability to discuss the pending legislation not from a partisan standpoint, but rather to join with them and with other Senators in doing now what needs to be done—raising the wages and increasing the coverage under the law, to strengthen the economy of our Union.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as a member of the committee I not only wish to thank the Senator from West Virginia for the remarks he has made but also to pay my respects to him and to give him my praise for the cooperation and the fine work he did as a member of our labor subcommittee in helping us to perfect the original bill and in helping us bring forth the bill which is now before the Senate on this subject.

I close, by asking unanimous consent that a memorandum prepared by the staff of the committee entitled "Summary of Minimum Wage Bill as Reported From the Senate Labor Committee," be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare may have additional staff members present on the floor during consideration of the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I assume that naturally the request includes the minority?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I wish to say only a few words tonight very briefly, because I have a rather lengthy statement on this subject.

I commend my friend from Oregon for urging that, if we can, we should keep political considerations out of this discussion. It is very easy, I know, for the Democrats to look at the Republicans and to say, "They want everybody to work in sweatshops. They do not want to raise wages." We, on the other hand, can look at the Democrats and say, "They are following a will-o-the-wisp, for nobody has ever proved that the figure of a dollar and a quarter is economically correct."

I think we can argue this question out on the merits. My particular position is well known to everybody. I do not believe the Federal Government should be in the business of regulating wages at all. No measure is going to please me.

I have a number of amendments which I shall offer, which I hope will improve the palatability of the bill.

I certainly hope we can refrain from injecting politics into the consideration of the bill, because I think both parties sincerely desire to get at the same end. We go at it in different ways.

The administration, at the time it opposed any increase in the minimum wage or in coverage, honestly felt—and I believe a great number of economists in this country were convinced—that any increase in coverage or in minimum wages at that time would have resulted in inflation. I assume the President's advisers have informed him differently this year.

I do not think the President was dragged into or pushed into this at all. I think the President probably came to a conclusion through the normal processes of reasoning.

I hope we can follow the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon and can argue this matter out on an economic basis, realizing that the Republicans are not devils with horns and long tails and that the Democrats do not have only one horn and one tail each. We both wish to get to the same place. There is a difference in how we desire to get there.

I think the majority of the Republicans and some Democrats conscientiously feel that for the Federal Government to artificially raise wages is a stimulant to inflation, and that for the Federal Government to assume the responsibility, as the Senator from Oregon suggests, of requiring the paying of wages where the employer is not capable of paying a wage which is adequate, in the Senator's opinion, is detrimental to the incentive which has forever sparked the free enterprise system.

We cling to that thought as religiously as my Democratic friends cling to the idea that the Federal Government can, by its injections, increase the purchasing power and the total income.

Therefore, I am going to present my arguments, probably starting tomorrow, on the basis of economics and the humane treatment of people. I hope my arguments will prevail, but if they do not I shall accept the decision of the Senate.

I am not going to make further recitations tonight, because I have a rather lengthy text for tomorrow. I know my Democratic friends are tired. They have had long and tedious months of campaigning. I should like to have them go home and get a good night's rest, so that we can start fresh tomorrow. [Laughter.]

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Address by Senator Wiley Over Radio Station WIND, Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 10, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, apparently Soviet Premier Khrushchev is engaging in a kind of crazy, mixed-up pattern of troublemaking around the world. To paraphrase what Prime Minister Macmillan recently said in his letter to the Soviet Premier, "It's difficult to understand—or find any logic in—the capricious but dangerous way Mr. K. is meddling in world affairs."

Despite the fact that the United States is undergoing a political campaign it should be made clear—as Secretary Herter has done—that this does not create an open season for Communist troublemaking and aggression.

Recently I was privileged to review Khrushchev's seemingly schizophrenic policies in a broadcast over radio station WIND, Chicago. The program included in addition some of the major issues confronting our country. I ask unanimous consent to have excerpts of the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR WILEY OVER RADIO STATION WIND, CHICAGO

Even though there is an upcoming political campaign in the United States, we should make it clear to Mr. Khrushchev and other world Communists that:

We are alert—not asleep;

We shall continue to vigorously support those fundamental policies that will improve the outlook for peace;

We will strongly oppose Communist efforts at expansion.

We, as Americans, need to keep our heads. During the upcoming campaign, there will be charges and countercharges. However, both political parties—Republican and Democratic—and their candidates have a great responsibility for presenting the real issues; for not distorting our Nation's accomplishments or its purposes; for underwriting a strong program for world peace; and for resolutely, clearly and realistically blueprinting future plans for security, progress and a better life for our people.

Along with Lincoln—whose ascendancy to the Presidency 100 years ago we now celebrate—I have great faith in the people—in their God-given intelligence and ability to find the right answers in these challenging times.

IN-BETWEEN STATE OF AFFAIRS

As American citizens, we now find ourselves in an in-between state of affairs.

The political conventions—Democratic and Republican—have just concluded.

Congress reopens in about a week for a final session that promises plenty of "hot battles."

The campaign for the elections of 1960—of which there have already been "skirmishes"—promises to mount higher in intensity, as we approach the November elections.

Abroad, too, we—and the free world—face the current cycles of unpredictable, chaotic, unprincipled actions by the Communists—as they disrupt efforts to promote peace, attempt to confuse us, distort our purposes by worldwide propaganda, and utilize any and all techniques—however reprehensible—to attempt to attain their ultimate purpose of world domination.

Despite the campaign barrages at home—and the wild, unpredictable Communist antics abroad—I am confident that you, the citizens of this great country, will be able to keep your feet on the ground. In fact, our survival depends upon it.

REVIEW OF MAJOR ISSUES OF 1960 POLITICAL CAMPAIGN

First, let's take a look at the upcoming political battles. Briefly, I would like to review some of the major challenges.

Maintaining the peace

1. The No. 1 issue is: Maintaining the peace. Among other things, this includes:

Further strengthening our defenses,

Continuing efforts to reach safeguarded agreements to reduce East-West tensions, including reducing world armaments, and cessation of nuclear tests,

A creative counterattack to the Communist ideological-propaganda offensive.

Cooperation to carry forward with our allies constructive, realistic programs for common defense and—particularly to progress and provide a better life for folks in the less developed areas of the world.

Effectively resolve problems arising out of differing economic, social, and political views among the free nations themselves—without "unsettling rifts" in our relationships.

Further strengthening our economy

2. We must maintain and further strengthen the economy at home. This involves: Encouragement of a sound money policy to stimulate growth and expansion of our free enterprise system and halt inflation; the surplus of over $1 billion for fiscal year 1960—like the dramatic "slowdown" of inflation—illustrates that it can be done. Encourage full employment—now at an alltime high of 68.6 million; also we must wipe out remaining pockets of unemployment. Further brighten the outlook for job-creating free enterprise—95 percent of which are small businesses, through appropriate modification of the tax laws; effective employment of the antitrust laws; and similar actions. Further expand our housing program—to provide new and better homes, apartments, and other types of housing for more Americans. Carry on constructive conservation of our natural resources; and other measures.

Programs for human progress

3. As our times are new, we must also adopt new programs for preservation of human rights and promoting human progress. In an economically healthy country, we should—and must—create ever greater opportunity for our people in all walks of life. This includes: Assuring opportunity for workers to engage—and succeed—in a chosen vocation; providing necessary care—as well as opportunity to continue to contribute to community and national life—for our aging folks; establishing more creative youth-development programs; expanding our educational opportunities for the increasing students of school age, as well as for adult education; assuring protection—and opportunity to exercise constitutional rights for all citizens.

These, of course, are only highlights of complex fields in which we need to keep moving forward with our fast-advancing times.

Analysis of Khrushchev's schizophrenic policies

Now, let's take a look around the world. We recognize, of course, that peace and security are necessary—in fact, essential to survival—in this nuclear-missile age. Any consideration of the outlook for peace, and threats to our security, almost magnetically focus upon the Communists—the major troublemakers and threats to peace.

Regrettably, we continue to witness sequences of erratic, contradictory, illogical action by Khrushchev and the Soviet Government. Currently, efforts are being made to analyze the motivations behind such on-and-off, hot-and-cold, alternative "missile-threats and sweet-talk" policies. For one who looks for logic, adherence to reason and principles, respect for national order and law, and desire for peace, however, the utterings and actions of Khrushchev almost defy interpretation.

Recently, Prime Minister Macmillan, of Great Britain, wrote to Premier Khrushchev, saying, "I simply do not understand what your purpose is today."

There is one theory—which, recently, has appeared to "shed some light" on Mr. Khrushchev's seemingly schizophrenic policies: A number of years ago, a Russian scientist named Pavlov—by experimentation—discovered that if one dealt consistently in an inconsistent way with animals, the result was confusion and hysteria. In practice, he would alternately "pat them"—then "kick them"—for the same thing.

Apparently, Khrushchev is adopting a similar theory in his world policy. However, I believe we should not—and must not—be fooled by his Pavlovian tactics.

SETTING THE COMMUNIST RECORD "STRAIGHT"

To better deal with these contradictory policies, we—and the world—need to do a little "skywriting"—nationally and internationally—to more clearly distinguish the great differences between the Soviets' "word and deed." Let me cite a few examples: (1) Since World War II, the Soviets—seemingly in good faith—entered into over 40 top-level agreements with the United States. As it served their purposes, however, they flagrantly have broken over 37 of these treaties. (2) Contradictorily, the Soviet Premier preaches against imperialism outside the Iron and Bamboo Curtains; meanwhile the Communist blocs are building within their orbits—and attempting to extend—a great Colonial Empire. (3) Indulging in wild—and many times refutable—accusations against the United States and the West, for espionage, the Sino-Soviet bloc has created the greatest international conspiratorial, criminal-type ring of espionage and subversion known in world history. (4) Under guise of creating a "classless society," communism—in practice—has created a new, privileged class, both in China and the Soviet Union. Although the Communists number only about 2–4 percent in Red China, and 4–6 percent of the population in the Soviet Union, they, as a new, privileged class, "get the plums," dominate and enrich themselves in power and wealth at the expense of the common people of their countries; as well, they "siphon off" the wealth, manpower and national resources of the countries they dominate. (5) Under the ruse of the oft-repeated "peaceful, or competitive coexistence," the Communists are carrying on—on a warlike schedule—espionage, sabotage, subversion and other penetrations of the free world. Among free people, the idea of coexistence, historically, has been considered an inherent right of all nations.

For the Communists, however, this does represent a deviation from the old, Leninist line—still adhered to by Red China—that there must ultimately be a war between the capitalist and Communist nations.

Fundamentally, this is one of the reasons for the recent "spat" between Moscow and Peiping. Still in the first stages of communism—Red China finds it convenient, perhaps to a large degree for internal, propaganda consumption—to advocate war, for ultimate conquest of the world by communism.

Even though Mr. K., however, professes adherence to the concept of peaceful coexistence, his alley-brawl tactics—translated into Soviet policies on the international level—include anything—right or wrong, legal or illegal—if it will forward the Communist efforts toward domination of the world.

CONCLUSION

In the days ahead, we must set Mr. K. straight. By this I mean: We should make it evident that as always we shall continuously be ready and willing—regardless of an election—to protect the ramparts of freedom.

SENATE

THURSDAY, AUGUST 11, 1960

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, amid the tensions of these terrific days we seek in Thy presence a saving experience of inner quiet and certainty.

Our ears are filled with the world's angry din. We must find Thee as a strong foundation that storms cannot shake, as a deep well that droughts cannot exhaust, as a citadel of refuge that no foe can invade.

We come in deep anxiety concerning the world the next generation will inherit from our hands.

Facing decisions freighted with destiny, unite our hearts and minds, we beseech Thee, in a mighty purpose that our Nation's strength, material and spiritual, be dedicated to throw open the gates of more abundant life for all mankind. We ask it in the Name which is above every name. Amen.

RESOLUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT UNITED NATIONS FORCE

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the current crisis in the troubled Republic of the Congo is unhappily not yet resolved. But it has already served as a dramatic reminder of the important role which a United Nations Police force can play in certain critical areas.

I am submitting today, for appropriate reference, a resolution which would again express the sense of the Senate that such a United Nations force be established as a permanent arm of the United Nations. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas twice in recent years, an emergency force of the United Nations has demonstrated its usefulness as an instrument for international order and security, and

Whereas a United Nations force can make an important contribution to the maintenance of conditions of peace and stability among nations, through such noncombatant functions as observation, patrol, guard duty, truce supervision, and the like, and

Whereas a United Nations force organized on a permanent basis, with advance provision for its transport and supply, could be made quickly available at troubled points throughout the world: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(a) A United Nations force of a similar character to the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East and the United Nations military force in the Congo should be made a permanent arm of the United Nations;

(b) Such a force should be composed of units made available by members of the United Nations: Provided, That no such units should be accepted from permanent members of the Security Council;

(c) Consideration should be given to arrangements whereby individuals would be allowed to volunteer for service with such a force: Provided, That individuals who are nationals of permanent members of the Security Council should not be acceptable;

(d) Equipment and expenses of such a force should be provided by the United Nations out of its regular budget.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. There is no need, Mr. President, for a lengthy exposition of why a permanent United Nations force, immediately available for duty in troubled areas, can be an extremely useful factor in the prevention of conflict. We have only to recall that many international crises of major importance have arisen over matters which seemed at the outset to be of only geographically limited consequence. There is always the danger of global conflict when nations believe they have no alternative to their own intervention in such circumstances.

The speed and efficiency with which the United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold, has improvised noncombatant United Nations forces has been truly remarkable. On November 5, 1956, the United Nations General Assembly authorized the establishment of a United Nations emergency force to secure and supervise a cease-fire in the Middle East. Only 10 days later, the first advance contingents of the hastily assembled United Nations force were landing in the Suez Canal Zone. On July 14 of this year, the United Nations Security Council authorized the Secretary General to provide military assistance to the Republic of the Congo. Within 2 days, United Nations Under Secretary Ralph J. Bunche, serving as the United Nations commander ad interim in the Congo, was deploying the first United Nations troops in Leopoldville.

These were both heroic feats of organization, as well as United Nations diplomacy. And they were greatly aided by logistical and airlift support provided by the United States, although neither the Middle East nor the Congo United Nations forces contain units from any of the great powers who are permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

Efficient as these actions were, however, we should, I believe, regard them as a spur to further development rather than as a cause for complacency. The arrival of the first contingents of the U.N. units was, in both cases, only the start of a lengthy process of building up an adequate United Nations force. A number of weeks were required in 1956 to bring the United Nations Emergency Force up to a strength of 6,000 men. The process of United Nations buildup in the Congo this summer was more rapid and on a larger scale, with 12,000 United Nations troops now on the scene. But even today the U.N. force in the Congo is still incomplete. We should not have to rely upon improvisations, however brilliantly conceived and executed. The United Nations should be in a position to deploy its forces where needed, quickly and at full rather than token strength from the outset. The world can afford no less for the ability of the United Nations to field such a force, with little or no advance warning, which may at some future time be of crucial importance in preserving peace.

Mr. President, the U.S. Senate has on a number of occasions in the past gone on record in support of a U.N. Police force. Indeed, I was one of those who joined in sponsoring a similar resolution, Senate Resolution 15, which passed the Senate in 1957. I believe, Mr. President, that the reiteration of this basic view at this time, and its updating in the light of recent events, would be extremely helpful. It would express our urgent concern with this practical and attainable step toward strengthening the peace-preserving authority of the United Nations.

For a number of reasons I believe it would be desirable to refrain from expressing detailed suggestions on the organization of such a force.

Many persons would no doubt prefer to see a United Nations force composed entirely of volunteers recruited on an individual basis, rather than composed of units furnished by individual states. Many would, I am sure, like to specify that a permanent United Nations force should be fully equipped with its own vehicles, tactical aircraft, and the full means for its own air transport and supply. But, even though the cost of such a force would be almost negligible in comparison to the cost of the armed forces maintained by any one of the major powers, they would be large in comparison to the regular budget of the United Nations. Many States might object vigorously to a substantial increase in financial burdens which they already consider heavy.

My resolution, therefore, does not take the position that national units held in readiness by individual nations should be excluded. It does not express the view that contractual arrangements by the United Nations with individual states to provide transportation and equipment are undesirable. But it does imply that any such arrangements should be established on a regular basis so that the United Nations Police force may move ahead instantly when it is needed and it would express the sense of the Senate that consideration should be given to arrangements to permit individuals to volunteer for service.

The resolution I am submitting today does express one principle which is extremely important to the successful functioning of such a force. That is, neither country units nor individual volunteers should come from the permanent members of the Security Council—China, France, Great Britain, U.S.S.R., and the United States. The opportunities for the successful functioning of such a force depend upon a large measure of agreement among the members of the United Nations, either in the Security Council or the General Assembly. Such agreement is more likely if none of the great powers is in a position where it may be suspected of attempting to use or to influence the United Nations force for its own purposes. The absence of troops from the great powers should also make the admission of the United Nations force more acceptable to any State or States whose territory is involved.

Mr. President, this resolution takes no position on the difficult problem of enforcement action by the United Nations involving what amounts to war on behalf of the international organization. We are concerned here with a noncombatant force which would undertake such functions as observation, patrol, guard duty, truce supervision, and similar functions. Such activities, carried out promptly and effectively, may well help to put out sparks before they touch off a major conflagration. At our present state of development of military technology, where an accidental war could destroy tens or hundreds of millions of people just as thoroughly as a war resulting from planned aggression, I believe it is incumbent upon us to support any promising opportunity to reduce conflict at the earliest possible stage. A permanent United Nations force represents such an opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 359) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GOLDWATER submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. ROBERTSON:

Address delivered by him at the annual meeting of the Shenandoah Valley Electric Cooperative, Harrisonburg, Va., on August 9, 1960.

By Mr. WILEY:

Statement by him, entitled "Soviets Tear Down United Nations," and an editorial on the same subject, published in the Milwaukee Journal of August 9, 1960.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASTORE in the chair). Objection is raised.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator withhold his objection so I may make an insertion in the RECORD? No Senator desires to talk at this time. All we are doing is wasting time. Will the Senator do me the courtesy of withholding his objection?

Mr. KEATING. I like to extend all the courtesy I can to the majority leader. I have been requested to object, and I shall have to insist on continuance of the quorum call, but I shall be glad to check to see whether objection is insisted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wish the Senator would check with whatever higher authority there may be, because I would like to make some brief statements for the RECORD, and this is the morning hour.

Mr. KEATING. I have no personal objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will resume the call of the roll.

The call of the roll was resumed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FROZEN DEFENSE FUNDS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, yesterday the President took issue with my statement that $621,302,000 of Defense funds had been frozen.

I do not want to argue with the President, and I certainly do not intend to question his motives or his good intentions. However, there does appear to be some confusion about the extent to which Department of Defense funds have been impounded. Therefore, I would like to outline the basic facts, since I think they speak for themselves.

On June 9, 1960, the Office of the Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum to the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force which stated:

> If the Congress makes available more funds for fiscal year 1961 than are requested, and where the law does not require expenditure, agencies should reserve the increases and carry them forward to the maximum practical extent to fiscal year 1962.

In acting on the Department of Defense appropriation bill for 1961, the Congress made increases of over $1¾ billion and also made various program reductions of about $1.1 billion. Incidentally, those figures were exactly reversed in the President's press conference yesterday, I am sure by oversight. This resulted in a net increase in appropriations of $661,608,000.

When the 1961 budget was submitted to the Congress on January 18, the Department of Defense issued its first financial plan for fiscal year 1961. This plan showed that all the funds expected to be available in fiscal year 1961 would be used.

On July 7, after the appropriations had been made for fiscal year 1961, the Department of Defense issued a revised financial plan. This revised plan, apparently carrying out the instructions contained in the Secretary of Defense's memorandum of June 9, called for freezing $1,097,633,000 of the funds made available for fiscal year 1961.

On July 28, I wrote a letter to the Secretary of Defense asking him to tell us whether it was still administration policy to freeze the additional funds provided by the Congress, or whether these funds would now be used. On August 2, I sent the Secretary of Defense another letter asking him to give us his specific recommendations as to any additional amounts which could be used effectively during fiscal year 1961 for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense.

On August 9, Secretary Gates replied to my letter of July 28. His reply revealed that there had been a partial thaw in the funds that had been frozen on July 7. Whereas, $1,097,633,000 had been frozen on July 7, the amount frozen was now $621,302,000.

Apparently the $476,331,000 that has now been unfrozen will be used to carry out the measures to strengthen our defenses, which the President outlined in his message to the Congress on Monday. While it is disappointing to find that the $621,302,000 is still frozen today, I believe the Congress can take some satisfaction from the fact that its foresight in providing additional funds has resulted in moving forward a strengthened defense effort.

On Monday, when I received Secretary Gates' reply to my letter of July 28, I put it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that it would be available to everyone. Apparently some of the press had difficulty understanding the complicated financial tables that were part of this reply. I understand that a lengthy press conference was held at the Pentagon Monday afternoon to explain the meaning of Secretary Gates' letter to me. I would like to quote brief extracts from three stories printed the next day on the basis of this Pentagon briefing.

The Washington Post story was filed by the Associated Press under the headline "Unspent Defense Funds Explained by Pentagon." The very first paragraph read as follows:

Defense Department officials confirmed yesterday Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON'S estimate that $621 million Congress voted for defense still is frozen and unused.

The New York Times covered this matter as follows:

The cost of increased defense measures announced by President Eisenhower yesterday will be $476,331,000, officials said today.

The administration will continue to hold an unallocated $621,302,000, including funds that Congress appropriated over the President's remonstrations in the $40 million defense bill, Pentagon officials explained.

The Wall Street Journal reported as follows:

Even though Mr. Gates said the administration does not at present plan to spend $621 million of available appropriations, the data he submitted indicated only about $551 million is included in the gross increases voted by Congress in this year's defense budget. Capitol Hill defense experts were unable immediately to pinpoint the source of all of the other $70 million in unspent appropriations. Part of this amount consists of $16.9 million, not included in the gross budget increase, for construction of Reserve and National Guard buildings which the administration does not plan to spend. There was no indication, however, where other unspent funds came from.

At his press conference yesterday the President indicated that he did not know that $621 million of defense funds had been frozen. He stated that the matter had not been put before him in those terms.

If the President says that he was not informed that these funds were frozen, I accept his statement. Nevertheless, there can be no question about the fact that these funds have been frozen and are frozen right now.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of my letter of August 2 to the Secretary of Defense, which has not yet been answered.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If I may, I should like to have consent to have the letter included in the RECORD. I shall conclude in a moment, and then I shall be glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, D.C., August 2, 1960.

Hon. THOMAS S. GATES, Jr.,
The Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: During the forthcoming session of the Congress, consideration will be given to the need for additional funds for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense.

This consideration will cover such programs as Army modernization, Navy modernization, airborne alert, acceleration of ballistic missile programs, acceleration of military satellites, airlift, antisubmarine warfare, augmentation of manned bomber capabilities, augmented troop strengths, expanded research and development, and other high priority programs.

I should appreciate your advising me now whether such additional funds would be used, in the event that the Congress, in discharging its constitutional responsibility of providing for the national defense, should decide to make additional funds available.

If so, I should also appreciate your specific recommendations as to the amounts that can be used effectively during fiscal year 1961, what could be accomplished with such funds, and which programs the Department of Defense believes should be augmented or accelerated in order to assure that America's future military strength will be unquestionably second to none.

Sincerely,

LYNDON B. JOHNSON.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point copies of the three newspaper articles from which I quoted, and an excerpt from President Eisenhower's press conference dealing with the question of impounding Defense Department appropriations.

There being no objection, the articles and excerpt were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 10, 1960]

UNSPENT DEFENSE FUNDS EXPLAINED BY PENTAGON

Defense Department officials confirmed yesterday Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON'S estimate that $621 million Congress voted for defense still is frozen and unused.

Still, they said, it may be necessary to ask the next Congress and the new administration for more money to meet record peacetime military spending, estimated this year to reach at least $41.5 billion.

The reason for not using the $621,302,000 Congress made available in addition to administration requests, is that it was earmarked for specific items. Pentagon budget officials told newsmen. And, they said, the administration is not ready to spend money on these items.

Johnson questioned what the administration would do with additionad funds since it had impounded this $621 million, or what additional funds would be spent if Congress voted them.

He made his statements in the light of President Eisenhower's message to Congress Monday, calling for new military preparedness actions.

The Defense Department estimated these moves would cost nearly $500 million more.

This year's defense spending is expected to be at least $41.5 billion, a peacetime record, officials said, and there are still unestimated expenses involved in toning up military strength.

The defense outlay for the current fiscal year is higher than the actual spending in any 12 months since World War II except for the final year of the Korean conflict, when $43.7 billion was spent.

If more than the appropriated money is needed, Pentagon spokesmen explained, it will be to pay for such "readiness" preparations as keeping a minimum of three attack aircraft carriers in the Mediterranean and Western Pacific areas.

Here's what the Defense Department intends to do with funds appropriated so far.

Spend all of the $105,440,000 to hold the Army Reserve and National Guard at strengths of 300,000 and 400,000.

Use more than $65 million of the $158 million Congress approved to modernize the Army. Substantial funds will go for more M–60 tanks.

The Air Force will use more than half of the additional money voted for development of the B–70 long-range, supersonic strategic bomber. This added money, about $100 million, will not produce a finished weapons system, but will develop two prototypes already started.

The Defense Department will use $50 million of the $83.8 million added by Congress to speed the Samos spy satellite program.

The Navy will start five additional Polaris missile-launching submarines and order nuclear reactors and advance equipment for five more. This will absorb all but a little over $69 million of the Polaris system money voted by Congress.

It will hold back over $110 million Congress voted to start three additional nuclear attack submarines. The Navy will start only one this year.

The Air Force will use all of the $194 million added by Congress for increased airlifts. And it will use all of the $82.9 million additional for increasing the airborne alert capability of the Strategic Air Command.

WASHINGTON, August 10.—The cost of increased defense measures announced by President Eisenhower yesterday will be $476,331,000, officials said today.

The administration will continue to hold an unallocated $621,302,000, including funds that Congress appropriated over the President's remonstrations in the $40 billion defense bill, Pentagon officials explained.

They indicated that the President would not request more appropriations to meet the increased Soviet "truculence" he cited in his message to Congress.

Previously he had said that if he needed more money he would let Congress know.

Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas, the majority leader, denounced the new spending plan on the Senate floor.

FOR BOLSTERING FLEETS

The President's move would not have been possible without money that the Democratic-controlled Congress voted, he charged.

The President, in his message, cited his strengthening of the 6th and 7th Fleets, plans to build five instead of three more Polaris missile submarines, more spending for Army modernization and strategic bombing readiness, and increased investments to develop a B–70 high-altitude bomber and a Samos reconnaissance satellite.

The fiscal consequences of the latest defense plans were explained by Pentagon budget officials at a news conference after Defense Secretary Thomas S. Gates, Jr., had made public JOHNSON's request for the information.

The immediate impact will be that the Defense Department will spend $150 million more in the current fiscal year than it planned when the 12-month period began last July 1, the official said.

This would account for a rise of less than half of 1 percent in the total previous spending forecast of $41,185 million. An additional $200 million may be spent on civilian pay increases ordered by Congress over the President's veto, the officials estimated.

Although they would contribute to the continued record peacetime spending, the additional sums contrast with proposals by Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, the Democratic Presidential candidate, and some Republicans who support Governor Rockefeller's views for military increases up to $3 billion.

However, it was indicated that neither the Democrats nor the Republicans would act to increase defense appropriations at this session of Congress.

Senator JOHNSON, after having received his reply on the Pentagon's budget plans, complained that he had received no reply to his demands for specific "shopping lists," nor to a second letter in which he had asked suggestions on what further military appropriations might be welcomed at the White House.

"In view of the fact that the administration has decided to impound $621,302,000 of the funds already provided by Congress, it's obvious what its policy would be with regard to any additional funds," he commented.

Whether the Democrats will initiate defense appropriations must await the answer to his second letter to Secretary Gates, he observed. Mr. JOHNSON is the Democratic Vice-Presidential nominee.

At the Pentagon it was said that the letter probably would be sent within a day or two. But it was made clear at the budget briefing that it would take about 2 months to complete studies for the President.

In the meantime, the officials noted, they would be working on the defense budget for the 1962 fiscal year. Thus, with Congress no longer in session this fall, it was said, only a "crisis" action in which the President called Congress into special session would provide the opportunity for increased appropriations.

Pentagon officials provided an item-by-item analysis of the military budget figures that have become political issues in recent weeks. The President originally requested $39,335 million last January. In April, he announced a series of planning changes that brought the total down $119 million. In July, after other changes, the total came to $39,335 million.

But Congress appropriated $39,996,608,000, a net of $662,108,000 more than the President had sought. While increasing some programs by $1,900 million, Congress cut others requested by the President by $1,240 million.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Aug. 10, 1960]

WASHINGTON.—Congressional Democratic leaders tentatively have decided not to try for a big increase in defense appropriations during this short session of Congress.

It was learned that Massachusetts Senator KENNEDY and Senate Majority Leader JOHNSON of Texas, the Democratic presidential and vice-presidential nominees, made this decision, subject to change, folowing disclosure by Defense Secretary Gates that the administration does not currently plan to spend $621 million in defense money appropriated by Congress during its regular session. Senator JOHNSON had requested the Gates statement. The administration isn't obliged to spend money appropriated by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, while refusing to specifically proclaim that no attempt would be made to vote additional defense funds in the preelection session, nevertheless made clear he believes the approval of higher appropriations would be a waste of time. "In view of the fact that the administration has decided to impound $621,302,000 of funds already provided by the Congress, it's obvious what its policy would be with regard to any additional funds," the Senate leader asserted.

DEMOCRATIC TACTICS

The defense spending plans submitted to Mr. JOHNSON by Mr. Gates referred to the $621 million as "money available for future requirements," but Senator JOHNSON called this "Pentagon gobbledygook for the simple word 'impounded.'"

It appeared likely that Senators KENNEDY and JOHNSON would use the Gates disclosure in two ways:

They will contend that, because the administration would put the money in cold storage anyway, Mr. KENNEDY is therefore freed from his prenomination promise to add $2 to $3 billion to the defense budget.

And, they can claim that the impounded money stands as evidence of the Republican administration's apathy in the defense field.

Actually, the amount of the Pentagon's unspent congressional appropriations was much higher only a few weeks ago. A July 7 chart submitted by Mr. Gates to Senator JOHNSON showed $1.1 billion in aggregate unspent congressional appropriations. Thus, between July 7 and yesterday, the administration decided to spend some $500 million of the impounded money.

INCREASE APPROVED

Congress appropriated a net increase, which takes into account certain reductions in administration-requested programs, of $750 million over President Eisenhower's final defense budget for the current fiscal year that began July 1. But the data submitted by Secretary Gates calculated the gross increase in defense funds, not counting offsetting reductions, at about $1.1 billion over the final budget after supplemental requests. This gross increase, which does not include military construction funds, makes up all but a small portion of the aggregate $1.1 billion of the unspent appropriations the Pentagon had available on July 7. The President's defense budget requested $39.2 billion for the current fiscal year, not counting cash for military construction.

Although Senators KENNEDY and JOHNSON are believed to have decided against an attempt to substantially increase defense appropriations on their own, they probably would go along with any request by Mr. Eisenhower for increased spending. The President, in his session-opening message to Congress Monday, hinted he might request a modest rise in funds. It is understood that Vice President NIXON, the Republican nominee for President, is in favor of such a boost in spending.

Even though Mr. Gates said the administration does not at present plan to spend $621 million of available appropriations, the data he submitted indicated only about $551 million is included in the gross increases voted by Congress in this year's defense budget. Capitol Hill defense experts were unable immediately to pinpoint the source of all of the other $70 million in unspent appropriations. Part of this amount consists of $16.9 million, not included in the gross budget increase, for construction of Reserve and National Guard buildings which the administration does not plan to spend. There was no indication, however, where other unspent funds came from.

Mr. Gates spelled out to Senator JOHNSON how the extra money voted by Congress earlier this year will be spent.

B–70 BOMBER

About $100 million of $184 million added by Congress for development of the proposed B–70 long-range supersonic bomber will be spent; the President had asked only $85 million for the plane, for which North American Aviation, Inc., is prime contractor.

The Pentagon does not now plan to spend another $100 million approved by Congress for Air Force use either in B–70 development or for development of a fighter aircraft. The fighter interceptor presumably would be the F–106 produced by Convair division of General Dynamics Corp.

SATELLITES

The Pentagon plans to spend $50 million of $83.8 million added by Congress for development of the Samos earth-girdling spy satellite. But Mr. Gates indicated this money "will be utilized to provide an alternative approach to certain political phases" of satellite development. This would bring total Air Force satellite spending for the fiscal year to $427 million. The final version of the congressional defense appropriations bill provided that the $83.8 million could be used for development of the Midas and Discoverer satellites and the long-range Minuteman missile as well as the Samos. Boeing Airplane Co. is prime contractor for the Minuteman; Lockheed Aircraft Corp. is developing all three satellites.

POLARIS SUBMARINE

The Pentagon will spend $312 million of the $382 million added by Congress to Mr. Eisenhower's request for Polaris missiles and Polaris-firing submarines. Mr. Gates indicated the administration will not need additional funds in developing a longer range Polaris missile—a project disclosed in the President's Monday message to Congress. The present 1,200-mile Polaris is produced by Lockheed and the submarine by Electric Boat division of General Dynamics, Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., and Navy shipyard.

NUCLEAR SUBMARINES

None of the $161 million added by Congress for construction of three additional nuclear-powered attack submarines will be spent by the administration. Mr. Eisenhower had asked for only enough money to build one additional nuclear sub.

AIRLIFT

An unspecified amount will be spent out of the $200 million added by Congress to the $120.4 million asked by the administration to buy troop transport and cargo planes. The additional money is earmarked for development of a new turboprop transport plane—either the C–130E designed by Lockheed or the CL–44 under development by Canadair division of General Dynamics.

ARMY MODERNIZATION

The Pentagon plans to spend about $28 million out of $158 million added by Congress for Army modernization to the nearly $1 billion asked by Mr. Eisenhower. Mr. Gates indicated the additional money would be used to speed production of a new Army tank.

VERBATIM EXCERPT FROM PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S PRESS CONFERENCE AUGUST 10, 1960

JACK BELL (AP). Mr. President, both party platforms promised, pledged an acceleration in defense and despite the steps you have taken in the last few days and those you have outlined, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON says that you still do not intend to spend $621 million of the money Congress has made available. Could you tell us why you decided against spending that money?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, can you tell me how you decided that his statement was correct?

JACK BELL. Sir, I didn't say that his statement was correct. I just said that Senator JOHNSON——

THE PRESIDENT. You asked me why I decided. Well, let's don't go that far.

JACK BELL. All right. If you——

THE PRESIDENT. I know of no reason for anyone to say that I have decided not to spend this money. But I'll tell you this—when you make changes in programs that remove from the budget some one and three-quarters billions of money and put back into it about $1.1 billion for other purposes, now there's a lot of study and tedious allocation and priorities to be settled and it's not done in a few weeks. It's a very difficult thing. And to say that this money has been frozen is—the proposition hasn't even been put before me in those terms at all, whatsoever.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have concluded my statement, and I yield to my delightful friend from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. The President has said that he knows of no freezing order so far as he is concerned. What the Senator has read and said indicates to me that the total amount has not yet been committed. If the Senator wishes to call the funds "frozen" while the plans are in the making for the final commitment of the funds, I suppose the Senator is entitled to do so. But the entire record that the Senator has read strongly suggests to me that there is no intent to evade the purposes of Congress, and that in due course the money will be committed. That is what I understand the statement to mean.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I appreciate obtaining the reaction of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Does not the Senator think that what I have said is a reasonable interpretation of the President's message?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not at all, for this reason. Obviously the Senator did not hear, or perhaps did not understand, all the statement I made.

First, so far as I know, the President has made no reference, as did the Senator from Connecticut, to the order suggesting that the agencies reserve all increases made by the Congress. I do not know that the President mentioned that at all. He merely said yesterday, as I understood it, that he did not know whether the statement was correct, and that it had never been put to him in this way.

On June 9, the Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum to all Secretaries, instructing them not to spend any funds appropriated by the Congress over the budget request, but to reserve the increases and carry them over to fiscal year 1962. We might call it impounding, freezing, or anything else we wish to call it, but the effect is the same—the funds are not to be programed, obligated, spent, or otherwise used during fiscal year 1961.

Mr. BUSH. But they already did commit some of the funds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Oh, yes. The Secretary of Defense has changed the Department of Defense financial plan since then. That is the point I make. I would like to reread the order:

If the Congress makes available more funds for fiscal year 1961 than are requested, and where the law does not require expenditure, agencies should reserve the increases and carry them forward to the maximum practical extent to fiscal year 1962.

On July 7, the Department of Defense financial plan called for reserving approximately $1.1 billion. The developments between the time the order was issued on June 9, and the time of the President's message, obviously dictated that approximately $476 million be unfrozen, as I have stated in my statement, and the President's message supports the statement.

The Department of Defense issued a new financial plan on August 9. This changed the amount that was reserved, unallocated, frozen, or withheld from $1,097 million to $621 million.

Mr. BUSH. Exactly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The $476 million that has been unfrozen will be used, I assume, to carry out the purposes stated in the President's message.

I hope that Secretary Gates will tell us how much of the $621 million, if any, he is going to use during fiscal year 1961. His present financial plan shows that he will use none of the $621 million during the current year. When he made his budget, his original plan showed he would use fully the entire $40.5 billion in new appropriations plus other funds available during fiscal year 1961. Then Congress increased the amount appropriated, and he issued instructions not to use the increases. He withheld $1.1 billion, which was to be carried over unused into fiscal year 1962, until Congress got back in session. Then he released or unfroze $476 million of the amount previously reserved. Some of these funds are still frozen, however, as the Department of Defense officials confirmed yesterday—and I quote from the Associated Press account of the briefing given by Department of Defense budget officials:

Defense Department officials confirmed yesterday Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON'S estimate that $621 million Congress voted for defense still is frozen and unused.

Mr. BUSH. May I ask the Senator this question: The Senator is a member of the Armed Services Committee, and recalls the Defense Reorganization Act of 1958. One of the provisions of that act, as I recall, was to give the Secretary of Defense a greater latitude in the use of funds committed to him by Congress, so that he is not compelled immediately to rush in and spend all the money that is given to him or commit it all, but he is actually privileged under that act, as I recall, to switch funds from one purpose to another if he thinks the national defense requires it. Is that not so?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, and under our terms——

Mr. BUSH. Is that not so?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, within the limits established by the Appropriations Acts.

Mr. BUSH. The intent of Congress as expressed in that bill was very important, it seems to me. I observe also the very important point the Senator is making, that the Secretary of Defense has been acting within the power given to him under the Defense Reorganization Act of 1958. Am I wrong in so observing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; and he could be acting under the authority given in the Appropriation Act itself to transfer funds from one purpose to another. The only point I make is that the President was not informed of the fact that $621 million of fiscal year 1961 funds are frozen, although the officials of the Defense Department had said the day before it was. The Defense Department issued an order that it be frozen, and I believe the country ought to know that.

What we are trying to ascertain is whether it is going to continue to be frozen or whether it will be released, and if it is released, when it will be released and for what purpose.

Mr. BUSH. It is not terribly surprising to me that the President would not know that there had been some delay in committing all that money. I do not think he has to be advised from day to day. He has confidence in the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, whom he appointed. It seems to me the record of the past 7 or 8 years justifies our having confidence in the President in matters of this kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not making any criticism of the President for his lack of information.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator seems to be slightly suggesting that he is out of order by not knowing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not at all. I merely make the point that he does not seem to know, and that my statement which was questioned yesterday, was and is correct. Obviously the Senator has not read the President's statement in that connection.

Mr. BUSH. I was interested in all the quotations from it, and I am making my comments largely on that basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am placing in the RECORD the President's statement in response to Mr. Bell.

Mr. BUSH. I read what the President said in his press conference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He said that——

Mr. BUSH. He said that he was not aware of any freezing order, and so forth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No, I do not think he referred to the order at all. I suspect that he is aware of the order, since the Department of Defense memorandum of June 9 refers to a Cabinet meeting as the original source. Therefore, I assume he must have had something to do with the order or it would not have been issued. What the Department of Defense did was to lay out a plan in January for using all the funds available during fiscal year 1961. It came before the Congress and got its appropriation. Congress increased that appropriation by $1¾ billion, and made various program reductions of about $1.1 billion. The result was a net increase of $661 million.

Mr. BUSH. It is about 1½ percent of the $40 billion appropriated in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not going into percentages.

Mr. BUSH. I should like to point out that it is a relatively small percentage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The January budget request involved a total of $40.5 billion, of which $39.3 billion was covered by the Department of Defense appropriation bill. Following the action of Congress adding in $661 million to the amount, and increasing the amount appropriated to $40 billion, the proper authorities in the Defense Department issued a revised financial plan based upon this appropriation bill and the military construction appropriation bill. This revised financial plan, which was issued on July 7, apparently was designed to carry out the instructions of the order to reserve the increases made by the Congress and to carry them over, unused, into fiscal year 1962. It was said, "We are going to reserve $1,097 million of it." That was on July 7.

On July 28 we wrote the Department and asked whether it was to continue under the order, to freeze the additional amounts provided by the Congress, or whether these funds would now be used. Secretary Gates' reply showed that $476 million had been unfrozen. I do not say it was improperly released; I do not say that with a bad connotation at all. I merely say it was a fact.

Mr. BUSH. What did the Department say? It said that already $500 million had been committed, did it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We received a lengthy reply which was very confusing, and which dodged the specific question altogether of whether the guidance issued on June 9 had since been rescinded or repudiated. But a study of all the statistical data submitted showed that the Department was releasing $476 million, and that the new plan was still to keep frozen $621 million. The $476 million was released apparently for the purposes stated in the President's message.

We asked the Secretary of Defense on August 2 to give us his specific recommendations as to any additional amounts which could be effectively used during 1961 for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense.

The letter is still unanswered. It has been made available to Congress. When the reply is received, it will be put in the RECORD, as has the letter.

The only point I wish to make is that Congress has appropriated a total of approximately $41 billion. The original Department of Defense financial plan contemplated that there would be no funds reserved or frozen during fiscal year 1961 and carried over into fiscal year 1962. The first revised plan contemplated reserving $1.1 billion of the funds available. The second revised plan reserves and impounds $621 million. That is the statement I have made. That is the fact. That fact is confirmed.

Mr. BUSH. I get a good deal of comfort out of the Senator's analysis. It shows that in the Defense Department they are using some flexibility, the kind of flexibility we intended them to have under the Defense Reorganization Act of 1958. I think it is very reassuring to know that. I am glad the Senator has brought up this point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator gets comfort out of it, I am pleased. I merely wish to have the RECORD show the facts; that is all.

Mr. BUSH. Certainly no Senator could be more solicitous of the national safety than my respected friend from Texas, the majority leader. I heartily respect his interest in that field. However, I hope that in his comments this morning he is not suggesting that we make a plan without regard to changing times. I would also like to say that I get some comfort from the fact that we have in reserve, for allocation as situations develop, as much as $600 million, out of a total budget of $40 billion in the Defense Department.

I recall very well the debate in committee on the Defense Reorganization Act of 1958. We had a great deal of testimony on it. One of the two or three important points which emerged from the testimony was the lack of flexibility in the Defense Department in connection with the disposition of funds.

Therefore, I believe the Senator from Texas has done us a service in pointing out that the Defense Department is using wisely—I hope wisely—the authority Congress gave it in the Defense Reorganization Act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no final disagreement with the Senator. I appreciate his comments. I should like to observe, however, that the amount being reserved, or impounded, or frozen, or withheld—whatever word we wish to use—is approximately the amount Congress placed in the bill in excess of the budget estimate. It seems to comply with the order issued on June 9 to carry the congressional increases forward to 1962.

Mr. BUSH. That is an interesting coincidence.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The only point I wish to make is that this is being done. That is what I want the people to know. Up until a few days ago, $1.1 billion was being reserved. However, $476 million was released, the President said, because of developments. The $621 million is still being withheld. It may very well be that it will be unfrozen down the road. However, that is roughly the net amount Congress, in its wisdom, put in the Department of Defense appropriation bill in excess of the budget requests.

Mr. BUSH. That is an interesting coincidence that the Senator points out.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut is absolutely correct. What is forgotten and what did not receive emphasis in the colloquy this morning are two words that put things in an entirely different light. The message from the Defense Department said that they should defer the 1962 reserve to the maximum practical extent. That is where the emphasis belongs. When the message came up to Congress, what did the President talk about? Further modernization, increased emphasis on Polaris, the addition of two carriers to the fleet, getting out some additional B–47's.

This is a constantly fluid situation. There is nothing static about it. There cannot be. When we talk about "freezing" funds, we are using an entirely mistaken erroneous word in its application here, because if the Defense Department does not husband some funds, as they assess the fevers and the needs everywhere in the world, they could almost be charged with some kind of dereliction of duty in that they did not take account of the situations that arise.

From time to time we have had emphasis placed over and over again on the fact that we must be ready for some quick development, some brush fire, some marginal conflict. In addition thereto, we must be constantly alert to the fact that we continue with our modernization and our weapons systems. I thought the President laid that point out pretty well in his message to Congress. We can never stay in a static situation. So, when they said, "You defer to the maximum practical extent," that means one thing today, but an entirely different thing tomorrow, depending entirely upon developments. That is where the emphasis should be placed.

I fully concur in the sentiments expressed by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that the Defense Department is alert under the Defense Reorganization Act to the needs and the new integrations and the new weapons systems—all the things that are conducive to a powerful defense.

Mr JOHNSON of Texas. I have no disagreement with what the Senator has said, except that I should like to have the RECORD show that if they now have $621 million in reserve, presently unallocated, no such reserve was contemplated or requested in the plans originally submitted to the Congress. Therefore, if they have $621 million to draw upon, that is because the Congress, in its wisdom, supplied approximately that amount in excess of the budget request, and presumably that is being withheld in accordance with the order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It must be remembered always that when we talk about using funds, we do not go to a five and dime store to buy national defense. The word "use" was employed this morning in the colloquy. It implies the planning that is necessary for preserving a balanced defense, and a decision as to how much goes here and how much goes there, and how much goes in another place. Funds are not used overnight. We have had lengthy discussions about leadtime, and lag. Those are things that occur in procurement.

If $476 million has already been earmarked, well and good. Certainly they are alert to the situation that obtains in the world. With respect to the other funds, if the cold war continues, if it gets a little hotter, or the fog gets a little thicker, perhaps there will be more thawing, or if the cold war gets a little colder, maybe there will be a little more unthawing. Therefore, if we are going to deal in thermostatic values—freeze, unfreeze, thaw, unthaw, cold war, hot war—let us use the same dynamic terminology with respect to the employment of these funds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to make an observation. I am fearful that my delightful friend does not understand this picture at all. Admittedly, there is——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know whether that was a compliment or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think it is a compliment. I hope the Senator will follow me in what I am about to say. I think he will understand the picture then.

Entirely separate from the $621 million that has been placed in reserve and is planned to be carried over into fiscal year 1962 the Department of Defense has apportioned almost a billion dollars, but has been told that the Department is not to use it. If the Senator will permit, I should like to place in the RECORD a brief paragraph about that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is that what they said?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes, if you know how to interpret the Department of Defense reply.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That the Department should not use it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to see that language.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. All right.

Admittedly, some time may be needed to make specific program decisions. However, this is not a justification for the $621,302,000 which is now frozen and is not planned to be used during fiscal year 1961. Rather, this is the reason the Pentagon gives for the fact that $978,749,000 has been apportioned to the military departments, but cannot be used by them now since the items involved are undergoing further review. In other words, the Department of Defense has completely frozen $621,302,000. In addition, $978,749,000 for various unspecified programs has, in effect, been placed in escrow and the military services cannot proceed to place contracts until the individual items are specifically released, after completion of current reviews, presumably by the Secretary of Defense and Bureau of the Budget.

I make no criticism of that. I am simply trying to inform the Senator. That is a billion dollars that I have not previously talked about at all. That has been allocated to them. But they were told, "You cannot use it because the program or item in question is undergoing further review as to the wisdom of it." I do not question the wisdom of that order. I am trying to be informative. That involves $978,749,000. However, the explanation of why all the Defense Department funds are not released for use immediately pertains to this amount, and has no relevance to the $621 million which under current Defense Department plans, is not expected to be used during fiscal year 1961.

I asked the Secretary, in my letter of July 28, for a statistical summary of the amounts available for apportionment and the amounts apportioned to date. I also requested that an explanation be given of all amounts placed in reserve or not fully released for obligation or commitment. In reply, here is what the Secretary's letter said:

> With respect to the funds not yet apportioned and the items "apportioned but undergoing review," I am sure you appreciate that not all service programs are ready to go forward at the time the bill is enacted into law. For many reasons—technical difficulties, changes in concepts, lack of definitive plans—additional time is frequently required in order to assure the development of valid programs. As a matter of good business practice, we must assure that the requirement is still valid in the light of present circumstances, and that all significant aspects of the program have been properly worked out before the funds are released.

That pertains to the question of the Senator from Illinois concerning the explanation of the amounts placed in reserve or not to be released for obligations or commitments. That is the total of $978,749,000. These amounts have been apportioned, but are being held for further review until, as they say, the individual programs can be given further consideration. That is not the item I am talking about. I am talking about the $621 million which, apparently, is being carried over for another year without any current plan for it to be used during fiscal year 1961.

I hope the Secretary of Defense will reply that it will be carried over or that it is not to be carried over, or at least will tell us what the plans are. His original plan called for the full use for approved programs of every dollar in the budget. The second plan called for reserving $1.1 billion. His third plan called for reserving $621 million. We are simply trying to ascertain what his present plan is.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why not read the language?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have read it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will abide by the regular order. I am only too glad to conclude.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have read the exact paragraph in the Secretary's letter which is pertinent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I read the words about deferring the reserve to the practical maximum extent. I will follow this up in a further discussion, later. I yield the floor.

SEVENTY-ONE-YEAR-OLD COUPLE ON SOCIAL SECURITY CAN AFFORD NOTHING FOR MEDICAL CARE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, every day, without exception, since May 18 while the U.S. Senate has been in session I have called the attention of my Senate colleagues to the need of America's elderly for a Federal program of health insurance.

I did this by speaking out on the Senate floor in a brief speech and then inserting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—so all the Senators could read them—letters from Wisconsin people telling on the basis of their own experience why they wanted the U.S. Senate to act to provide a program of health insurance for the aged.

I have another such letter today, Mr. President, from two of Wisconsin's elder citizens, which tells, plainer than any statistics can, how they cannot possibly afford medical care with their present social security payments. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> DEAR SENATOR: My wife and I are both 71 years old. We were farmers and are still living on the farm now. Three years ago, we had to let all our help go because we couldn't afford to pay their wages. We couldn't farm it alone, either, so we went on social security.
> We have our taxes, farm insurance, and car insurance to pay. We each have a small insurance policy and a sickness and accident policy, but they don't pay much because we went on them so long ago.
> We still drive our 1950 car, but we don't take trips or vacations with it. We just drive to town and back for groceries. We pay out about $500 a year.
> Just take a pen and figure out how much there is left in $115 a month for our high line, telephone, food and grocery bills. It doesn't even cover the bare necessities. And we are sure you know what hospitals and doctors charge now, let alone druggists. There is positively nothing left for sickness.
> If you want to help anyone, the majority of us folks on social security are the ones that need it most.

A DECISIVE FISCAL VICTORY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in my opinion, the discussion this morning is symptomatic to what will follow in the days ahead, until the campaign is over. During the campaign, we will hear much about fiscal policies and a great many other things. What I am interested in is to get the light out to the people. Will the people understand what it is all about? Will they comprehend what the real issues are?

Basically, the arguments focus around the questions: Is money "to tight?" Or is money "too loose," so as to be inflationary? Are we living within our means?

We have just been told that we have a billion dollar surplus. The taxpayers should take great satisfaction in that accomplishment, if they understand what the word "surplus" means.

We recognize, of course, that $1 billion, in comparison with the national debt, or even with our national expenditures, is not overwhelming. However, the budgetary story needs to be put in perspective. Actually, the surplus represents a great jump from the $12 billion deficit in 1959 to a $1 billion surplus in 1960.

Within such a surplus budget, the Nation has been able to move forward on the domestic front and to maintain and strengthen our defense, as well. The proponents of the easy money policy, with its inflationary effects, may not, of course, find this accomplishment too heartening.

Realistically, we recognize that progress cannot be measured in dollars alone. However, the fact that we have been able to move forward on all fronts and, at the same time, to be fiscally responsible, illustrates that it can be done.

I was very much interested to read an article published in the Wall Street Journal yesterday which stated that all the States of the Union have surpluses, starting with New York, whose surplus is almost half a billion dollars, and going down through the other States. So we are living in a time when fiscal responsibility, is at least, coming back into contemplation.

Recently the New York Times published an editorial entitled "A Decisive Fiscal Victory." The editorial commented upon the administration's courageous, realistic efforts to hold down inflation, keep our economy moving ahead, provide for security, and, at the same time, adhere to a program of fiscal responsibility. We have had some discussion this morning about the issue of security. We are living in a changeable and changing world. What are the facts today will not be the facts tomorrow. It is necessary for us to be on our toes so as to be ready for any contingency. That is why it is necessary to set aside some of these funds.

After all, why do we have an executive department? Simply to have it take orders from the legislative branch, or vice versa? Of course not. Under our form of government each branch is separate and distinct in its form of action. So we are going to add to our program of fiscal responsibility.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial entitled "A Decisive Fiscal Victory," published in the New York Times of July 22, 1960, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, July 22, 1960]

A DECISIVE FISCAL VICTORY

The final result of the Federal budget for the year 1960—year ended June 30 last—shows that the Government has not only finished the year in the black but has achieved a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $1,068 million.

In terms of size alone this surplus is not especially spectacular. As a matter of fact, it is the smallest of three recorded in the past 7 years by the present administration. What makes it impressive is the dramatic reversal that it represents over the Government's fiscal position within the period of a single year. The 1959 budget showed a deficit of $12.4 billion, the largest in the Nation's entire peacetime history. In moving from that position to a surplus of $1,068 million the Government has, in short, improved the state of the national account by upward of $13.4 billion.

This accomplishment is basically the story of President Eisenhower's conviction of the essential soundness of a balanced budget under normal conditions and his determination once the argument for temporary financing—the recessions of 1957–58—had ceased to obtain that we should move as speedily as possible toward restoring our fiscal affairs to a sound basis. He hammered away at this theme in his budget message of January, 1959, and in the number of other messages he delivered to Congress at that time and thereafter.

It required strong convictions on Mr. Eisenhower's part and a great deal of courage. Many of the newly elected Democratic Members of Congress had come to Washington prepared to introduce newer and bigger spending plans without compensatory taxation. However, once the President had drawn the issues clearly between a balancing of the budget and a continuance of the spending policies, even though the recession had been overcome, public support rallied quickly and emphatically to his side. And it is to the credit of the conservative wing of the Democratic Party that it recognized this fact and joined forces with its Republican colleagues in supporting the proposed return to a sound budget.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall not object to this immediate request, but hereafter I shall be on the floor during this session of the Senate to insist on the regular order during the morning hour. There is important business to be transacted at this session; and if we are to have 2 hours of political bantering every day, it will be more difficult to attain our goal. So after today I shall insist on the regular order during the morning hour.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Tennessee. He has always been very courteous. He must admit, though, that it is not very often that I ask for additional time. I thought the issue, in view of the discussion this morning, called for the very comment I am about to bring into the picture. This is what I want to read:

It required strong convictions on Mr. Eisenhower's part and a great deal of courage. Many of the newly elected Democratic Members of Congress had come to Washington prepared to introduce newer and bigger spending plans without compensatory taxation. However, once the President had drawn the issues clearly between a balancing of the budget and a continuance of the spending policies, even though the recession had been overcome, public support rallied quickly and emphatically to his side. And it is to the credit of the conservative wing of the Democratic Party that it recognized this fact and joined forces with its Republican colleagues in supporting the proposed return to a sound budget.

Mr. President, the entire editorial should be studied by all Senators. I trust that if we go ahead and do the things which it is contemplated to do, we also will have the intestinal fortitude to make certain that we will raise the taxes to take care of those problems.

SENATE PROCEDURE AND PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] for the statement he made a few minutes ago about enforcing the 3-minute rule. I believe he is entirely correct.

Within the limitations of that rule, I wish to say a few words about the rules of the Senate. In my judgment the session so far has shown rather clearly the need for drastic revisions of the rules of the Senate next January, if we are to accomplish the program of the next President expeditiously and with due consideration.

Next week I intend to submit in the Senate, for appropriate reference to the Committee on Rules and Administration, a resolution proposing changes in the Senate rules. The proposed changes are intended to permit the Senate to expedite its business without unduly limiting debate, and are also intended to comply with the platform plank of the Democratic Party to enable the majority to work its will after appropriate debate.

Those changes in the rules will incorporate a rule of germaneness and a rule which will provide a counterpart to a motion to table by authorizing the moving of the previous question—a provision which was in the Senate rules in the early days of the Republic. The proposed changes of the rules will also permit Senate committees to meet when the Senate is in session, and will permit a majority of a committee to call a meeting at any time and require a vote on a pending measure after due debate, and also will change the present practice—although not well established procedure—with respect to conference committees.

I now give this notice, in the hope that my colleagues will be giving equally careful consideration to necessary changes in the rules.

In conclusion, I point out that, in my judgment, next January we may not be able to legislate by unanimous consent, and that unanimous-consent agreements have been about the only means by which we have been able to accomplish most of what has been accomplished during the first two sessions of the 86th Congress.

HOUSE BILL PLACED ON CALENDAR

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the bill (H.R. 12677) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of interstate retail enterprises, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.15 an hour, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and placed on the calendar.

WE CANNOT ADJOURN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, in commenting about this special session, one thought has been repeated over and over again in the press, here on the floor, and in letters which I and many other Members have received. All are agreed on the need for constructive action by the Congress during this session.

The President, in his message to us, expressed this thought better than any one when he said, "We cannot adjourn the public interest."

The New York Times, in an editorial published this morning, solidly backed the President's admonition that we must avoid "politicking" and get down to and stay at the Nation's business. The Times points out, in particular, that in the field of foreign policy, our presidential campaign cannot mean a hiatus from serious work. The Russians are not napping, and would like nothing better than to have Americans lulled to sleep.

This special session need not be a hasty session. There is no justification for trampling upon important legislative proposals in a mad rush to hit the campaign trail. I agree that the Antarctic Treaty ratification and minimum wage legislation and other measures which have been mentioned here are important subjects; but I challenge the contention that these and other topics on the majority leader's select list are the only basic issues confronting the Nation.

It has now been demonstrated that the majority party in this Chamber does not consider the need for new civil rights legislation basic enough even to permit a moment's discussion of a moderate two-point administration bill. There are alarming indications that the same treatment may be accorded to the administration's depressed areas bill, since it has never been included on the select list. And the critical need for judgeship legislation, which most seriously affects those of modest incomes has been brushed aside with the suggestion that this involves patronage problems and can wait until next January.

Mr. President, I hope that we shall take to heart President Eisenhower's plea for more action and less talk in meeting the needs of the American people during this special session. I, for one, agree with the New York Times that we spend too much time politicking now; and I would add that too much time was spent politicking during the first part of this session, which is the reason why this special session was unnecessarily brought about. I certainly would not adjourn this session prematurely just so the whistlestop trains can start on time.

For myself, I am perfectly willing to remain in Washington well into September or for as long as may be necessary in order to enact the critical measures of such vital importance to the welfare and the future of America that have been delineated in the President's message to us.

Mr. President, I heartily agree with the sentiments expressed by the editors of the Times, and ask unanimous consent that the editorial to which I referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 11, 1960]

CONGRESS AND THE COLD WAR

Following up his special message President Eisenhower has again called on Congress to stay on the job until it has enacted the legislative program he has set before it instead of going home to mend political fences in the election campaign. The Nation's business, he declares, is more important than politicking, and that goes, of course, for both parties.

The President's admonition is especially pertinent at this time of an intensified cold war when it is essential for the good of this Nation and the whole free world to demonstrate that our presidential elections do not paralyze our Government, as our enemies hope and our friends fear. Secretary Herter has already warned the Soviets not to bank on such a paralysis, or to misjudge our ability to "move with speed, force and unity" in matters of foreign policy and defense despite the campaign. It is up to Congress not only to back up this warning by passing necessary measures and appropriations dealing with foreign affairs and defense but also to demonstrate like capacities in the domestic field to bolster our economic and spiritual strength.

Certainly, with the whole world watching everything we do or do not do in these critical times, neither our presidential campaign nor the congressional session can be conducted any longer in a vacuum or in national isolation. And if a longer congressional session also helps to shorten the unconscionably long election campaign that is a survival of the covered-wagon era and often leads to reckless partisan pronouncements, it will provide an additional reason for gratitude.

Unfortunately there is little indication thus far that Congress is ready to heed the President's exhortation. On the contrary, it appears to be settling down to politicking of its own and to make its session part of the campaign.

U.S. DEFENSE POSITION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I know that we in the Senate and the American people generally can take great pleasure and pride in the progress of the important U.S. defense programs. The successful firing by the atomic submarine George Washington, while fully submerged, of two Polaris missiles was a milestone of weapons development. Hitting targets 1,200 miles away with a remarkable accuracy, the Polaris missiles have blasted a big hole in the arguments of those who think Russia is ahead of the United States in strategic thinking and weapon development.

The success of the Polaris firings, which were carried out on schedule by the Navy's devoted Rear Adm. William F. Raborn, Jr., should make it clear that the present administration has assiduously and successfully been serving the defense needs of our country. By the mid 1960's, the Navy plans to have 45 atomic submarines, carrying a total of 720 Polaris missiles, operating in all the oceans of the world. They will be a constant reminder that the United States is and will continue to be second to none in its military defense.

The progress on the Polaris has also opened the way to gradual shiftover in the whole concept of a nuclear deterrent. Soon we shall not have to rely on oversea bases in countries which are becoming increasingly sensitive to Khrushchev's threats. Our deterrent force will be scattered over the world, invisible to our enemies, yet ready to launch an atomic bombardment at a moment's notice.

Meanwhile, the Army has not been idle, either. Details of a new unmanned spy plane which can report on activities behind enemy lines have been announced. Jet powered, the remote-controlled plane may eventually be able to fly as far as 200 miles behind enemy lines to record information on sensitive and complex instruments. Although it has been developed principally as a weapon to be used on a battlefield, there are clearly other peacetime functions which it can perform in areas where Communists have relied on guerrilla activities to disrupt the peace and sovereign independence of non-Communist states.

We can congratulate the scientists, technicians, and devoted workers of all sorts who have contributed to the present strength and the future promise of the U.S. Military Establishment. At the same time, we must not forget that the Soviet Union is also making a great effort in this field. There have even been rumors that the Soviets have been experimenting with a brandnew antisubmarine weapon, as well as with undersea missiles of their own. It has, in fact, been suggested that one reason for the piratical Soviet shooting down of our RB–47 over the Barents Sea was that during their flight our fliers might have learned about the Soviet tests.

Let us, then, take pride in the great breakthrough that has been made by the Polaris missile and in the potentialities that the Army's new weapon suggests. But let us not relax in our efforts. The Republican Party has promised this country a defense second to none. The Democratic Party has also indicated that this time it will not neglect the military power that we must have to hold communism in check. Both of these pledges must be meant and taken seriously. Today we are secure from the danger of an open Communist attack. Let us make sure that we are equally safe in the future.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, last April I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a complete account of the marvelous feat of a Strategic Air Command crew who flew from Eglin Airbase, Fla., over the North Pole and back to Cape Canaveral, Fla., where missile armament was fired.

This 22-hour nonstop flight and the successful launching of a Hound Dog supersonic missile over the Atlantic range clearly demonstrated my longstanding conviction that the most effective striking power the United States can attain immediately is the B–52G and its successor, the B–52H, with missile armament.

I say longstanding conviction because many of my colleagues will recall that 2 years ago, through my efforts, an extra wing of B–52's, at a cost of $108 million, was given approval, but, unfortunately, was canceled in conference.

To substantiate further my confidence relative to the B–52, and especially its effectiveness when coupled with the Hound Dog missile, I would like to read in its entirety a brief news release issued by the Department of the Air Force on August 2, 1960:

NEWS RELEASE

An Air Force Hound Dog supersonic air-to-ground guided missile flew about 500 statute miles last night down the Atlantic Missile Range in one of the most successful tests to date.

The Hound Dog was launched at 10 p.m., e.d.t. from a B–52 flying at high altitude near Cape Canaveral, Fla. Preliminary telemetry data shows the missile impacted in the ocean area with extreme accuracy.

Hound Dog is a 42-foot 6-inch missile being built by North American Aviation to extend the operation range of the B–52 eight-jet bomber by more than 500 miles. Hound Dog can be armed with a nuclear warhead. It is now operational in the Strategic Air Command, and little more than a year from its first successful test firing over the Atlantic Missile Range in April 1959.

Once again I am asking that provision be made for the manufacture of additional B–52's in order that our Nation may be able to maintain an effective airborne alert and also have a substantial reserve of these powerful bombers.

It is common knowledge that the Russians are giving top priority to manned interceptor systems, and this is indicative that the Soviet Government fears our manned bombers more than it does our future ICBM's.

This recent SAC mission of more than 10,800 miles with a successful missile launching is further proof of the capabilities of this particular weapon-equipped bomber.

Just a few days ago I was briefed by the Air Force relative to operations of the Strategic Air Command.

While this information is restricted, it is a matter of record that there are only about 40 B–52's about to be ordered, carrying production into 1962. However, the program will end then if the fiscal 1962 budget does not contain funds for more of them.

If there is any intention of replacing the B–52 with the B–70, it would seem to be that our Nation cannot afford to shut down the only heavy bomber production line in existence until the replacement is assured. Operationally, I am informed, the B–70 is several years away, and until it has been developed and proved, the only intercontinental bomber available with the proven capability of providing a mobile platform for firing missiles is the B–52.

It will be our real deterrent force for years to come; and if fate were to dictate that the B–70 later were to be canceled, the United States would find itself in the position of having no facility in the country actually in production or capable of rapidly moving into production on any long-range bomber-missile platform.

As I have stated many times previously, I would rather have one proven weapon defending our country than all the modern weapons which still are at the drawing board stage.

There has been considerable talk by members of both parties relative to an increase in the amount of money being spent for defense and for an immediate added appropriation.

Should this talk materialize into reality, I am asking that when such funds are made available, a goodly portion of them be set aside for manufacture of the B–52H, which, I might add, is produced in my home city of Wichita, Kans.

Finally, I say if we are to spend more money for defense, let us spend it wisely and sensibly.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, on July 27 this year, the Republican Party meeting in convention in Chicago adopted its platform for building a better America. In my judgment, this is the most forward-looking, humanitarian, yet realistic, platform ever agreed upon by our party. I am proud of the platform and proud of my party for its wisdom and vision.

Because in our times we as a Nation face many complex problems ranging the full spectrum of human endeavor, a platform to be specific necessarily extends for thousands of words. The 1960 Republican platform contains an estimated 11,000 words.

If one were to distill the very essence of the Republican platform, it could be reduced to 99 words. In an effort to be helpful, I offer an abbreviated platform, as follows:

ELEVEN-THOUSAND-WORD REPUBLICAN PLATFORM REDUCED TO NINETY-NINE WORDS

We pledge to:

Spread freedom throughout the globe; strengthen friendly nations.

Fight communism at home and abroad.

Maintain defense forces and space programs second to none.

Maintain scientific and technological superiority.

Assure every American his full constitutional rights.

Meet human needs of the American people beyond their own, or their State's, capacity to meet them.

Assure every child an education; improve schools.

Promote economic growth without inflation.

Assure food and fiber for our people and a fair return to producers.

Develop and use wisely our natural resources.

Guard the public interest against special interests.

MOTHER RAPHAEL McCARTHY CELEBRATES GOLDEN JUBILEE

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, an important recognition is taking place in South Dakota today—August 11, 1960—to commemorate 50 years of constructive service by Mother Mary Raphael McCarthy, former superior general of the Presentation Sisters. Mother Raphael entered her profession as a religious worker in 1910 and most of her distinguished service has taken place in South Dakota where she still resides in Aberdeen. Today she is recognized as one of South Dakota's outstanding and renowned citizens. I am happy to consider her as a valued and esteemed personal friend.

The Bishop's Bulletin for August, the official publication of the diocese of Sioux Falls, carries a most interesting and informative review of Mother Raphael's life of constructive service and it is with pleasure that I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD this inspiring report.

There being no objection, the review was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOTHER RAPHAEL TO CELEBRATE GOLDEN JUBILEE

The Most Reverend L. A. Hoch, D.D., bishop of Sioux Falls, will offer a Pontifical High Mass at Presentation Sisters Convent, Presentation Heights, Aberdeen, on August 11, 1960, to commemorate the golden jubilee of Mother Mary Raphael, Sister M. Rose, and Sister M. Bernardine.

Mother Mary Raphael McCarthy, former superior general of the Presentation Sisters, has given the greater part of her life to the service of God in the diocese of Sioux Falls. She came to South Dakota in 1907 from Ireland where she had been born and reared in County Cork. Her profession as a religious was made in 1910 and one of her first assignments was to St. Peter School in Jefferson. Serious illness necessitated a period of recuperation and her superiors sent her to Holy Rosary Hospital, Miles City, Mont. Thus was Mother Raphael's introduction to the life of a sister in a hospital.

Recovered from illness, Mother Raphael pursued the studies of a nurse, and took up her duties at St. Luke Hospital in Aberdeen. In 1923 she became superior administrator of St. Joseph Hospital, Mitchell, and in 1927, was transferred to McKennan Hospital, Sioux Falls, to serve as superior administrator of that institution. In 1931 she arranged for the construction of the new chapel at the hospital.

The sisters elected Mother Raphael to be the assistant superior of the community in 1928. Upon the death of Mother Mary Aloysius in 1932, she completed the unexpired term according to the provisions of the constitution of the congregation. She was elected to the office of superior general in 1934 and re-elected in 1940.

GREAT BUILDER

One of the first major problems which confronted the new superior was to find a home for the children from the razed orphanage in Turton. Temporarily Mother Raphael sought refuge for them in Graham Hall at Northern State Teachers College in Aberdeen. Prompt consultation with the bishop and clergy secured subsequent housing at St. Joseph School, Woonsocket, and at the former Columbus College Building in Sioux Falls. Negotiations for the present location were made with the diocese, the government and the city of Sioux Falls and the new abode was named Presentation Children's Home.

Under her direction, schools were opened in Willmar, Anoka and Mound, Minn. Mother was instrumental in encouraging the Presentation Sisters to continue their education and secure their teaching degrees in order that they be well qualified to conduct their assigned classes.

The necessity of additional beds for patients at St. Luke Hospital in Aberdeen was the next challenge Mother Raphael faced. Her keen business sense prompted her to purchase the former Lincoln Hospital and to have this four and one-half story, brick and reinforced concrete structure moved 11 blocks to its present location as Medical Annex. The bed capacity was 85.

A larger chapel was a dire need to accommodate the increasing number of Sisters and under her supervision Blessed Sacrament Chapel was erected in 1937. Mother Raphael also approved the erection of a new chapel at St. Joseph Hospital in Mitchell.

PRESENTATION HEIGHTS

During the later years of her office as superior general, the membership of the congregation presented an acute housing problem. Anticipating the present structure on Presentation Heights she purchased the site in 1944. At the completion of her term as superior general, she was elected to the office of bursar general of the congregation and her assignment was to St. Joseph Hospital, Mitchell, as superior-administrator, a position she held until 1952. While in Mitchell she supervised an addition to the hospital which provided a new pediatric department and additional bed capacity.

The Presentation Sisters, then under the leadership of Mother Mary Viator, recognized the fund of knowledge and experience of Mother Mary Raphael and, in addition to being reelected bursar of the congregation, Mother was recalled to Aberdeen to assist in the building program for the new Motherhouse.

In 1958 Mother Mary Raphael was appointed superior administrator of Holy Rosary Hospital, Miles City, Mont. There she was faced with financial hazards which she resolved with the assistance of the good will of citizens of Miles City. It is coincidental that the golden jubilee of the hospital was celebrated during the same year that Mother Mary Raphael commemorates her 50 years in God's service.

The hospital jubilee was observed on July 14. At that time a bronze plaque was presented to Mother Mary Raphael by the president of the chamber of commerce, George Fry, in recognition of the 50 years of devoted service rendered by the Presentation Sisters to the sick and injured of southeastern Montana.

The ideals of Mother Mary Raphael were emulated by her sisters. The moral efforts and the example of a soul striving for perfection developed in her Sisters, greater capabilities of appreciation of what a human character should be. The Sisters as well as the laity congratulate Mother Mary Raphael on the completion of her many undertakings during her 50 years in His service.

Congratulations are also extended to Sister Mary Rose and Sister Mary Bernardine. Sister Mary Rose McCormick is a native of South Dakota. She was born in Woonsocket where she spent her early years. After her graduation from St. Luke Hospital in 1912, Sister Mary Rose served in Holy Rosary Hospital, Miles City, Mont., as surgical supervisor for many years. She completed a course in anesthesia in 1925 and since that time has been chief anesthetist in McKennan, St. Joseph, and Holy Rosary Hospitals. Sister Mary Rose established a school of anesthesia in St. Luke Hospital in 1952.

Sister Mary Bernardine was born in Stuartville, Minn., and after her profession was assigned to Notre Dame Academy to teach a course in homemaking. In 1922 Sister was transferred to St. Luke Hospital where she was chief dietitian until 1956. At that time Sister was assigned duties at Presentation Motherhouse, where she is at the present time.

TRIBUTE TO LELAND OLDS

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, a great American passed away last week.

Leland Olds, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission in the 1940's, and a tireless worker to assure this Nation abundant, low-cost energy for economic expansion, died last Wednesday after a distinguished career.

Later I shall make further comment on the passing of this great individual. I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an account of his death and tribute distributed by the American Public Power Association.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEART ATTACK FATAL TO LELAND OLDS

Leland Olds died in Washington this week after suffering a heart attack. He was 69.

A former Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, Mr. Olds for the past 7 years has been director of Energy Research Associates, offering consulting services to many public power systems, rural electric cooperatives and others.

Mr. Olds visualized the power industry of the future as based on a high use, low unit cost philosophy, with giant power grid systems tying together the thermal, hydro, and atomic powerplants of the future in the most economical way.

He discussed his low-rate philosophy in a talk to the APPA annual convention in Seattle, Wash., in 1959. A year earlier, he addressed the APPA New Orleans convention on "An Approach to Giant Power Legislation."

The most highly regarded study of our Nation's water resources to be produced in recent years came in large measure from the pen of Mr. Olds, who was Commissioner in charge of studies for the President's Water Resources Policy Commission. The Commission's two-volume report, "A Water Policy for the American People," and "Ten Rivers in America's Future," published in 1952, has become a classic in the field of natural resource planning.

A native of Rochester, N.Y., Mr. Olds was graduated from Amherst University in 1912 and studied at Harvard and Columbia Universities. He entered the power and resources field in 1939, when he became assistant to the chairman and executive secretary of the Power Authority of the State of New York. He held this post until President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed him to the Federal Power Commission in 1939.

CHAMPION OF EFFECTIVE REGULATION

Mr. Olds' devotion to the principle of regulation of the electric and gas industries as a member and later Chairman (1940–46) of the FPC created hostility among many leaders of those industries and in 1949, when he was reappointed by President Truman, the Senate refused to confirm the nomination.

President Truman then named him to the Water Resources Commission and later Mr. Olds was representative of the Secretary of the Interior on the New England-New York Interagency Committee.

He served on many policymaking committees in a number of fields. His resources activities included service as vice chairman of the National Power Policy Committee (1939–44), chairman of the United States St. Lawrence Advisory Committee (1940–49), member of the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee (1940–47), and member of the Water Resources Committee and Energy Resources Committee of the National Resources Board (1939–43).

President Truman, in supporting Mr. Olds' nomination to a new term on the FPC, declared that he was "a nationally recognized champion of effective utility regulation * * * he has labored diligently in the service of all the people and has earnestly sought to protect the public against the narrow interests of special groups." Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY yesterday credited Mr. Olds with much of the planning and work on many great water and resource development projects. "In a sense, these developments, such as the St. Lawrence Waterway and power projects, are a permanent memorial to him. He had the vision and the energy to establish the foundation for the giant power system that will soon be serving America."

Mr. Olds is survived by his wife, Maude, two sons, and two daughters.

RESEEDING AND REFENCING OF BURNED-OVER LANDS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, for some weeks the newspapers have been calling our attention to one world crisis after another. The result, I think, is that some of our domestic crises have not received adequate attention by the Senate. In the Western States, some of the worst forest and range fires in history have been raging. Some of our top conservationists advised me this morning that the fires have been probably the worst our country has experienced in the last 50 years. Thousands of acres of wooded land and rangeland have been burned completely. Not only have the fires burned the timber in the Federal forests; they have burned up the fences which are so important, under the Grazing Act, to carrying out grazing policies.

I testified this afternoon before the Senate Committee on Appropriations in support of a supplemental appropriation of $1,500,000 to reseed those lands now, because many conservation experts tell us that the seed ought to be planted now, while the ash is on the ground, because the ash itself is a great help to the seeds taking root; and planting now before weeds take over is a more economical procedure. Also, the fences need to be rebuilt in order to make the grazing lands available for livestock grazing.

Because I think the statement I made in the Committee on Appropriations this afternoon sets forth the statistical material which each Member of the Senate ought to have available to him concerning the extent of the fire crisis which has raged in the West, and is still going on, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WAYNE MORSE BEFORE THE SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE, AUGUST 11, 1960

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I wish to thank you for according me the courtesy of appearing before you to urge your favorable consideration of a supplemental appropriation for the Bureau of Land Management in the amount of $1.5 million to enable the burned-over lands of the Western States to be reseeded and refenced.

Truly the situation, gentlemen, is a critical one. It is my understanding that as of today over 100,000 acres of Oregon have been ravished by fire, out of the 250,000 acres in the Western States. The situation is still critical according to the latest information I have been given. I understand that the O. & C. land area is now closed to all logging operations except for the midnight to 8 a.m. shift. It may very well be that the Governor of the State may be forced to close all of Oregon to logging.

The situation was brought to my attention by responsible constituents. Among them is one which I would like to call especially to the attention of the committee, Mr. Cecil L. Edwards, executive secretary of the Oregon Cattlemen's Association. Mr. Edwards telegraphed me on behalf of his association on August 8, as follows:

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Chairman, Oregon Congressional Delegation, Washington, D.C.:

You doubtless noted newspaper reports of destructive range fires that Oregon has experienced this season. Some authorities say worst in 30 years. Officers of the Oregon Cattlemen's Association have directed me to wire our congressional delegation petitioning you to seek aid either through emergency funds from BLM or other sources. Urgent needs call for reseeding of totally burned-out areas comprising excess of 16,690 acres as follows: 650, Lakeview; 7,000, Burns; 1,899, Vale; 1,240, Prineville; 6,000, Baker. Also about 32 miles of protective fence needed. This, of course, represents only small part of BLM burned area and neither does it take into account burned forest lands. Fence costs about $500 per mile, reseeding about $3.50 per acre. More fires normally expected as only midseason and conditions including worst in years, but hope to get machinery in motion for emergency funds prior to fall rains.

CECIL L. EDWARDS.

Just today, I have received the following urgent telegram from Mr. Edwards:

PRINEVILLE, OREG., August 10, 1960.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Washington, D.C.:

The officers and members of the association join and sportsmen should, too, in expressing appreciation for your prompt and aggressive action pointed toward funds to reseed ranges destroyed in the serious fires that have plagued eastern Oregon. Combinations of surface fuel and temperature along with greater use of outdoors combine to make ever present fire hazard more threatening.

CECIL L. EDWARDS.

Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that of the $1.5 million being requested, approximately $450,000 would be expended in Oregon. This sum, if it is to be as effectively used as possible, needs to be made available with all speed to the Department. By starting reseeding operations in the very near future, technical experts of the Bureau of Land Management have assured me that we will be able to take advantage of ash now on the ground in order to provide a better medium for the new seed to grow in. If we delay, this one incidental advantage resulting from the fires may be dissipated.

There is one other point that I should like to stress to the committee. The seed to be purchased in this program should be that which is suitable to the soil and moisture of the area. It is my hope that the technical experts of the Department of the Interior in making their recommendations for the purchase of seed will not overlook those suitable varieties which are Oregon-grown and which are in large supply. I mention this, Mr. Chairman, because of a telegram I received this morning from Mr. R. C. Kuehner, secretary of the Chewings and Creeping Red Fescue Commission of Oregon.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee permit me to place into the record at this point that telegram and copies of telegrams dated August 9, 1960, which I dispatched to the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget urging that they seek the supplemental appropriation you are now considering. Thank you.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 10, 1960.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Fine leaf fescue growers of Oregon urge your assistance in securing recognition of their product in legislation being requested by Bureau of Land Management for emergency appropriation to reseed extensive range areas burned this season. It is of paramount importance that such emergency legislation specify only Oregon fine fescue be used.

Record imports of foreign seed, unhampered by quota regulations have created havoc in domestic market and growers are forced to sell way below cost of production.

R. C. KUEHNER.

AUGUST 9, 1960.

The Honorable FRED A. SEATON,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.:

Strongly urge you seek supplemental appropriation for reseeding and refencing of burned over acreage in eastern Oregon and other western States. Following telegram just received from Oregon Cattlemen's Association:

"You doubtless noted newspaper reports of destructive range fires that Oregon has experienced this season. Some authorities say worst in 30 years. Officers of the Oregon Cattlemens Association have directed me to wire our congressional delegation petitioning you to seek aid either through emergency funds from BLM or other sources. Urgent needs call for reseeding of totally burned out areas comprising excess of 16,690 acres as follows: 650 Lakeview, 7,000 Burns, 1899 Vale, 1,240 Prineville, 6,000 Baker. Also about 32 miles of protective fence needed. This of course represents only small part of BLM burned area and neither does it take into account burned forest lands. Fence costs about $500 per mile, reseeding about $3.50 per acre. More fires normally expected as only midseason and conditions including worst in years, but hope to get machinery in motion for emergency funds prior to fall rains."

You can appreciate the urgency of prompt reseeding in order that new seed may have benefit from ash resulting from burnt grass. Please advise decision of Department as soon as reached.

WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senator.

AUGUST 9, 1960.

Mr. MAURICE H. STANS,
Director, Bureau of the Budget,
Washington, D.C.:

Have strongly urged the Secretary of the Interior to seek supplemental appropriation for reseeding and refencing of burnt acreage in eastern Oregon and other western States. Will appreciate cooperation of Bureau of the Budget on any request presented for such urgently needed supplemental appropriation. Following is telegram just received from Oregon Cattlemens Association containing justification:

"You doubtless noted newspaper reports of destructive range fires that Oregon has experienced this season. Some authorities say worst in 30 years. Officers of the Oregon Cattlemen's Association have directed me to wire our congressional delegation petitioning you to seek aid either through emergency funds from BLM or other sources. Urgent needs call for reseeding of totally burned out areas comprising excess of 16,690 acres as follows: 650 Lakeview, 7,000 Burns, 1,899 Vale, 1,240 Prineville, 6,000 Baker. Believe Cattlemens Association's cost estimates very minimum. Would personally recommend $10 per acre, $4 of which would be for seeding and $6 for fencing.

Please advise when, and if decision to seek supplemental appropriation is made.

WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does the Senator from Arizona desire a quorum call?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No.

Mr. President, last night we began discussion of the Kennedy proposal to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act, which will be referred to more often on the floor as the minimum wage law. I desire today to offer my preliminary arguments on this entire matter, and I will later, during the introduction of some 32 amendments, develop this theme further.

The bill involves a question of economics, and not a question of politics. I will admit that this proposal has great vote appeal, but I argue: Does it have economic sense?

I have heard the argument used on the floor and in committee and in debate that the whole purpose of Government in the economic field should be to raise the purchasing power of the people. I suggest that the free enterprise system is constantly attempting to do that. The free enterprise system realizes that it cannot operate without increasing purchasing power. But every time the Federal Government has attempted to do this, it has not increased purchasing power. It has, at best, created a stalemate; but in many cases—I would say in most cases—it has caused an actual decline in purchasing power.

I should like to cite an example of this by reading from the Washington Post of August 8. I shall read this article into the RECORD because it shows precisely what I am arguing, that when we artificially raise wages, either by negotiation, when increased wages are not earned, or by governmental action, when increased wages are not earned, the worker receiving the increased wage actually suffers instead of benefits. A column under the heading "Federal Diary" appears daily in the Washington Post. The particular article to which I refer discusses the recent pay raise that was given to the Federal employees. I think it was a 7½-percent pay raise. It also refers to the argument made at the time by the President, his economic advisers, and those of us who believe in the natural operation of the law of supply and demand, and who know that this would not be, in effect, an increase because increased prices would have to be put into effect to absorb the taxes necessary to pay for it. I quote from the article written by Mr. Jerry Kluttz:

Factfinding Bureau of Labor Statistics has been asked to check on prices in the Washington area.

If the study shows what is suspected—that prices have edged up following the 7½-percent Federal pay raise—then Congress will be asked to investigate the matter.

Representative TOM STEED, Democrat, of Oklahoma, who requested the survey, said he would follow up by asking Congress to investigate if the facts warranted it.

He said numerous Federal employees had complained to him that their pay raise was being used to pay higher prices for rents, gas, bread, milk, transportation, cigarettes, etc.

"We gave the employees a needed pay raise," he observed, "but if the protests I've received are correct, the Federal workers in the Washington area are getting very little benefit from it * * * they must use the extra money to pay higher prices."

The next paragraph is not relevant.

This is an example of what happens right here in the city of Washington, the Nation's Capital, where we all live and work, and what unnatural or unearned wage increases will do. Every man in business knows that he has to pay for such an increase. The taxpayers have to pay for it. When the increase is earned, there is no question of the value of giving it. It is given naturally and normally in most cases.

When the Federal Government steps in, for reasons known only to itself, and grants pay raises, this is what can be expected by the Federal employee. The man we really tried to help finds out, after a few months or a year at the most, that he is no better off than he was before, because prices have had to go up.

Mr. President, I desired to comment on one other thing, which is the danger involved in the whole philosophy of the Federal Government regulating wages and ultimately prices. I think we can best understand this if I read from the hearings what Mr. Meany said in a colloquy I had with him during the course of the interrogation. Mr. Meany said:

If a business for any reason at all, must base its existence on paying less than a decent wage, I say it has no right to exist. I think that is plain.

Mr. President, last night on the floor the distinguished Senator from Oregon was expressing his views on this matter. I know that these are his honest convictions, because we have debated them in the committee. I wish to read from yesterday's RECORD, to carry the position of Mr. Meany a step forward. I quote from page 16178 under the heading "Perhaps a Subsidy Is Necessary."

I take the position that in a free economy such as ours there is a moral responsibility on the part of the Government to see to it that fellow Americans are not exploited by employers merely because they are economically stronger than the economically weak employees, who have no other choice but to work in the plants of such employers or not work at all.

So we come to the issue of whether workers should subsidize employers in "low wage" businesses or whether all the taxpayers of the country should subsidize them. Thus, as I offered a series of amendments in the Labor Committee, to bring more and more workers under the coverage of the bill, I was met with the argument that some businesses cannot pay more. I suggested that if it is a subsidy that they need, then the subsidy ought to come from all the taxpayers of the country and not from workers.

Mr. President, therein lies the end danger of the whole Federal approach. The fact which is recognized by Mr. Meany and by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is that some day the Federal Government may be in the position of paying wages in this country not simply to Federal employees, but also to employees of businesses, when those businesses are judged, by the Department of Labor or by whatever bureau has the matter under its wing, not to be able to pay a proper wage.

Mr. President, I wish to make it abundantly clear at the outset of this discussion that nobody in this country abhors low wages more than I do. I have had a lifetime of experience in hiring people and in working with people. I know something about this subject, because I have been through the processes of watching the economic system work. I have been through the processes of watching salaries go up in a natural way. I started to work for $12.50 a week, and I was pleased throughout my life to watch my salary go up as I worked harder and produced more. Therefore, when I talk about this matter I am talking from a practical standpoint; not a theoretical standpoint and not from a textbook. I know these things happen. I fear very strongly that the taking of the action which the Congress is about to take will result in more harm than good.

INCREASE IN THE MINIMUM WAGE RATE

Mr. President, my opposition to any increase in the minimum wage rate at this time is based on principles of sound economics and on a realization of the necessarily inflationary effect of any increase upon the economy as a whole. Wage increases imposed by legislative fiat without any regard for their economic consequences will curtail employment, reduce job opportunities, and result ultimately in price rises the consumer must pay for goods and services. I urge, therefore, that the present $1 an hour minimum remain unchanged.

APPLICATION OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT TO PURELY LOCAL ENTERPRISES

The act, heretofore, has been applicable only to employees engaged in interstate commerce or the production of goods for interstate commerce. The committee bill, while retaining this narrow coverage concept, extends coverage to all employees employed in an enterprise or in an establishment which is engaged in any activity affecting interstate commerce, subject to certain dollar volume limitations which will be discussed later.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of my colleagues to the statement in the bill "affecting commerce." This is the first time that we have tried to write into the Fair Labor Standards Act the language of the Supreme Court decisions, the first of which I believe was in the Jones and Laughlin case in about 1934, which used the language "affecting interstate commerce."

It is impossible for me to stand on the floor of the Senate and think of one single transaction which would not affect interstate commerce. For instance, if a bootblack in Phoenix, Ariz., bought one can of polish made in Ohio, that certainly would have an effect upon interstate commerce, and he could and would come under the intent of this measure.

Mr. President, this to me is one of the most dangerous parts of the whole bill. When we broaden the interpretation of interstate commerce to include anything which affects it, then I think we must think a long time about it, because we shall be, in effect, saying that everything done in the United States, whether it is purely intrastate or not, is in effect interstate in character, because it is difficult, if not impossible, to imagine anything which does not affect interstate commerce today.

The courts have construed the phrase "affecting interstate commerce" as constituting the broadest possible scope authorized by the Constitution of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. I am opposed to any change in the present coverage provisions of the act. The proposal to extend coverage in this fashion would place under Federal control thousands of small business establishments which are primarily local in character and which should not be subject to regulation by the Federal Government if our Federal-State system is to be maintained.

THE ELIMINATION OR NARROWING OF EXEMPTIONS FROM COVERAGE IN THE PRESENT LAW

Both in the enactment of the original Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938, and its major amendment in 1949, Congress recognized that even the narrow coverage concept of the law would result in hardship and inequity applied to certain specific industries or economic activities. These industries and activities are of such a nature and are carried on under such circumstances, that to subject them to the act would be to create complex, even insoluble problems, jeopardizing the effective functioning as well as the solvency of many enterprises in these areas. Cognizant of the difficulties, Congress granted exemptions of various kinds, tailored to suit the problems peculiar to these industries and activities. Thus, employees in retail, service, cleaning and laundering establishments, in agriculture, as well as seamen and others, were exempted from the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the act, as were employees of small newspapers, local, suburban and interurban bus and trolley lines, and small telephone exchanges. Employees in certain industries were exempted from the overtime provisions of the act but made subject to the minimum wage requirements; others were exempted from overtime for a limited period in each year because the industries were seasonal in nature.

Congress had substantial grounds for granting an exemption in each specific case. Essentially, Congress recognized the fact that the failure to provide these exemptions would result in economic injury to the particular industry which would inevitably result in a decline in employment therein, thus defeating the objectives of the legislation.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or does the Senator care to yield at this time?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. The categories of businesses he has mentioned in his most informative address this morning before the Senate have caused me to remark at this stage that I have received literally thousands of letters over the period of the last 6 or 8 months from people in my State of Kansas pointing out the very thing which the Senator is bringing to the attention of the Senate, namely, that if these exemptions are not provided for the businesses—and I know many of these people—as pointed out, the ultimate result will be a loss of employment and the curtailment of the business activities.

I should like to ask the Senator if he feels there is a very decided danger that the exemptions heretofore provided by the Congress, I think wisely, would be eliminated in this type of legislation? Does the Senator feel there is a great possibility that the exemptions would be eliminated?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under the present bill many of the exemptions are retained and some of them have been removed. If I remember correctly, when the original bill was introduced, it would have added an additional 11 million people, and taking out exemptions which would cover them, the figure is down now to roughly 5 million people. There have been some fields of exemption that have been eliminated from the present bill, but there are many fields still left.

If the Senator is interested, I can read into the RECORD that section of the bill that lists the exemptions.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. The Senator need not do that. I shall be glad to check the bill. However, the alarm that is being expressed through the mail that the Senator from Kansas is receiving concerns the removal of exemptions, and the fear that if they are removed or if employers are saddled with the proposed increases, they will be required to curtail their businesses by the hundreds in my State. The bill affects the smaller areas as well as some of the larger areas in my State.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from Kansas is correct in a part of his assumption. I do not like to use the argument that the passage of the bill would put people out of business. It would not necessarily do so. Last night the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] alluded to the argument that is used by businessmen to the effect that it would run them out of business. That is not true. I do not imply that his statement was incorrect insofar as he made it, because he believes it is. But the bill would not necessarily eliminate a business. All that happens is that the merchant, whoever he is, raises his prices.

The law of economics is simple. A man is in business to make a profit, and the biggest part of his expense dollar is the salary cost. If he must raise the salary cost 10 percent, he will be required to raise prices to cover that 10 percent. It will not necessarily mean a 10-percent price increase, but that is one danger we encounter in small communities. The fact that the small businessman must raise his prices causes him to come into competition with the large chain stores, most of which are already paying above the minimum wage, and the small businessman cannot compete with them. In that respect he might eventually go out of business. But the mere fact that he would have to increase his salaries would only mean that he would increase his prices.

The other danger with which the small merchant—or the "Main Street merchant," as I like to call him—is confronted is that the moment he is placed in a position where he must pay above what his business will carry, he is then in competition in the labor market with the larger stores which already pay a higher wage. He is already in competition with them. To put him further into competition would work a hardship on him.

There is one other danger that I shall touch on a little later, but because the Senator from Kansas is present and has asked the question, I shall mention it at this time.

By artificially causing an increase in wages in these fields, we shall see additional unemployment in this country. I cannot tell how much it will be. My assumption is that if the bill is passed as it is now written, within 3 to 4 months after the Act goes into effect the additional unemployment could reach as high as half a million.

One might ask, why is that? The retail business is a very peculiar business. The greatest turnover in employment occurs in the retail business. It is not a business which is particularly attractive to young people. I wish it were more attractive. It is not the salary question that makes it unattractive. The retail business is a hard grind.

So what kind of employees does a retailer select? Young girls waiting to get married, older women who are widows, and many married women who wish to spend part of their days away from home doing something. They are lonesome. So merchants give them part-time jobs. These are not people that merchants need. Merchants can eliminate most of those people today through automation. Many merchants are adopting automation procedures, but they are not going into it to the extent to which they will be forced into that field as they are required to get rid of what we call marginal employees—people who do not work all day, and who do not want to work all day.

I find that in my business there are many people who wish to work only in the morning or only in the afternoon, or, if we are open one night a week, to work that one night. We have girls who go to school part time. They do not want to work all day. Those are the types of employees in every town in America that the merchant will have to eliminate if this bill becomes law.

To me that problem has serious consequences upon the economy of a small community. It has serious consequences upon the economy of business itself.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I say to the distinguished Senator from Arizona that he is putting his finger on some of the very same things that have been repeated to me hundreds of times in communications I have received, especially from part-time workers, and I appreciate very much his explanation of his views with reference to some of these matters.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to add a statement which was made by Secretary of Labor Mitchell. I admit that the statement was made last year, and I believe that Secretary Mitchell has indicated that he has changed his mind, but I do not know that the facts have been changed by reason of his changing his mind. In transmitting a report to Congress, Secretary Mitchell said:

> The surveys present evidence of disemployment apparently related to the increase in the $1 minimum, despite the fact that the economy was rising at that time and there were increases in the general level of prices which facilitated adjustment to the $1 minimum. Employment tended to decline in the low-wage industries, and in most cases more markedly in those segments of the low-wage industries where wage rates had been increased most. * * * These employment developments were, of course, influenced by many factors in the whole economic situation. They are much more marked, however, than would be expected in the exceptionally favorable economic circumstances of the time.

The Secretary further stated in the same report:

> The results of the studies undertaken by the Department suggest that the $1 minimum had substantial impact in the low-wage industries and that there is still a heavy concentration of workers at or near the minimum in the low-wage industries. In view of these conclusions, it is not determinative that prices, the wage level generally, and productivity have increased in the meantime. A further increase in the minimum at this time would involve the risk of "substantially curtailing employment or earning power" in the low-wage industries, which the act states is to be avoided.

As I say, that was the Secretary's position last year. He has since indicated that the minimum wage should be increased, and furthermore, that additional workers should be covered. But I wished to make sure the Senate knew that the report to which I referred shows that there was disemployment as a result of the passage of the minimum wage bill of 1955.

My conviction, arrived at through a lifetime of experience in business, is that unemployment could very well rise as much as a half million people as a direct result of this bill, if it is enacted, and it will affect the very type of person, in the main, that we are now striving to help through the Federal-aid-to-the-aged approach. Most of those people are in the age bracket of 65 and over.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did the Senator state for the RECORD—if so, I did not catch it—exactly what was the date of the report of the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Mitchell, from which he just read?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I did not state the date. I do not have it before me, but I shall obtain it and make it a part of the RECORD. The report was made in 1959, last year. It was a report made to the Congress, and I shall be glad to furnish the date.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The portion of my presentation about which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] has been querying me applies to the effect of the bill upon small business.

INJURIOUS EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESS

The dollar volume standards provided in the committee bill are designed to create the impression that the minimum wage and overtime pay requirements are directed exclusively at big business and that small business falling below these dollar standards will continue to be free from the act's requirements and will thereby be unaffected by the economic effects of the extended coverage. Actually, this is mere surface appearance; the reality is otherwise.

A small business, in all of its activities, competes directly with large enterprises in the same industry; it also competes with all other industries in the same labor market for the available supply of labor. If the larger enterprises are compelled by law to pay higher wages, small business operating in the same labor market must pay the same rates in order to secure or retain employees. Thus, the exemptions or the freedom from coverage the committee bill seems to extend to some small business is nothing but delusion.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Aside from the comment which the Senator has just made, which I believe is completely accurate; namely, that small business is competing constantly day by day with large business across the street or around the corner, both pricewise and for its employees, is it not true that both sponsors of the proposed legislation in their opening statements yesterday made it completely clear, as they have heretofore, that they think the pending bill is too small a beginning, and that they anticipate and hope for and will be actively engaged in extending the coverage when and if the standards written into the pending bill for the first time become applicable?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would say that last night the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who is a member of the committee, repeated on the floor what he has often said in committee. He believes that there should be no exemptions at all, and that he will try, as Congresses go by, to have exemptions removed completely.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did not the distinguished Senator from Oregon also say that in his opinion at least 6 million more employees should be put under coverage at this time in the pending bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The bill as it was originally written, as I said earlier, would have brought approximately 11 million people under coverage. I believe the figure under the present bill would be in the neighborhood of 5 million.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Oregon did say that in his judgment an additional 6 million should be brought under coverage in the bill now.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would not be surprised if the Senator from Oregon submitted amendments to accomplish that. In fact, if we pursue his philosophy in this field, we must come to the conclusion he reached last night, namely, that the bill should be implemented, where necessary, with Federal moneys being paid to employees where employers cannot meet the $1.25 minimum wage by the law and its amendments through the years.

Mr. HOLLAND. In support of the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Arizona, is it not true that the Senator from Oregon said last night that in such case the entire public should subsidize the employers, so that they could pay their employees what he regarded as an adequate wage?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. I read that earlier. I made reference to his remark, shown at page 16178 of the RECORD of yesterday:

> I suggested that if it is a subsidy that they need, then the subsidy ought to come from all the taxpayers of the country and not from workers.

I know the Senator believes that, because we have argued about it in committee. If that is not socialism, I do not understand the term. We will not have a free economic system once the Federal Government gets into the business of paying wages.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the other principal sponsor of the proposed legislation now before the Senate, in his opening remarks, also said that the pending bill in his judgment did not go far enough, and that it would call for extensions from year to year to other business and employers and employees, under the new concept that is written into the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe he did in his opening statement. The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee has not been as forceful in pushing for extended coverage as has the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask one more question. Is it not true that the Senator from Oregon in his bill, introduced either last year or in the last Congress, also included coverage of agricultural workers within the purview of the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. An effort has been made every time the act was amended to include agricultural workers. A specific exemption is written into the pending bill with reference to agricultural workers. We have always had to eliminate that possibility. However, there is more and more pressure being exerted to bring agricultural workers under the purview of the law. I do not know of any amendment at the desk which would bring that about. However, it would not surprise me to see an amendment offered in that field.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I may restate my question, it is this: Is it not true that one of the distinguished sponsors of this proposed legislation, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], in a bill introduced by him a short time ago in the Senate, either last year or in the 85th Congress, specifically included the coverage of agricultural workers?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe the Senator is correct. I would have to check with my staff to be accurate in my statement. I would not want to state definitely without first checking. I will be glad to get the answer. If such a bill was introduced, I will be glad to get it and put it in the RECORD, if the Senator desires.

Mr. HOLLAND. I would appreciate it if the Senator would do that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have been informed that the bill as originally introduced would have increased the coverage by about 7½ to 8 million. In the subcommittee the bill increased the coverage by about 11 million. Then the full committee amended the bill and reported the pending bill with an increased coverage of about 5 million. I thank my staff for bringing that information to my attention.

II. HISTORY OF FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT AMENDMENTS

The enactment of the Walsh-Healey Act in 1936 provided that certain Government contracts must contain provisions for paying the prevailing rate of wages. This was the first attempt by the Congress to place a floor under wages in interstate commerce. Then on June 25, 1938, one of the Nation's basic labor laws was enacted—the Fair Labor Standards Act. This act set forth the statutory minimum wage, overtime pay requirements, and child labor provisions that cover employees engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

The 1938 act set the Federal minimum wage rate at 25 cents an hour from October 1938–39; 30 cents, from October 1939–45; and 40 cents after October 1945. The 40-cent level was established even prior to October 1945 through industry committees, groups composed of employers, employees, and public representatives who studied the wage situations of different industries and recommended the highest minimum, up to 40 cents an hour, that would not substantially curtail employment.

The Congress, in adopting the Fair Labor Standards Act, was concerned with eliminating labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of minimum standards of living necessary to health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers.

It was not contemplated that this legislation would be applied to those already receiving wages far above the minimum which results from genuine free collective bargaining.

President Roosevelt, in asking the Congress to enact the Fair Labor Standards Act, stated:

> There are many purely local pursuits and services which no Federal legislation can effectively cover.

Similarly, Senator Black—now Justice Black, of the U.S. Supreme Court—who sponsored the original wage and hour bill in the Senate, said:

> Businesses of a purely local type which serve a particular local community, and which do not send their products into the streams of interstate commerce, can be better regulated by the laws of the communities in which the business units operate.

These statements are as true today as they were in 1937–38.

Since 1945 the minimum wage has been increased by the Congress from 40 cents an hour to a dollar an hour, or 250 percent of the 1945 base. During this same period the Consumer Price Index has risen so that it represents 160 percent of the 1945 base. In fact, if we go back to 1938 when the Minimum Wage Act was passed, the minimum wage has increased to 400 percent of the 25-cent level adopted by the Congress at that time, while the Consumer Price Index is only 200 percent of the 1938 base.

In appraising this legislation, it is important to remember that in 1938 there were 8,265,000 members of trade unions as contrasted with over 18 million today. Collective bargaining currently establishes the wage levels which must be met by all employers if they are to compete for workers in an economy where currently the percentage of unemployed is less than 5 percent of the total civilian labor force. Those who would be directly affected by legislation raising the minimum are usually in areas of substantial unemployment where potential employers are confronted with special problems. Increased labor costs in such situations would likely increase unemployment and cause hardship for those whom this legislation is intended to benefit.

The 1949 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act increased the minimum rate still further to 75 cents an hour, effective January 25, 1950, and redefined "commerce" as "trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or between any State and any place outside thereof" in lieu of "from any State to."

In 1955 extensive hearings were held by the House Education and Labor Committee on legislation to revise the Fair Labor Standards Act. Proposals were considered to raise the minimum wage and also to extend coverage of the act.

In enacting legislation to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act so as to achieve the greatest well-being for as many people as possible, the Department of Labor testified that—

The maximum increase in the minimum wage that can be undertaken depends on the impact the increase would have on low-wage segments of industry where it must be paid. If the increase is too large to be absorbed without disruptive changes, the results are either unemployment in the affected firms or price increases. If the market will not take price increases, the low-paid workers whose jobs are at stake lose instead of gaining. If prices rise and the wage increase is paid through inflation the real cost is borne by low-paid workers outside the scope of Federal regulation and by pensioners and others in similar status.

Although the President recommended an expansion of coverage and an increase to 90 cents an hour, and despite the strong efforts by labor spokesmen in behalf of their case for a $1.25 minimum wage, the Congress enacted legislation to raise the rate to $1, effective March 1, 1956, with no provisions for extension of coverage under the law, during the 84th Congress.

In 1957, the Subcommittee on Labor of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee held public hearings during February and March to consider only the extension of coverage under the act. On February 25, 1957, the Secretary of Labor made the following statement before the subcommittee:

I recommend that the act be amended to bring within the protection of a minimum wage employees now excluded who work in business enterprises that are substantially engaged in interstate commerce. Their operation depends on substantial and continuing engagement in interstate commerce, and such enterprises are an integral and essential part of the interstate commerce of the Nation.

It should be emphasized that the Secretary of Labor confined his recommendations to enterprises which are an integral and essential part of the interstate commerce of the Nation.

Several other proposals were advanced during the 85th Congress. These included the extension of coverage to approximately 10 million employees who were engaged in any activity affecting commerce.

Ultimately, such a concept would virtually include any employment regardless of its character. Another proposal would have extended coverage to nearly 6 million employees by broadening the term "commerce" to include any closely related process or occupation directly essential to commerce.

The Secretary of Labor made the following comment on these proposals:

This is broader than any language ever used by the Congress for application of the commerce clause of the Constitution. In 1938 and again in 1949 the extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to activities affecting commerce was considered but not adopted by the Congress. The proposal here is as expansive as the affecting language then considered. I believe that there are still very good reasons for rejecting such an approach to coverage.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the line of coverage must be drawn as precisely and definitely as it can be so that employers and employees may understand its application from the facts that they know. Wages have to be paid each pay period, and if the law applies it must be complied with at that time.

For this reason, the current proposals to include new and indefinitely elastic boundaries in the act's definitions of interstate commerce do not appear to be practicable.

That is the end of the quotation from the statement of the Secretary of Labor when he appeared before the subcommittee.

Mr. HOLLAND. In what year?

Mr. GOLDWATER. In 1959.

III. THE HEARINGS

The Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare held 10 days of hearings during May and June of this 1959. Seventy-seven witnesses appeared, representing various groups, including labor, agriculture, transportation, communication, timber, manufacturing, fisheries, merchant marine, retail and service trades, and individual small businessmen.

For the most part, the groups listed above were opposed to the enactment of S. 1046, the bill introduced by Senator KENNEDY from which the committee bill evolved. Representatives appearing on behalf of labor unions gave full support to broadening the coverage and raising the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour. The administration offered a bill, S. 1967, which would not affect the minimum wage rate, but would broaden the coverage by including larger establishments now exempted that met the true test of being engaged in interstate commerce and employing at least 100 workers.

I might comment briefly on the $1.25 rate. Frankly, I have not been able to find an economist who can tell me the validity of the $1.25. It is the minimum established back in 1954, when the bills were introduced to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act that resulted in the amendment in 1955. At that time the economists of the labor movement were pushing for $1.25. Finally they settled for $1. I have not found any economic justification for $1.25. In my mind, why should it not be $1.50 or $1.75? Why $1.25? I hope that during the discussion it will be possible to develop some sound economic reason for the figure which was picked out of the air.

I argued with Mr. Meany during the hearings that whatever the minimum was raised to, whether $1.25 or $1.50, it would be only a relatively few years before the new floor would be the starvation wage. We started with 25 cents an hour. When we think today of 25 cents an hour, we think, "Oh, that was terrible. How could people live?" Well, many persons in this Chamber once worked for 25 cents an hour. But in those days a dollar was worth more. Things were cheaper. Costs were down. All costs have gradually come up.

Wage rates came up faster without Federal intervention than they have with Federal intervention. I was looking, this morning, at some interesting figures. In 1930 and 1931, wholesale prices stood approximately at the same level as they were in 1840—90 years earlier. Yet, in the same 90-year period, average wage rates increased by approximately 700 percent. This is a phenomenal and little known development.

It was the competition in the goods market which helped to keep prices down, and it was the rivalry among employers for scarce labor which drove wage rates up and up.

I do not believe that referring back 30 years, and making comparisons with rates which at that time were fairly good, does any good in this discussion. What we should be concerned about is the effect of passing a bill which would increase the minimum wage to $1.25 and cover so many people at this time.

Another effect of this proposal, of course, is the pushing upward of all labor costs. It does not affect the man who is now making $1 and who will be raised to $1.25. The competitive situation in the labor field within one firm immediately forces all other wage rates up. That is the economic fact which leads to more inflation, not simply the $1.25 in itself. It is the effect it will have on the man now making $1.25, $1.50, $2, or $2.50. All of those have to go up in order to retain the relative positions of skills in the labor market. If we are driven to the day when we pay everyone the same wage, then I think we are on the right track; but of course no one who understands the operation of our economic system would ever want to see that day come, because it would mean the elimination of competition within the labor market; and in the operation of a single firm itself it would result in the rather rapid arrival of the day when the Federal Government would, in effect, be paying all the salaries.

Mr. President, now I wish to discuss what, in my opinion, are some of the major shortcomings of the committee bill.

But before I do so, let me say that the Senator from Florida asked about a bill, which was introduced, to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for hired farm labor employed by large farm enterprises, and for other purposes. The bill was not introduced by the Senator from Oregon. It was introduced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], for himself and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. I have before me a copy of the bill, although I do not believe it would serve any useful purpose to place it in the RECORD. But if the Senator from Florida would like to see it, I would be very happy to hand it to him.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator; but it is not the bill to which I referred, although it contains some of the same provisions.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It may be offered as an amendment; I do not know.

IV. THE MAJOR SHORTCOMINGS OF THE COMMITTEE BILL

Mr. President, in considering amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act which will result in the maximum benefit to the workers of this country, there are four factors that must be kept in proper relationship to each other. First, the amount of the minimum wage in terms of living standards of employees and costs to employers. Second, the possible effects of increasing this minimum in terms of substantially curtailing the employment or the earnings of those covered by the act. Third, the extent of coverage viewed in relation to the proper role of the Federal Government in activities which have traditionally been regarded as local and not directly related or essential to interstate commerce, and fourth, the injurious effect on small business.

There is a definite tendency to concentrate on, or single out, one of these elements and ignore the others. However, the supporters of the committee bill apparently believe that American workers will benefit from simultaneously providing substantial increases both in the minimum wage rate and in the extent of coverage. Marginal businesses throughout the country traditionally have paid the lowest wages and also experience the lowest earnings.

INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGE RATE

The committee bill proposes that the minimum statutory wage be increased in a series of increments, so that it would be $1.25 an hour after 2 years for some workers and after 3 years for all the others to whom the act is extended.

Section 4(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act directs the Secretary of Labor to inform the Congress of his evaluation of minimum wages under the act and of his views as to necessary changes in the act to further the purposes of the legislation. In accordance with the requirements of this section, the Secretary transmitted on January 31, 1959, a report which set forth information concerning the operation and effect of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I may say to the Senator from Florida that is the date he was asking about; I simply did not have it at the tip of my tongue at the particular moment when he made his inquiry.

In the letter of transmittal, the Secretary stated:

A further increase in the minimum at this time would involve the risk of "substantially curtailing employment or earning power" in the low-wage industries, which the act states is to be avoided.

The minimum ought to be raised as rapidly as possible, but with due regard for the economic capacity of low-wage industries to make adjustments to progressively higher standards. Because of the effect it would have on the economy, especially in the low-wage industries, I do not recommend an increase in the minimum wage at this time.

The Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor undertook a major study of the $1 minimum wage, based on a survey program conducted at the time the $1 minimum became effective in March 1956, and again 1 year later in 1957.

The findings of these surveys and some of the economic factors relevant to the question of raising the $1 minimum at that time were covered in the Secretary's letter transmitting this report to the Congress. It stated:

The Department's survey program disclosed substantial effects on wage payments in the low-wage manufacturing industries in 1956–57, resulting from the increase of the minimum wage to $1 an hour, effective March 1, 1956. In 9 of the 18 industry segments studied the wage increases required to bring all workers below $1 up to that figure increased the wage bill by more than 10 percent. In these studies the industry segments were divided, wherever the data were adequate, into low-impact and high-impact groups, according to the magnitude of the direct wage bill increase required by the new minimum. In 6 of the 14 industries in which there are such data the required increase exceeded 20 percent in the high-impact groups.

The wage increases resulting from the $1 minimum were not only these direct or required increases, but also increases to workers already receiving more than the minimum. The surveys indicate that these indirect increases on the effective date amounted in the median situation to approximately 40 percent of the directly required increases in the low-wage industries.

One notable survey finding is that existing wage differentials of all kinds—between high- and low-wage plants, between large and small plants, between union and nonunion plants, between large and small communities, between high- and low-wage occupations, etc.—were substantially narrowed as an immediate consequence of the $1 minimum. These differentials tended to be restored, although only partially, during the following year.

The surveys indicated that the $1 minimum had effects in raising wages in exempt portions of covered industries and to some extent also in employments not covered by the act.

The surveys also disclosed that the $1 minimum stimulated employers to reduce costs through productivity improvement as well as raising of production quotas, especially in piece-rate industries, dismissal of least efficient workers, and elimination of premium overtime. There were also indications of some shifting to different price lines, substitution of cheaper materials, and increased prices. The latter was not always possible, but sales and employment were maintained in many situations because higher prices offset rising wage costs under generally favorable demand conditions.

Mr. President, I wish to comment now, for just a moment, on the particular paragraph I have just now read from the Secretary's report. In this paragraph the Secretary recognizes what industry does when it has artificially to raise wages and to absorb the costs if it is going to show a profit; and all who are in business are in it to make a profit. The report says "dismissal of least efficient workers."

Earlier, I commented on that point. There will be found, particularly in the retail industry, the retainment of inefficient workers because, as I have said, that is a field which has a high rate of turnover. Earlier in my remarks, I outlined some of the reasons. But that has been recognized by the Secretary of Labor as one of the immediate effects and also one of the long-range effects of artificially raising the minimum wage.

Also here he recognizes another factor which has been of great concern to me—namely, the substitution of cheaper materials.

Mr. President, we must keep in mind that American industry is in business in order to make money. There are many strange ideas as to how much money American business makes; but if American businesses do not make some money, they go out of business; and if too many of them go out of business, the economic system gets into trouble.

As those who are in business have been forced to absorb higher and higher costs through unearned wage increases produced by negotiation or by government, and higher costs produced by the increased costs of government, they have had to go through the various areas where they can save money in order to make money; and I am afraid that the substitution of cheaper materials is becoming more and more a factor in American industry.

I sat next to one of the leaders of the automobile industry, about 2 years ago, at a dinner; and we were talking about the tremendous increase in the importation of foreign-made automobiles. I think he remarked to me that in that year America would export only 8,000 passenger automobiles, but that around 100,000 foreign-made automobiles would be imported.

I asked, "What is your thinking as to the reason?"

"Well," he said, "certainly the cost is a factor, the fact that some of these foreign cars are lower in price than ours; but," he said, "they have better quality."

Mr. President, when American industry is forced to substitute cheaper materials in order to stay in business, I suggest that the threat of foreign competition is going to become more and more acute.

A businessman told me, during last year's steel strike, that they found a source of steel in Belgium which produced such superior steel to that which was produced in this country that they were not going to buy steel from American sources any more; they wanted to keep their quality up.

This is a very important factor, because American people do not like to be gypped. They do not like to buy a car and then spend $100 a month to keep it running. They do not like to buy a television set and then have to have a repairman continually fixing the set. They do not like to buy a suit of clothes and then have it fall apart a month after buying it. Yet we are, by our action, adding to the forces which make the businessman who has to stay in business take some of the steps that are recognized by the Secretary of Labor; among them substitution of cheaper materials.

It is a dangerous situation, also, because it affects not only the American buyers who buy goods, but the producers who supply the basic materials for our merchandise. In my own business, for example, if I cared to do so, I could buy, out of China or Japan or Puerto Rico, men's shirts, equal in quality to those manufactured and sold in this country for $6.50, to sell in this country at half to a third of that price.

Thank goodness American merchants have not succumbed entirely to this temptation, but if they are continually forced to by the actions of government, in spending money we do not have, in creating inflation, in Government's forcing wages up when they are not earned, then certainly the substitution of cheaper materials, along with these other items the Secretary recognizes is going to have very disastrous effects upon the economy.

Again, the very person we are trying to help, the working person, is the man who is going to suffer.

I think more and more working people in this country are recognizing that government activity does not help them—it hurts them; that when the Government causes costs to go up in any way at all, the working people pay for it in higher living costs; that when they are paid unearned wage increases, those additional costs will have to be absorbed in price increases that have to accompany them.

Now I shall continue with the Secretary's report.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was interested in one part of the Secretary's report to which the Senator has not specifically called attention, namely, the rise in salary cost in echelons of employees above those affected by the minimum wage law. Will the Senator comment on that?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. That is one of the real dangers in this approach. I said earlier that if it were only the dollar and a quarter that were involved, it would not have much effect upon the American economy; but competition must be maintained within the walls of a firm. For example, a maid is not going to be paid the same hourly rate a skilled mechanic receives. That cannot possibly be done. The competition within a firm has to be retained. There has to be retained the opportunity for that maid, or for the janitor, to look up to the skilled workers' hourly rate and say, "If I work hard, I will earn that rate."

What happens if a person is getting $1 an hour, and we raise that rate to $1.25? The associates of that worker in the same firm will have their wages increased, say, from $1.50 to $1.75, from $1.75 to $2, from $2 to $2.50. We have to do that in business. The same pay cannot be given to everybody, because there are different skills.

Let us consider the firms that are already paying $1.25. It might be said that this law will not affect them. Certainly it will affect them, because they have to get into further competition in the labor market, and the $1.25 is reflected in the competition and what they have to pay new employees as they compete with other firms. I think that factor is a very important part of this problem, and I am glad the Senator from Florida has asked that question.

I cannot make it plain enough that it is the final, overall effect this action has on the American economy that is important. It does not affect only the low paid worker. This is called the starvation wage. If the hourly starvation wage is now $1, as the proponents of the bill say, the new starvation wage rate will be $1.25. Then, in a subsequent Congress, that rate will be raised to $1.50, and that will become the starvation wage.

These things cannot be done. If the original act had performed the miracles its proponents thought it would, we would not be faced with this proposal today. Ever since the enactment of the law, we have been going back and back and back. It is like the agricultural act. We know it does not work, and we know it will never work, but we spend all of our time here trying to amend that act to take care of the apparent weakness of the moment.

As I have said, every time the Federal Government dabbles in the free-enterprise system, the result is that we in the Congress spend all our time in amending the act.

We have had this act since 1938, and we still have pockets of low pay. I do not like that, but it is a part of our system of business. It is a part of the free-enterprise system. People will work for these low wages. I would not, but I might have to if I were hard put. There are always people who will accept these jobs. That is an economic fact of life that has to be recognized. There are people who are enterprising, who want to start a small business, who are willing to work 18 hours a day at no wages; and there are people who are willing to work for wages that are lower than the going wage rate. That fact is true whether we have this law or any other law. It is an economic fact of life.

We have not been able to stamp out these pockets of low pay. I think we are making progress, but I think we are making progress faster under the free enterprise system than by Government action. This is an economic fact of life that the proponents of the bill should understand.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. If there be an increase of, say, one-fourth in the pay rate of the lowest paid workers in a particular industry, from $1 to $1.25, am I to understand that something of the same nature of an increase will follow as a matter of course, as a matter of necessity, under our system, with reference to other employees in that same business?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Earlier in the report that I read, the Secretary of Labor recognized in his findings that in the low-impact areas, the increase amounted to 10 percent; it ranged from 20 percent to 40 percent in the higher impact areas.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true, and does not the Secretary so state, that the statements we have just made are not only applicable to the very industry as to which the minimum wage applies, but are also applicable to competing industries that compete in the same labor market for their employees?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. It affects every industry, whether it is covered or not. The Secretary brought that fact out earlier in his report.

Mr. HOLLAND. To follow that point one more step, is it not true that the rate of real pay of the employee who is affected, therefore, will not increase appreciably, because the merchants have to raise the cost of the articles produced or the service rendered in somewhat the same degree that their production costs and their administration costs are raised by the operation of a minimum wage law?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is exactly correct. This is a point I have tried to make throughout the years in discussing this subject. The very people we are trying to help are the ones who are going to suffer.

It is simply an economic fact of life that if we have an increase in cost it must be absorbed. The quickest way to absorb such an increase is to raise prices. In a case like this, where the increase affects so many industries and so many businesses, the price can go up very easily, because of competition being what it is. All people can raise prices at the same time. If the increase affected only a small segment of the economy or a segment of the industry, the competition might keep prices down. A merchant or management then might have to find some other way of cutting, though there has to be a cut.

That is what the Secretary of Labor recognized, as I cited from the previous paragraph in the report. When these unnatural increases come along, in order for a man to stay in business he must do something.

Mr. HOLLAND. The increases in prices which follow of necessity affect all the consuming public likewise, do they not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. They affect everyone in the United States, including the worker we are trying to help.

This may be beside the point, but the steel strike of last year produced, in my estimation, wage increases which were not earned by increased productivity. We have not had an increase in steel prices as yet, but we are going to have one. Since steel is a basic industry, this price increase will have an effect on prices. The very people who got the wage increase are going to have to pay more for refrigerators, for automobiles, and for everything containing steel, as will all of us.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that such a system is a direct contributor to inflation and will bring further inflation if persisted in?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. Any time the economy has any unnatural forces acting on it, it produces inflation or deflation. We do have normal inflation through the operation of our economic system, but when the Government injects itself into the operation of the economic system we always get inflation. We get inflation out of the Government growing bigger and bigger and bigger and spending more and more and more money it does not have. Deficit spending, I will admit, can be deflationary, but up to now it has been highly inflationary.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The question deals generally with the purpose of the bill. Does the bill confine itself solely to the workers who are trying to attain what is called a minimum sustenance wage, or would the bill operate with respect to workers who now are admittedly receiving more than what would be normally designated as a minimum sustenance wage?

Mr. GOLDWATER. When one reads the bill, the bill purportedly is directed toward the man making less than what the proponents of the bill feel to be a wage which will allow him to enjoy life and the pursuit of happiness. However, the Senator is correct in assuming that the bill will affect all wage earners. Wage rates will go up. That has been the disclosure of the investigation of the Secretary of Labor.

The effect of such wage increases has been as low as 10 percent in the low-impact industries to as high as 40 percent increase in labor costs. I wish there were a way to get the precise amount that the last increase affected labor costs in this country. I have not seen any figures which bear on that exactly, but there must be billions of dollars involved, and all that has to be absorbed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is the indirect pressure as to the lifting of wages. Is that what the Senator is talking about?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. Will the Senator allow me to continue a moment further?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. A majority of the 5 million people to be newly covered by the bill we are talking about are presently earning more than the present statutory minimum of a dollar.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Are there some who are earning as much as $3 or $4 per hour, who may be helped by the bill, especially in obtaining time-and-a-half pay for work?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Hourly rates in manufacturing in this country in June, the latest figure I have, were $2.29 an hour, on the average. For durable goods the figure was $2.44 an hour. For nondurable goods the figure was $2.08 an hour. In the construction industry the figure was $3.34 an hour.

In the retail trade, which is the area the bill is mostly directed toward, the latest figure is for May, and the figure is $1.81.

Certainly even those wages which are arrived at by negotiation over the bargaining table will go up. That will be the result of competition in the labor field. It is the same kind of competition we have in the price field, in retailing, or any other type of service or selling in this country. Competition itself will require that the next negotiation at the bargaining table bring about an increase in wages. There has to be a differential in wages, if we are to keep incentive alive in this country. That differential is not only automatic, it is a must. We cannot level off all wages in this country, so that everybody is paid, for example, $2 an hour whether he is a good worker or a poor worker.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator is still talking about the indirect operation of the bill. My question is directed to a different situation. A new group is to be brought within the operations of the present law. In a particular industry the pay may be above the minimum of $1.25, whether or not the bill is passed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But there is presently no provision for time and a half pay in the industry, perhaps. Would that group of workers, now receiving wages in excess of $1.25 an hour, become entitled under the Federal mandate to time and a half pay under the formula?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. The only ones who are exempted from the time and a half provision are the local transit companies, the seamen on American-flag vessels, and those people who are engaged in fish processing. Those are the three groups.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Some few are exempted, but except for those exemptions the law would operate upon all workers, giving them time and a half for hours worked in excess of a designated number?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. From that standpoint the bill would go beyond dealing with the minimum sustenance wage?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I have been trying to develop in my argument the point that the bill would not affect simply the minimum wage. The bill would affect hours and would affect everything which has to do with employment in this country. We are talking about the Fair Labor Standards Act, not simply a minimum wage. The minimum wage provision is only a part of the Fair Labor Standards Act. There is also consideration of time and a half, age, conditions of employment, and so on.

We are now talking about the effect of the minimum wage segment of the bill. In that we have to consider the overtime provisions in the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It seems to me the impression gained by the public generally is that the bill under consideration is a bill to help the workers in sweatshops. In fact, the bill is a Federal mandate to pay time and a half in industries in which the workers do not now receive time and a half but in which the hourly pay rates may be $3 or $4 an hour.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. Let us consider a bricklayer. A bricklayer receives $5 an hour, and he will receive $7.50 an hour for overtime, under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is already operative, in most instances.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But the bill would bring in a new category under the definition of interstate commerce as carried in the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The bill says, "affecting interstate commerce." That is the dangerous term in the bill. In the first paragraph we see the term "affecting interstate commerce." For the first time we are asked to write into the law the language of the Supreme Court which has broadened the interpretation of the commerce clause of the Constitution so wide that I cannot, as I stand here, think of a single, solitary person in this country who would not be included under the provisions of the act unless he were specifically exempted by the provisions of the act.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I point out that about a week ago it was called to my attention that a demand was made at one particular business in which bargaining will take place is that there shall be double pay for nonwork holidays because in truth, under that philosophy, while the man is not working at all, he is working. I suppose that is the theory.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have not heard of that.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I shall not indulge in pleasantries before making a comment, but it has been my personal privilege to serve with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] on our Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I have cherished our friendship. I also wish to commend the intellectual integrity with which the Senator presents his viewpoint. Later on in the debate I shall call attention to why we have agreed on the $1.25 an hour as a minimum. This is not the time for that discussion. However, the presumed inflationary spiral, which the Senator says would be accentuated if we should adopt a $1.25 minimum wage, has been emphasized.

Mr. President, it is estimated that the increased cost would be approximately $2,500 million or it could go as high as $2,900 million.

I ask the Senator from Arizona if it is a fact that this amount would actually be less than 1 percent of every payroll dollar in the United States? I ask him further if it is true that the amount would be only slightly more than one-half of 1 percent of the gross national product of the United States? Certainly my colleague will agree that these figures are correct. This would cause no dislocation of our economy. I believe this to be a valid viewpoint.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe that the Senator is correct in using the figure of 1 percent. I have not computed the percentage. But I must accept Mr. Meany's figures as being correct. He has no reason to make an incorrect statement. It may be one-half of 1 percent of the gross national product. I just do not happen to put much credence in the gross national product. I do not think it means a thing, and whether the percentage is one-tenth of 1 percent, one-half of 1 percent, 1 percent, or 2 percent of the gross national product, it can add to the inflationary pressures. I do not say that it absolutely would, but I say there is a danger. A 1-percent increase in the cost of living tacked on to the normal cost of living increases, plus the abnormal cost of living increases that we do not expect and do not look for, but which we have been receiving from time to time, could have a very bad effect. So I do not think we gain anything by saying, "It is only 1 percent," because no matter what it is, it does add to the inflationary pressures. I accept Mr. Meany's figures as being correct, but I do not accept the statement that $2 billion is the total cost. I do not think we have any real way of knowing. We have not been able to get any figures. I am going to try again this week to get some figures showing the total effect of the increase to a dollar.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand from reading the RECORD that the 2-billion-plus figure—I think it is nearer 3 billion—mentioned by Mr Meany related to his estimate of the added cost in the industries affected, and not to the total labor cost of the Nation, and does not take into account the competition between all industries for labor when they go after the same labor personnel, as has already been so fully mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. We do not know the total effect of this measure on the labor structure of the country.

I wish now to continue with this report submitted last year by Mr. Mitchell.

Nonetheless, the surveys present evidence of disemployment apparently related to the increase in the $1 minimum, despite the fact that the economy was rising at that time and there were increases in the general level of prices which facilitated adjustment to the $1 minimum. Employment tended to decline in the low-wage industries, and in most cases more markedly in those segments of the low-wage industries where wage rates had been increased most. * * *

The results of the studies undertaken by the Department suggest that the $1 minimum had substantial impact in the low-wage industries and that there is still a heavy concentration of workers at or near the minimum in the low-wage industries. In view of these conclusions, it is not determinative that prices, the wage level generally, and productivity have increased in the meantime. * * *

The minimum should be increased when it appears evident that it can be done without requiring generally rising prices to help effect the higher wages.

I think while much colloquy has separated this report, if my colleagues will read the RECORD tomorrow they will have a good understanding of what the Secretary of Labor has found out with only 1 year's study. I repeat that in my estimation, from my knowledge of the retail business, about a half a million people would be affected within 3 to 4 months after the act took effect.

The Department of Labor's report clearly shows that the increase in the minimum wage resulted in dismissal of least efficient workers and increased prices. The risk of curtailing employment through increasing the minimum rate at this time is far greater than it was in 1956–57. The industries most significantly affected by any increase in the statutory rate are generally highly competitive and tend to operate on small profit margins. The Congress must carefully weigh the effect of mandatory cost increases in terms of the operating margins of the affected industries based on their competitive position in the marketplace.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to get a clear understanding of the statement made by the Senator from Arizona a moment ago to the effect that in his judgment, based upon his own familiarity with business, about half a million people would be immediately affected. Does the Senator mean adversely affected, by losing their positions?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is my opinion that when this law is placed in effect, if it is placed in effect in the present form of the bill, approximate ly a half million people who are the least efficient workers, as the Secretary of Labor describes them, will lose their jobs. It is an unpleasant fact of life, but the average businessman in this country is pretty close to the wall so far as cutting expenses further is concerned. I can remember the day in the retail business when a 10-percent profit was not an unusual return. Today the average is about 2½ percent. The pad of some 7½ percent, with which the merchant used to be able to say, "Well, we will stop doing this; we will cut costs this way," is no longer there. Competition has removed it. High taxation has removed it, until today there is not much room to wriggle between the position and the wall. In fact, in the retail industry I am highly concerned about what any decline of sales would do over a period of, say, 6 months. I can remember that in the depression of 1929 our little business did not make any money for 5 years, but we survived. We got along. We could not do that any more, because the Government has taken away our ability to create surpluses. It has taken away our ability to be flexible; and the Government is now about to inject itself further into a very important cost part of the retail and service business.

So that we are approaching the day when, with lowered sales, a 10-percent reduction over a period of 6 months could do very serious damage to industry in this country. That is one of the reasons why we do not need to pile any more Government interference on any businesses in this country.

The country is still faced with inflationary pressures, and the Congress must consider the effect of an increase in the minimum wage in terms of its impact on the overall economy. The nature of the problem is illustrated in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare by Adm. John S. McCain who presented the views of the Department of Defense in reference to S. 1046. The following is taken from Admiral McCain's letter to the chairman:

As indicated in its title, S. 1046 would broaden the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, and would increase the minimum wage of employees covered by the act from $1 to $1.25 per hour. The Department of the Navy, in behalf of the Department of Defense, opposes certain features of S. 1046, but defers to the Department of Labor and the Bureau of the Budget on the broad economic and labor policies involved.

The Department of Defense points out that subject bill would place a certain number of the Department's contractors under coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act who are not now covered by the act because they are not engaged in commerce or the production of goods for commerce. Also, an increase of the minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act would have an upward influence upon all wages generally. Enactment of S. 1046 would, therefore, have a budgetary impact upon the Department of Defense by virtue of increased labor costs to contractors which would inevitably be passed on to the Department. The amount of such increased costs is not ascertainable to any realistic degree.

That is what I brought out earlier. We cannot say with any degree of complete accuracy what the total increased cost would be.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator mean by his last statement that we know that this raised minimum structure will project itself far beyond the industries directly affected, but that we do not know how far beyond?

Mr. GOLDWATER. There is no way to tell, without doing it, so as to know at one time all the job characteristics of hundreds of thousands of job classifications in this country. I do not believe there is any one man who has that ability. I think we can come to some general conclusions. I hope to have some figures relating to this subject before the debate ends.

Any increase in the statutory minimum wage must ultimately be reflected in an increase in all wages since unions have an obligation to their members to preserve existing differentials.

The Senator will recall that I have oftentimes during the discussion referred to the differentials which must be maintained. I suggest that it becomes the responsibility of union leaders to negotiate to keep these differentials as they are today, and not allow them to come closer and closer together.

The first witness heard was George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, who has appeared several times in support of an increased minimum wage and an extension of the act's coverage. A review of his testimony shows that Mr. Meany is well aware of the fact that any minimum wage set by Congress provides a floor for all wages and necessitates wage increases for all workers to maintain the differential for skilled workers. He said:

Let us begin by recognizing that the earnings of millions of American workers are keyed directly to the Federal minimum wage.

That statement comes from George Meany, president of AFL–CIO.

Mr. Max Greenberg, president, Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO, also said:

There obviously will be some upward pressure by those people who are today receiving $1.25 so that they will move forward. I am sure we want something like that to happen.

The reason we today consider the retail worker on the lowest rung of the economic ladder is because of the fact that we have so many who are making less than a dollar. If everybody was making a dollar and a quarter, obviously, when we went in to bargain for those people whom we have organized, we would be able to get them a fairly attractive wage.

These are two statements from prominent labor leaders who recognize that the wages of American workers are keyed directly to the minimum wage, and that any increase in the minimum wage means an increase in all wages.

I repeat that we cannot be against wage increases, per se. However, we must maintain a realistic position economically. When wage increases are not called for, to make them by government fiat, in effect, works a hardship on the economic system, and it works a hardship on the very people we are trying to help.

So these prominent labor leaders recognize that they must go to the bargaining table to get higher wages for those they represent. That is their responsibility. The labor movement recognizes the fact—and this is particularly true in the craft unions—that the differential has a great effect on American productivity, and they must maintain this differential. When the minimum wage becomes $1.25, the man who has an agreement calling for $1.50 feels that that is not enough of a differential to recognize his superiority. So the bargaining goes on, and he comes out with a higher wage. Our labor leaders know that.

The proponents of an increase in the minimum wage accept rising price levels as a necessary corollary of this legislation. The following colloquy between Senator GOLDWATER and Mr. Meany is significant:

Senator GOLDWATER. * * * Now, we are talking about a $1.25 minimum. I do not care what the figure is—$1.50 or $1.10, whatever it is. How long would it be before that would become an unbearably low minimum, since we would have to raise wages all the way up the scale—how long would it be before $1.25 became the 75 cents or 50 cents of today?

Mr. MEANY. I do not know how long it would be, but it would come inevitably. It has to come under our system and our economy. And if you look over the history of the economic progress here in America, I will admit it has got to come. We have a high wage-high price economy: and under that sort of an economy, we have the best standards in the world, comparatively speaking.

Now, you say how long will it be before the $1.25 becomes the 75 cents of 10 years ago. I don't know. But to me it is inevitable that it will come.

Here again we have the top labor leader of the United States recognizing an economic fact of life, that it will be one more Congress or two more Congresses before we are going to go through this same performance again. I believe that almost anyone could very intelligently take a project calendar and almost tell the year when we will be asked to raise the minimum wage again, because by artificial action by Government the present one has become an unliveable wage.

I do not care how much a man earns an hour, if he earns it. If a man can earn $100 an hour, he is entitled to be paid that. However, if he can earn only 50 cents an hour, he should not be paid $1.25 an hour.

Mr. George H. Kimball, who appeared on behalf of the National Retail Merchants Association, in his testimony before the subcommittee, said:

The inflationary aspect of an increased or extended Federal minimum wage also must be carefully examined. The imposition of a Federal minimum wage affects not only marginal workers earning less than the minimum, but all workers, if existing wage differentials are to be maintained.

We have an expression up there in the seaport where I live, "When the tide comes in all the costs go up." So, if you put in a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour for a beginner, a starter, or a learner, then your experienced people, you have got to pay them $2 or $2.50 an hour.

President Eisenhower a year ago asked us to try to keep our cost of business down and try not to raise our prices. Now, there are only one or two things that could possibly happen if this wage and hour law does go through affecting retailers; it would mean that we would have to either raise our prices or curtail our services.

Under sound personnel administration, an employer cannot raise the wage floor for the minimum skilled employe without making comparable adjustments up the line for higher skilled and more experienced workers.

Thus, the entire payroll must be adjusted upward if a sound wage structure, as well as good employee morale, are to be maintained. This is especially true in a personalized service business such as retailing.

We believe that high wages which result from increased productivity have provided Americans with the world's highest living standards. But high wages established by Government fiat and not accompanied by any increase in output can only result in economic disaster for all of us. Again, a colloquy between Senator GOLDWATER and Mr. Meany throws light on the direction in which this legislation would take us:

Senator GOLDWATER. You realize, of course, that if we do that, prices are going to go up. I think you mentioned they would go up 1 percent. But they are going to go up. Now, that is an unnatural increase in price. * * *

Mr. MEANY. An unnatural increase in price?

Senator GOLDWATER. It is an unnatural increase in that it was created by an act of Government rather than an act of the economic system. And aren't we today in some of our industries having trouble with unnatural price increases created by unearned wage increases?

Mr. MEANY. I do not agree.

Senator GOLDWATER. You do not agree with that?

Mr. MEANY. No.

Senator GOLDWATER. Well, let me cite an example of France. France had a 5-percent-per-year increase in her economy, I think, between 1952 and 1958. And that is a goal, I think, that some economists and some people in politics want to achieve in this country by Government intervention in the economic system. But France had an increase in the cost of living of 25 percent between 1956 and 1958.

Now, are we going to get ourselves in the same fix that France was in when she suddenly stopped Government intervention and went back to the natural laws?

Many of the newly covered employees would be in the retail and service industries. Again, the testimony by Mr. George H. Kimball is significant. He said:

Legislated wage increases ignore the basic economic principle that a true wage increase results only when accompanied by increased productivity and efficiency on the part of employees.

If not accompanied by increased productivity, they represent nothing more than added costs for the employer to assume. This added cost cannot be absorbed under existing retail margins without wiping away the profits of many stores and confronting others with serious operating losses.

The division of research of the Harvard Business School annually reports significant figures on department and specialty store operations. Figures for 1957 show a net profit after taxes for all department stores of only 2.8 percent.

It was less for smaller stores doing under a million dollars annual sales volume. In order to maintain existing profits or remain in business at all, retailers will be forced to raise the price of their goods to the consumer if competition permits. This invites then an inflationary effect, which not only nullifies the increase in purchasing power of those receiving the increased wages, but also decreases the purchasing power of the public as a whole.

Therefore, the extension of the Federal minimum wage to retailing carries the risk of precipitating two dreaded consequences: inflation and unemployment.

Proposals to divide the retail and service industries on the wage and hour issue by placing some under the Federal act while exempting others are both discriminatory and unsound.

Such proposals have been made many times before, but Congress wisely has seen fit to reject them. They are merely piecemeal or foot-in-the-door approaches designed to extend Federal controls in areas which properly rest with the individual States.

They are based on the assumption that size alone, whether measured by sales or number of units operated, represents ability and obligation to pay. They disregard the basic characteristics and competitive nature of retailing. No division of the industry, whether imposed on the basis of sales volume, number of units maintained, or type of ownership, can be effected without creating most serious inequities. Aside from the principles involved, such an approach would impose insurmountable administrative and enforcement problems. It is axiomatic that laws should not stand if they cannot be enforced.

Any such division of the trade would not only discriminate against the larger employer, but seriously injure the smaller employer, intended to be exempt.

Mr. President, I want to interject here an additional reason why American businessmen should not be encroached upon further by the Federal Government. Mr. Kimball touched on it lightly. I refer to the administrative and enforcement problems. The average retail business today has from one to a dozen employees who do nothing but fill out reports for the Federal Government. I can assure Senators that it is a never-ending task. This means the imposition of further administrative responsibilities on not only the retailer, but on all service trades and every other business covered by the act as well. It may not be a big burden to a large institution; but to a small institution, it is a big burden.

Furthermore, there is the constant danger of forgetting to file one of the reports. They are so multitudinous I cannot relate them all. It is necessary to file literally thousands of them with the Federal Government every year. If we forget one, we are liable to a fine; we are even liable to a jail sentence. This is an additional burden placed on American business which I do not believe should be placed on American business.

In many industries, increased productivity results from the equipment available to workers which increases their output. With most of the additional workers who would be covered by the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, it is difficult to increase their productivity through the application of more capital equipment. Hence, their coverage will either jeopardize their jobs or result in inflationary wage increases.

We believe that the time has come when increased productivity should be reflected in lower prices which will benefit all of America's consumers rather than in wage increases which exclude retired people and many others from participating in the fruits of America's growing economy.

This is another economic fact of life which is overlooked by the proponents of the measure. The whole intent of the free enterprise system is to provide lower prices, not higher prices. We do not want to go back to the days of the handmade automobile, or back to the days of the hand-sewn garment. We want to pass on the increases in profits and the increases in earnings to the American buying public, not constantly apply them to the wage earner.

Much of the trouble in which elderly people find themselves today certainly stems from the fact that we have not been passing on to the American public the increases in productivity which are reflected in lower prices. We should be doing this. We are not able to do it because of the demands of labor and now the demands of Government that we apply this increase only in the field represented by the wage earner.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am very happy that the Senator from Arizona has brought out this point, and has made it so clear that the increases in prices which have already been sustained throughout the operation of the minimum wage law undoubtedly will be larger if the proposed provision comes into existence as law, as shown by the report from Harvard, which the Senator has just read.

That very fact is the thing which is disturbing most of the elderly people of my State. The Senator, I think, knows that, with the exception of one or two other States, perhaps, my State has within its borders more elderly people who have retired, proportionately to its population, than any other State. Those people have noted the inflationary spirals, the never-ending increases in prices, with tremendous apprehension, because inflation destroys their ability to live on the basis on which they had prepared themselves to live, and on which they thought, under our American system, they were safe in expecting to live.

I think nothing would be more unforgivable of the Senate and Congress at this time, in considering this measure, than to forget the plight of millions of people who are not receiving public benefits, who have managed their economic lives with reasonable caution and care. Although they thought they could foresee reasonable independence for the rest of their lives, they now find that their ability to live comfortably is destroyed or impaired greatly by Government intervention.

I hope the Senator from Arizona will, over and over again, drive home that point. I do not believe the Senate, or anyone in Congress, wants to be unkind or thoughtless of this fact. Nevertheless, this inflationary spiral, which the two able and intelligent labor leaders, whom the Senator from Arizona has just quoted from the hearing record, admit is a part of the history, is destructive of the independence of millions of fine, elderly people in our country.

I think that is one of the arguments every Senator and every Member of the House of Representatives will want to recall before he casts a vote to increase this spiral, to increase the always upward level of prices, and substantially and further to impair, and in many cases destroy, the ability of elderly people to live in some degree of comfort off of their savings.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from Florida for that observation. Let me say that Arizona has a very high percentage of retired persons. Is it not a rather unusual paradox that we gather here for a special session, one aim of which is to pass a minimum wage law that will make it more difficult for the retired persons to live, and then we shall pass a law to take care of the medical expenses of the retired persons. I maintain that if the Federal Government had kept itself out of these fields that require inflation as the answer and destroy the plans of retired people, we would not have to concern ourselves with the plight of an unknown number of people over 65 years of age, as it relates to their medical expenses. In Arizona there are tens of thousands of people who very prudently during their lives provided funds on which they could retire. But after getting the funds, they find them insufficient to cover the costs of living. Who is to blame for that? I think the Congress and the Government have to take that blame, because one of the greatest forces acting on inflation is the Federal Government, and one of the greatest forces acting on increased costs in this country is the cost of conducting the Federal Government and the State and the local governments.

So here we sit, with a few days in which to act; and we are going to take care of those over 65 years of age, and then we are going to turn around and kick them in the pants. That does not make sense to me. A great many of these people will not be able to get along, as a result of the passage of this bill.

So what is the next answer? Then some Member of Congress introduces a bill to take care of the cost-of-living problems, in connection with their homes and everything else, of these people. The end result of all this will be that the Federal Government will take over.

Mr. George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, in his testimony before the subcommittee, showed a callous disregard for the jobs of those individuals who would be severed from the payroll if the minimum wage were raised beyond the point which an employer could meet. He said:

> Let's get practical about it. There is certainly a moral question here. Let me put it quite clearly. If a business for any reason at all, must base its existence on paying less than a decent wage, I say it has no right to exist. I think that is plain.

And again, in the following colloquy:

> Mr. MEANY. If his profit depended on paying less than the minimum wage, then I say he shouldn't be in business.
> Senator PROUTY. I am not talking about the minimum wage. I am talking about any wage, whether it be $2 an hour of $1.50 an hour. He has to show a profit in order to stay in business, and that means a profit on the services performed by each one of his employees. Isn't that logical?
> Mr. MEANY. Well, again I say I don't agree with you when you get to below a minimum wage.
> Senator PROUTY. You are saying if he is unable to pay a minimum wage, he should go out of business?
> Mr. MEANY. That is right.

I heard that colloquy, and it is difficult for me to believe that Mr. Meany meant that. He has come up the hard way in this world; he has worked all his life to get where he is; and I imagine there were times in his life when he worked for a wage below what he thought he should be receiving. But he had to have a job. In this country there are literally hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people who, as I said earlier, are not particularly concerned with what pay they receive. They want a job, and they will take a below minimum standard wage just to be employed—employed temporarily, probably, in many cases. But nevertheless, that fact exists. And regardless of this law, that fact will continue to exist.

I may say that in connection with the matter of salaries, I have made a number of studies among the people with whom I have worked at different levels during my life. I have listed 10 subjects which I thought were of importance to people working; subjects such as—although I hate to use the word—security, which means they will be working 10 or 20 years from now, and other subjects, such as conditions, salaries, and so forth. I have asked them to give to each one of them a number, to indicate their opinion of its importance in connection with their jobs. Salary has never gone above No. 7 in that connection, in my studies; and it will be found generally that salary is not the determining factor in looking for a job. If that were true, there probably would not be any ministers today, because the ministry is about as low paid a profession as any I know of; and many politicians would go out of this business—I do not now speak of it at this level—because most political levels pay too small a salary.

People go to work chiefly because they like the jobs. Certainly most of us in this body could do better economically on the outside. But we like politics; we think this is an expression of service to our country.

Similarly, a soldier certainly can make more money on the outside. A boy who flies a B–52 makes less than one-third of what is made by one who flies commercially the same aircraft, today. But the boy who flies the B–52 is not in a rush to get out of the service, for he feels he is doing something by being in the service, and that feeling is part of the remuneration of doing the job.

So, in my observation, a man does not go down a long list of jobs and pick out the highest paid one. He picks a job that he thinks he will like, a job in which he thinks he will render service, and in which he will be happy. So he goes to work. And if he does a good job, he will wind up making pay commensurate with the job.

Mr. Meany makes it abundantly clear that he is not concerned at all for those employees who would lose their jobs if their employer were forced out of business. I feel certain that employees who are the potential victims of Mr. Meany's program for unemployment do not share his views in this matter, and that whomever else he speaks for, he does not speak for them.

This view of Mr. Meany's, incidentally, is shared by at least one other member of the committee, who has also, on several occasions, asserted that there should be no exemptions of any kind from the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act; that every employee, without exception, employed in an enterprise engaged in any activity affecting interstate commerce, should be covered by the minimum wage law. Going even further, the same member has asserted that coverage should be based not on the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, but on the allegedly even broader basis of the Constitution's general welfare clause. This is a proposition of considerable legal dubiousness, which reflects, however, the reckless and irresponsible tampering with the essential structure of our free economy which characterizes so much of the proposed legislation in the welfare area. And earlier today I read part of the statements made last night by the Senator from Oregon which bear out, here on the floor, the statements to which I now refer, which were made in the committee.

Paradoxically, this same committee member, who had expressed opposition to any and all exemptions, on another occasion suggested that an exemption for a certain industry, particularly active in his own State, be left intact, thus removing the employees in that industry from the act's overtime provisions. In making this inconsistent suggestion, he pointed out that the labor unions operating in that particular industry preferred that the employees in the industry be denied the statutory benefits provided by the law. The reason for their attitude is a simple one: It would merely make it more difficult for the union to organize these employees. That is, union membership becomes less attractive in some industries when Government guarantees the employees a minimum wage.

This provides some indication that the zeal and enthusiasm with which organized labor supports increase and extension of the minimum wage, allegedly out of humanitarian concern for low-wage employees, may well be tempered where application of the statutory minimum wage would result in weakening the union. It raises some doubts about the genuineness of the professed concern of the leaders of organized labor for the welfare of unorganized workers, in contrast with their unquestioned concern for the strengthening of their unions.

It should also be noted that Mr. Meany's position that an employer who cannot afford to pay the statutory minimum wage should go out of business—with the necessarily consequent loss of jobs to his employees—is distinctly in conflict with the stated policy of the minimum wage law itself. Section 2(b) of the act states:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of this act, through the exercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, to correct and as rapidly as practicable to eliminate the conditions above referred to in such industries without substantially curtailing employment or earning power.

The committee bill does not modify this declaration of policy, and therefore we presume that its supporters do not intend to nullify it and sharply disagree with Mr. Meany. But we feel strongly that in retaining the stated congressional policy they are merely preserving the language while simultaneously destroying its content by means of many of the amendments contained in the committee bill.

In discussing an appropriate minimum wage, the impression has frequently been given that an entire family is basically supported by the wages earned by the recipient of the statutory minimum. We find that, in many cases, those who are not covered under the existing law, or those who are not earning the minimum wage, are new entrants into the labor market, part-time workers, or older people. The individuals affected are a constantly changing group.

> Senator PROUTY. Another question: How did you arrive at this figure of $1.25? Why wouldn't $1.50 be better?
> Mr. MEANY. Well this is a field where you've got to make a little progress. It is quite obvious that the minimum standard, the minimum yearly wage required for what we call a decent, normal standard of living is still going to be far above what this $1.25 will bring.
> In fact, the minimum is $4,200, isn't it?
> Mr. RUTTENBERG. It is $4,600.

The data to which Mr. Ruttenberg referred is based on a study prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics which was described as a city worker's family budget. Many of the employees covered by this legislation are not city workers, and they are not the sole support of a family. On the contrary, their earnings supplement those of others in the family, providing the entire family with an income far in excess of the minimum recommended by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Certainly, the Congress cannot legislate minimum living standards of $4,200, much less $4,600, for individuals or families based on the concept of a minimum wage for an individual worker.

I might inject here this one overlooked fact, that while in the retail field, in the lower end of it, we might say, the hourly rate of $1.81, which was the average in May, is not favorably comparable to the rates paid in construction and manufacturing, nevertheless the majority of these people work all year. I would say in most cases it will be found that the person who works all year has a better annual earning than the person who works on an hourly basis. Many union leaders are now recognizing this fact and are turning toward the guaranteed annual wage. I could discuss that subject at some later date, but I merely wanted to bring out the fact that what they are aiming this legislation at is, in many respects, a better field for making a living than the field of employment where a person works a week or two at a time, and then is off a week, or in an industry which depends on seasonal production.

Another view of the impact on wage differentials was given by Mr. H. B. Devinny, vice president and director of industrial relations of the Davison Chemical Co., Baltimore, Md., who appeared on behalf of the United States Chamber of Commerce. He declared:

> In its initial impact, minimum wage legislation will narrow down or eliminate some of the preexisting wage differentials above the minimum. But the law does not change the underlying realities that produced and sustain these wage differentials.
> These wage differentials are highly prized by working people and are highly useful in allocating and recruiting human resources of varying skills and talents, and in terms of risk and working conditions.
> Wage differentials exist in all societies and perform highly essential functions. They can be counted on to reassert themselves after a new minimum is fixed—to induce a spreading of upward changes in wage rates in general from those directly affected by the minimum wage law to others above the minimum not directly affected.
> It is generally agreed that minimum wage legislation both "jacks up" the whole wage rate structure and increases its rigidity. It is on the desirability of these effects that fundamental disagreement develops.
> Those who support increases in the minimum wage may be, wittingly or unwittingly, becoming underwriters of inflation. Why are labor leaders with few or even no members working at the minimum wage so interested in getting lawmakers to do their work for them?

Mr. Devinny answered this question by inserting an article from the New York Times of October 7, 1955. It read:

> Union locals in the garment industry were instructed today to seek a general wage increase for 150,000 workers when the Federal minimum wage goes to $1 an hour March 1. The mandate was issued by the general executive board of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL, at its semiannual meeting here. David Dubinsky, the union's president, said the wage drive was intended to counteract the "squeeze" that would be put on the industry's pay structure by the addition of 25 cents an hour to the Government-enforced wage floor.
> He explained it this way: When a worker now earning less than $1 an hour moves up to $1, the spread between his earning and those of workers making more than $1 will be narrowed. The union proposes to maintain the present balance between jobs by insisting that employers give workers in the over-$1 bracket increases proportionate to those the under-$1 group will get automatically.

It would be totally unrealistic for us to legislate in the general area of labor costs at a time when foreign competition is becoming increasingly important. Real wages based on productivity can be supported, but if, in our eagerness to aid those who are paid marginal wages, we destroy their opportunities for employment in competition with workers abroad, we will have performed a great disservice to the American people.

The most striking feature of this country's economic history has been the virtually continuous improvement in the real wages of Americans, and in the standards of living based upon them. We are eager to see this process accelerate. However, we do not believe that Federal legislation can guarantee higher standards of living or employment.

Considering all of the adverse effects an increase in the minimum wage rate at this time would have on the thousands of small businesses, and especially the workingman whom this bill is intended to benefit, we are unalterably opposed to any legislation which would increase the present statutory minimum rate of $1 per hour.

EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

We have already discussed the effects on employment. I should like to pursue it a little further here.

Many individuals would prefer to earn what might be regarded by some as a low wage than be totally unemployed. We must maintain a reasonable balance between minimum wages and employment possibilities.

The Congress has enacted measures to assist the States in financing of their unemployment compensation programs. We have an obligation not to add to unemployment by imposing burdens on employers which will only result in adding to the unemployment rolls in those areas where wage levels are low and where unemployment is also at peak levels.

There are countless groups of employees in areas which for one reason or another are encountering economic distress who would prefer to see their present employers remain in business than to be forced to accept relief or unemployment compensation because the Congress had established a minimum wage which their employers could not pay and still remain in business.

I favor wages based on human needs which are consistent with maintaining employment opportunities. The evidence presented to the committee shows that a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour for a vastly increased coverage will jeopardize the employment opportunities of many individuals who are now performing useful work, maintaining their self-respect, and advancing their economic status through acquiring experience in industries paying the present minimum wage.

The American economy is faced with increasing foreign competition which requires that every effort be exerted to increase efficiency in manufacturing and similar occupations. Industrial output has increased much more rapidly than employment. Hence, it is essential that job opportunities be created in the other segments of our economy, including the services, which are assuming increasing importance, so that workers displaced by automation and improved technological processes will not join the ranks of the unemployed.

It is apparent to any observer of the American scene that most new office buildings and apartments have automatic elevators since the higher wage scales which were demanded by the building service employees have permanently displaced elevator operators from their jobs. Similarly, automatic vending machines and simplified distribution systems in supermarkets which minimize the need of clerks are proceeding at a rapid pace.

It is proposed that even laundries be included under the broadened coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The problems of applying Federal legislation to purely local activities were presented to the committee by Mr. Andrew Broaddus, the president of the Capital Laundry & Dry Cleaning Co., of Louisville, Ky., who appeared on behalf of the American Institute of Laundering. He said:

> We would call to your attention testimony presented to this committee in 1957 by Mr. Forest I. Neal, Jr., president of Old Colony Laundries, Quincy, Mass. Mr. Neal made the following points:
> 1. That our business is purely local in character.
> 2. That the area of competition between laundries is a small one indeed.
> 3. That laundries do not inject goods into the stream of interstate commerce.
> 4. That our principal competition is our own customer, the housewife, because these very customers can readily do this work for themselves if our prices and our services are out of line, and not satisfactory.
> 5. That laundries are truly small businesses.
> 6. That laundries have an extremely high percentage of labor costs currently being from 62 to 66 percent of every sales dollar.
> These statements were made to congressional committees 2 years ago by Mr. Neal and many other representatives of the American Institute of Laundering and are not less true today. In fact there are many additional factors which emphasize the purely local character of this business.
> I point out specifically the newest threat to the unemployment of more than 225,000 people in the form of neighborhood coin-operated laundry-machine installations. These plants employ no labor and as a result undersell our service industry which has the labor costs in addition to the investment on the part of the owner.

As I have stated previously, automation, in this case the coin-operated laundry machine, is in competition with laundry workers regardless of any statutory edict.

Any rapid and sudden increase in coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act which will accelerate this trend will cause serious hardship for countless individuals.

Again, Mr. President, I draw on my own experience of a lifetime. There are many, many departments in the average American store today, of any type, which can sell merchandise by automation. For instance, the notions department, where our wives buy thread, needles, ribbons, and so forth, is such that every item in the department could be sold by automatic vending machines. Much of the merchandise sold at a cosmetics department could be sold by vending machines. Much of the merchandise displayed in a men's department, in a haberdashery, could be sold by vending machines.

The retailers of America do not like to use vending machines, because they lose a part of the personal contact which has made them an integral part of our whole system of manufacturing and selling, but exactly as this has happened in the laundry business so it will happen in the retail business, and we will find vending machines replacing people. This is not simply an idle statement on my part. I think today some of the most profitable investments on the stock market are to be found in the companies making vending machines, because there has been such a tremendous increase in the demand for the machines.

Mr. President, an examination of the committee bill shows that businesses brought under the act would be confronted with a far greater wage cost increase than one might expect. It would not only involve raising the wages of those earning less than the minimum, but would also mean an upward wage adjustment for higher paid employees. To absorb the cost of an increase the small merchant or retailer is faced with two alternatives: to increase his prices or reduce the number of his employees. In fact, there may be a third alternative—he can go out of business. It is often impossible for an individual manufacturer to pass added costs on to the consumer by increasing the price of his product. An increase in the price of his product might well place it out of competition with similar products or might cause the consumer to purchase a substitute product. If an employer is forced to reduce his staff in order to meet the additional expense, the result is increased unemployment throughout the Nation.

THE DEFINITION OF "ACTIVITY AFFECTING COMMERCE"

Mr. President, I have commented on this before, but I wish to go into it again because I think it is really the dangerous part of the legislation proposed. I refer to the definition of "activity affecting commerce."

The committee bill, subject to certain limitations based on dollar volume of business, extends coverage to "enterprises engaged in any activity affecting commerce." This phrase is defined in the bill to include "any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in commerce."

The Congress has drawn definite boundaries within which it intended minimum wage protection was to be applied. To expand these boundaries indefinitely would obliterate any distinction under the law between interstate and intrastate commerce. This new coverage provision would give the Federal Government drastically broad authority over local and intrastate businesses. Furthermore, because of this deep Federal encroachment into the "intrastate commerce" of the States it raises serious questions about the constitutionality of the new coverage proposals in the area of wage regulation. True, the Supreme Court has sustained the constitutionality or equally broad Federal jurisdiction in the National Labor Relations Act, which deals with labor disputes which Congress has found to constitute a burden on, or an interruption of, or an interference with interstate commerce. But there are serious questions whether such broad Federal jurisdiction is equally lawful in an area such as the regulation of peacetime wages. The contrast in scope between the new proposals and the present jurisdictional standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act is so great as to be shocking. The present law applies only to employees who are actually engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce. The proposed coverage would regulate the wages of many employees whose connection with interstate commerce is either remote or nonexistent.

In analyzing the scope of the new coverage proposed by S. 1046, the original from which the committee bill developed, Mr. Eugene B. Sydnor, president of Southern Department Stores, Inc., a member of the Virginia State Senate, speaking for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, made the following statement:

As a State legislator I am very conscious of the provisions of the Federal Constitution that assign to the Federal Government in fields of business and trade control of interstate commerce.

Under our constitutional form of government, powers not delegated to the Federal Government are reserved to the States and these include supervision of local or intrastate commerce.

However, S. 1046 proposes by Federal action to apply nationwide uniform regulations to these basically local activities, and if enacted could mark the passing of the last frontier between the proper legal functions of State governments and an all-powerful Federal bureaucracy constantly extending its power.

Furthermore, another extremely undesirable nature of the fundamental change proposed by S. 1046, is involved in the fact that 29 State governments have already enacted minimum wage laws which properly concern intrastate and local trade.

It, therefore, cannot be said that this is a field in which the States have failed to act. It would appear that supporters of S. 1046 propose this drastic change in the relationship between State and Federal Governments since they wish to force one overall standard on all business and trade no matter how widely needs and conditions vary in each of our 50 States.

I firmly believe that the State legislatures are the proper bodies to take any necessary action and correct any inequities that may exist in this field.

He further stated that extended coverage would jeopardize employment opportunities in retail and services trades. He said:

Retailing, for example, offers comparatively good employment stability, as was evidenced during the recent recession. From August 1957 to June 1958, retail employment declined only 1 percent, while manufacturing employment dropped 12 percent.

Also, the retail and service trades are perhaps the major fields for employment of the inexperienced young beginners and older workers, those generally less productive employees, often working on a part-time basis. Nationwide, according to the U.S. Department of Labor, part-timers account for about one-fourth of total nonsupervisory employment in retailing. Most of these employees would be unemployable if they were deprived of employment opportunities in retailing.

All of this—the general employment stability and the opportunities for inexperienced employees—would be seriously jeopardized by extension of Federal minimum wage provisions to the retail and service trades.

As employers are forced to make staff reductions to keep total labor costs in line, the inexperienced employees would be the first to go, followed by others whose productivity is not on a par with the mandatory wage level. Since a great many of these employees could not hope to gain other employment, they would thus be forced out of the labor market entirely.

It seems most unwise to gamble with legislation such as Senate 1046 which undoubtedly would add still more people to the unemployment ranks, thus depriving them of a source of income.

It is estimated that the number of additional employees which will be covered by the proposed amendments will total more than 5 million people. They include not only retail establishments but service industries of a purely local nature including laundries, local transit, and construction. We cannot subscribe to the concept that any of these enterprises are engaged in interstate commerce. Certainly, employees engaged in these activities should be protected by adequate laws enacted by the several States, and there is no reason why the Congress should encroach upon the prerogatives of State legislatures who are in a position to enact legislation which will meet the peculiar local requirements which, of necessity, must vary in each of our 50 States.

The bill would include the employees of local transit companies. Testimony before the subcommittee clearly shows that there are approximately 40 cities in which the dominant transit system is publicly owned and operated. These include New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Detroit, Cleveland, Boston, San Francisco, and Seattle. The employees of these publicly owned systems constitute more than 30 percent of the total employees in the local transit industry. They would not be affected by any changes in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The Congress is aware of the difficulties confronting this industry as evidenced by Public Law 757 enacted by the 84th Congress granting a franchise to the District of Columbia Transit System, Inc.

Furthermore, the Congress has exempted the transit industry from the most recent 1-cent increase in the Federal gasoline tax as a recognition of the extreme problem confronting the transit industry through reduced patronage and steadily rising costs. It is fairly obvious in a regulated industry where increases in rates require the approval of governmental authorities that an increase in labor costs can only result in unemployment, poor service, or bankruptcy.

Our opposition to Federal encroachment on States rights in no way supports inadequate State laws. The following colloquy between Senator GOLDWATER and Mr. Meany expresses our views:

Senator GOLDWATER. I have gone before the legislature of my State the last five terms and begged them to raise that minimum wage.

Mr. MEANY. And still you sit here and say that it should be left to the States.

Senator GOLDWATER. I say it should be left to the States. And I also said this to you, if you remember——

Mr. MEANY. How many years will you have to go to the legislature before you decide something should be done here?

Senator GOLDWATER. Let me finish—and then I will try to answer the other questions you have put to me. I have also told the States if they did not act in this field, the Federal Government will have to act in this field.

So I am not sitting here as a complete advocate of State rights. I recognize the need for meeting minimum wages, just as well as you do. I approach it in a different way.

INJURIOUS EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESSMEN

We believe that any change in the present definition of "activity affecting commerce" as is proposed by the committee bill would bring thousands of local, small businesses within the act and impose requirements on them that would result in severe curtailment of employment. We recommend the present law remain unchanged.

As we have already indicated, the inclusion of retail and service industries, laundries, construction firms, and local transit companies imposes burdens on numerous small firms who are not in a position to assume these burdens and remain in business. The problems of the small businessman in meeting the requirements of this proposed legislation were discussed during the course of the hearings.

Since the bill would exempt employees in enterprises with sales less than a given amount, it would have a very arbitrary impact upon different industries. A few salespeople could readily account for the minimum specified in the bill in terms of jewelry or furs. On the other hand, a far larger number would be required to produce an equivalent amount of sales in cosmetics, drugs, and similar products.

Small businessmen in competition with chainstores and other larger firms must meet prevailing wage scales if they are to attract and retain competent employees. The dollar exemptions provided in the proposed legislation are meaningless inasmuch as every small firm, regardless of its size, will have to conform to the minimum wage imposed on its larger local competitor.

Senator PROUTY expressed serious concern at the problem confronting the small businessman who must expand if he is to maintain his position in the competitive world.

He said:

And so we are trying to arrive at a fair average which will enable the small businessman to stay in business.

The Congress in recent years has given serious concern to the problems which confront small business in assuming its proper role in our ever-changing economy. The imposition of higher minimum wages and the inclusion of millions of presently uncovered employees, most of whom are employed by small business firms, will have a serious effect on the survival of the small business community. Small business receives no benefit if the Congress conducts studies through the small business committees of both houses on its special problems if it simultaneously imposes insuperable burdens through legislative fiat.

While we have been principally concerned with the impact of this proposed legislation on small business firms, its enactment will involve a substantial increase in the budget and personnel of the Department of Labor charged with the enforcement of this legislation.

The President requested more than $11 million for the Wage and Hour Division in the Department of Labor in the 1960 budget. The average number of employees recently was in excess of 1,300. Expanding the coverage of this act will necessarily entail a large increase in personnel to develop interpretations for newly covered industries and to insure compliance.

At a time when every effort is being made to reduce unnecessary budgetary expenses, we cannot lightly accept the imposition of these additions to the budget which the record does not indicate would serve any useful service.

Mr. President, before I conclude this part of the discussion—and I have quite a bit more to present before I do so—I wanted to mention one thing that the proponents of this bill constantly overlook in discussing the retail field. About 26 percent of the dollar of the housewife goes to retail establishments such as department stores.

In addition to their salaries, commissions, and so forth, those who work in such retail establishments receive a very decided advantage in the purchase of needed items, such as clothing, through substantial discounts given by firms. The discount varies. I know some retail stores that give their employees merchandise at cost. I know others that give them merchandise at cost plus 10 percent, or cost plus 20 percent. If we realize that 26 percent of the employee's dollar will be spent in an establishment such as the one in which he or she is working, we can very readily see that that particular employee is making far more than what he receives in his pay envelope.

This is something which has been entirely overlooked by the proponents of the legislation, by those who charge that the retail industry pays an abnormally low salary. That is a charge which I do not agree with, and which no figures can substantiate.

ANALYSIS OF SPECIFIC PROVISIONS OF THE COMMITTEE BILL

AMENDMENTS CHANGING THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

As the law stands today, it applies only to an employee who is himself engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce, so that some employees of an employer may be covered and others not. Under the proposed bill, however, coverage would be tremendously expanded as follows:

First, the wage and overtime provisions—sections 6 and 7 of the act—are made applicable not only to those employees presently covered but also to all employees employed in any of the following enterprises which are engaged in any activity affecting commerce: First, retail and service enterprises having gross annual sales of at least $1 million; second, laundries and drycleaning enterprises having gross annual sales of at least $1 million, third, local transit enterprises; fourth, construction industry establishments having gross annual sales of at least $350,000; fifth, any establishment besides those which are part of an enterprise just listed doing a gross annual business of at least $250,000 and having at least one employee engaged in interstate commerce or the production of goods for interstate commerce; and sixth, any gasoline service establishment having annual gross sales of not less than $250,000.

Second, the term "activity affecting commerce" is defined in a new section 3(s) about as broadly as possible, and significantly, much more broadly than under the Taft-Hartley Act. Thus, it is defined to include any activity "necessary to commerce."

The above changes themselves bring about a very wide expansion of coverage. As the Supreme Court has noted, the present coverage of the act is not coextensive with the limits of congressional power over interstate commerce. But under the above changes, it would be impossible to conceive of any business within the congressional power over interstate commerce that would not be covered so long as it did a gross annual business of $250,000 or more.

This is important for Senators to recognize, that while we provide specific exemptions, these exemptions can be and will be destroyed by the phrase "affecting commerce."

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BUSH. Does the phrase "affecting commerce" imply interstate commerce at all times? The language in the bill is "activity affecting commerce." My question is whether that means commerce or interstate commerce. If it means interstate commerce, why does not the bill so state?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will read the definition contained in the bill:

"Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in commerce.

Heretofore the act has not had such broad application as the language contained in the Taft-Hartley Act, which referred only to interstate commerce. Now the language is "affecting commerce." I defy anyone to tell me a single activity in this country that does not affect commerce.

Mr. BUSH. I have read the bill, so I am quite familiar with it. When I read that language in the bill the question came up in my mind whether "activity affecting commerce" implied interstate commerce. One would think it must so imply, because the Federal Government does not have power to regulate intrastate commerce, but only interstate commerce.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is getting to a part of the bill which I think is very dangerous. Under the act, if passed, the Government would have the right to regulate business which is purely intrastate in nature and intent, by applying the definition contained in the act. The Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended, contains a definition of commerce. It states in section 3(b):

(b) "Commerce" means trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or from any State to any place outside thereof.

Mr. BUSH. We must assume, therefore, that interstate commerce is implicit in the language "affecting commerce."

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. The only reason Congress has for acting in this field is the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BUSH. I know that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not agree with the philosophy of the Government's regulating wages. However, if I did, I would certainly want to strike from any bill language as broad as "activity affecting commerce." If it merely said "commerce" and it contained the definition of section 3(b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, those who agree with that approach could find no quarrel with it. Those disagreeing with it, could find a quarrel with any part of it.

This is the broadest possible language. It is the broadest interpretation ever placed by the Supreme Court upon the responsibility of Congress under the commerce clause. As I said earlier, the boy who shines shoes in Phoenix, Ariz., and who buys a can of shoe polish made in Ohio, is affecting commerce, and could come under the definition of this phrase.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact that one of the most disturbing factors about this whole subject is that there are so many businesses affecting commerce in some way, perhaps in some minor way only, which will never know, until a case affecting them has gone to our highest Court and been passed upon, whether they are indeed and in fact within the purview of the act?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I believe the Senator is right, although I think existing decisions of the Supreme Court are broad enough so that a businessman can pretty well judge whether or not he would come under the term "affecting commerce."

Let us take, for example, a small shoe store in Miami, Fla., which buys its shoes in St. Louis. If it were left under the definition that now exists, it would be pretty hard to stretch the language to apply in this case. The Supreme Court would have to work overtime to stretch it that far. Of course it can do a great deal of stretching, but I doubt that it could stretch that far to include a little shoe store in Miami.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact that those decisions of the Supreme Court referred to by the distinguished Senator, which pronounce the doctrine that a business "affecting commerce" might come within the interstate commerce clause, have to do with other subjects and other fields than the fields covered by the Wage and Hours Act?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Oh, yes; they apply to the Labor Relations Board and its problems.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that in this field Congress has very carefully avoided going into such a broad and controversial coverage by the very definitions that it used in 1938 in the passage of the law and in 1949 in the amendments of the law, and in the other amendments which I believe did not go quite so far in this field as did the original enactment or the 1949 amendments?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. The Senate and Congress have a long history of care and restraint in this field.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that in 1949, when some of the zealous advocates of greater Federal Government tried to plunge this act into a much greater field of activity, one of the things they did was to try to use this more general and more argumentative term affecting commerce? And is it not true that the Senate at that time rejected that effort by a vote of better than 2 to 1, after extensive debate?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was not present at the time; but in reading the history of the act, I certainly must agree that that happened. In fact, there were other occasions when the Senate resisted the efforts of the proponents to put into the act language affecting commerce.

While I disagree completely with the whole philosophy of Federal regulation of wages, even if I agreed with it, I would have to resist to my utmost the term "activity affecting commerce." To me, this opens up the door for Federal regulation of wages and prices and of conducting all business.

I can see no end to the Federal Government's following through, if they get this crack in the door of our economic system. I think it is the most dangerous thing contained in the bill. We can forget all about the inflationary aspects; we can forget all about the unemployment problems which exist; but when we get into activities affecting commerce, we are just about destroying the 10th amendment of the Constitution.

While the courts have been attacking that amendment, while the proponents of centralized government attack that amendment, while the proponents of Federal everything attack that amendment, the 10th amendment, to me, is the keystone of our Republic. If that goes, we go. I think that this is probably the opening wedge, the opening of the door, to completely negating the amendment to the Constitution which provides clearly that the powers not given to the Federal Government shall remain with the States. Certainly a State has the right to regulate the commerce which goes on within its borders. The Federal Government has no right to step into any State and to regulate the business which is carried on within that State's borders.

However, under the definition "activity affecting commerce," the Federal Government not only can regulate the business within a State; it will. I can see those bureaucrats sitting downtown now, licking their chops. They are going to go into the 50 States, not with 1,500 employees; this will be one of the greatest bureaucratic plums in the history of bureaucratic government. They are ready to hammer the businessmen of the United States over the head and make a socialized economy.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true, as shown by the excellent address being delivered by the Senator from Arizona, upon which I compliment him, that even those who suggested the original minimum wage bill, the distinguished former President, President Roosevelt, and the distinguished present Justice of the Supreme Court, then Senator Black, made it very clear in the original presentation of the act that they wanted to preserve and keep inviolate from Federal intervention, from Federal control, those businesses which are carried on, in the main, within State lines?

Mr. GOLDWATER. They were extremely careful to make certain that the language of the act applied only to those businesses which the Constitution gives Congress not only the right but also the obligation to regulate. They had no intention of doing otherwise. I cannot find, from a reading of the legislative history, any intent to expand the commerce interpretation in the broad way that the bill now before us has expanded it.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact that if this entering wedge, taking over some 5 million employees and the businesses which employ them, which are included afresh in this field of Federal jurisdiction by the terms of the bill, becomes an actuality; if this definition which is a part of the bill is enacted under the same philosophy, the field of extension of control of the Federal Government to employers and employees generally in businesses that have customarily been regarded as intrastate commerce or State commerce, and are at this time preserved from Federal regulation and control under the present Wage and Hours Act, would be so generally opened that the Federal Government could go into any of them upon the mere inclusion of a minor amendment in the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from Florida is absolutely correct. Again, this is the danger. Let us forget that we are talking about increased coverage and a $1.25 minimum wage, or what the bill will do for people who are working, or what it will do about inflation.

This is the gimmick in the bill which frightens me more than anything I have seen in legislation since I have been in this body, in the last 8 years.

This, to me, is exactly what the proponents of an all powerful Government have been looking for. This is about the last field where they do not have power to work into our businesses and into our States. They have been able to get into the communications system and the transportation system, but we have been able to prevent them from meddling with purely local business because of the 10th amendment and because of the definition of commerce contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended.

But pass this bill, and there will be no end of Federal intervention.

I hope amendments will be made to the bill. The end of this type of legislation is Federal control. We cannot control one segment of the American economy—wages—without eventually controlling prices, because the two are very closely related.

As one Member of this body has suggested, we have heard a suggestion on the floor that the Federal Government pay the salaries of those people who work for employers who feel that they cannot pay the increased rate and stay in business. I do not know of any broader interpretation of socialism than that. I do not know of any better way to destroy the American free enterprise system than to allow the meddling hand of the Federal Government, be it under a Republican or a Democrat administration, to reach down into the Senator's State of Florida, my state of Arizona, the State of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], the State of California, or any other State, and start fooling around with the business structure, which the Constitution never intended the Federal Government should even come close to.

I think this provision is so dangerous that all Senators should read it and understand what its effect would be. Then they should cogitate seriously as to whether they want to have such a provision contained in the act. Efforts will be made to strike this provision. I hope they will be successful, because I think the meaning of our Constitution has been attacked long enough. The Constitution will not stand much more tampering before it falls apart.

I recall that I put my hand on the Bible when I came here and swore to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. If this provision is not an enemy of our Constitution, I do not know what it is. I cannot conscientiously vote for legislation which will destroy one of the most important amendments of the Constitution—the 10th amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact that the philosophy embraced in the prospect of extending the field of Federal regulation to businesses has always been regarded as State and intrastate business, and that its enactment is an open invitation to the Federal Government to exercise jurisdiction, control, supervision, and regimentation over all the businesses of our Nation, including both employers and employees, in the most plenary way?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is not only an invitation, it is a beautifully engraved invitation. It can be misunderstood by no one. Those people in Government and outside Government, who want to centralize all power on the banks of the Potomac, must be enraptured today by the thought that they might get this gimmick through the Senate of the United States. I do not believe the Senate will accept this proposal.

Mr. HOLLAND. I certainly hope the Senator is correct in his appraisal of the sentiment of the Senate. I commend him warmly. I think that not only his speech as a whole, but this particular part of the speech, especially, is rendered in the best tradition of patriotic Americanism. I commend the Senator with all my heart.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida. He has always recognized, more quickly, I think, than most of us, the dangerous gimmicks which are hidden in some of the proposed legislation which comes before us. It is to his eternal credit that he has fought, ever since he has been a Members of the Senate, to keep this Government within its constitutional bounds.

I shall continue with my critical analysis of the bill.

Third, the bill in major part does not simply cover the particular establishment which is in interstate commerce or producing goods for interstate commerce or engaged in an activity affecting interstate commerce. Rather, it covers the entire enterprise of the employer—even those of his establishments not so engaged.

These several changes, it would appear, expand the concept of interstate commerce beyond such concept as found in any existing Federal law.

As pointed out above, the bill is extraordinarily far reaching in expanding the coverage features of the act. It would cover the following presently noncovered employees:

First. Employees of an employer in the construction business who are engaged in erecting, maintaining, or repairing dwellings, apartments, hotels, churches, schools, and new factory buildings. It would simply be necessary to show that the employer's enterprise has some activity somewhere which affects commerce and that his enterprise does a gross annual business of $350,000. A substantial segment of those in the construction industry would satisfy these tests, because many of them have at least one employee who receives some materials from out of the State, and do a gross annual business of at least $350,000.

Second. All employees of virtually all wholesale establishments even if they deal exclusively with the wholesaler's goods after they have come to rest at his place of business. It would be a rare wholesale establishment which did not have a gross annual business of at least $250,000 and which did not have at least one employee receiving goods from outside the State.

Third. All employees of banks, insurance companies and real estate firms, many of whom are presently not covered because they are not themselves engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce.

Fourth. All employees of hospitals, most of whom are presently not covered. Most hospitals certainly do a business of at least $250,000 a year and have at least one employee receiving supplies from outside the State.

The bill would also cover all the following, if the establishment had one employee receiving goods from outside the State and did a gross business of $250,000 per year:

First. All employees of local fertilizer companies engaged in selling all their fertilizer to local farmers within the State.

Second. All employees engaged in providing residential, eating or other living facilities for other workers.

Third. All employees of local window-cleaning companies doing business wholly within the State.

Fourth. All employees of a local independent nursery concern.

Fifth. All employees of a local exterminator service firm, who work solely within the State exterminating pests in private houses, apartments, hotels, barbershops, colleges, and hospitals.

Sixth. All employees of a local architectural firm.

The foregoing examples are illustrative only. Prior to the 1949 amendments to the act, all these activities were construed by the Administrator and the courts to be within the act's coverage. Congress was alarmed by this expansion of coverage into local areas through administrative and judicial fiat. In the 1949 amendments, Congress made clear its displeasure with these and similar interpretations and amended the act so as to establish beyond doubt that the law was not to be considered applicable to them or any other local activities. It directed the Administrator instead to apply the law within the bounds originally contemplated, which did not include local business—see House Conference Report No. 1453, 81st Congress, 1st session, pages 14 and 15.

The present bill would not only turn back the clock and once again make all these activities subject to the act, but would go further and cover virtually all business.

As already noted the bill would apply to the employees of virtually all wholesalers—even those who deal with goods after they came to rest at the wholesaler's place of business. But such employees would have their minimum wages and maximum hours set according to the sliding scale set forth in the bill, viz: first year, $1 per hour and no limitations as to workweek; second year, $1.05 per hour and 44 hours per week; third year, $1.15 per hour and 42 hours per week; fourth year and thereafter, $1.25 per hour and 40 hours per week.

On the other hand, other employees of the wholesaler—those who are themselves engaged in interstate commerce because they receive or unload goods received from outside the State or keep books as to the receipt of such goods—would be entitled to wages of $1.15 per hour immediately upon the effective date of the act, $1.20 a year later, and to $1.25 per hour 2 years later and thereafter. Also, overtime compensation would be payable to them after 40 hours of work in a week.

The same injustices would exist in virtually every establishment which had some employees not themselves engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce and other employees who were so engaged, for example, banks, insurance companies, and real estate companies. It is not too much to say that this discriminatory effect would be felt in virtually the entire gamut of American industries.

II. DISCRIMINATIONS, INEQUITIES, INCONSISTENCIES, AND OTHER DEFECTS

The separation of enterprises into covered or noncovered categories on the basis of a volume-of-business test is unfair and arbitrary. There is no showing that this test bears any relationship to an enterprise's ability to pay the higher wage or that it otherwise comes to grip with realistic business factors. The former employee test of commerce applied whatever the volume of business. To depart from this test and substitute an arbitrary dollar figure for all enterprises is clearly unsound and harshly discriminatory.

The dollar-volume test for determining coverage of the retail and service industries will not bear scrutiny. Employees of a local business which does an annual volume of $1 million, are likely to have the same working conditions as employees of a local business which does a smaller annual volume, so that there is no basis to discriminate between the two. But under the bill, the independent dry goods store or department store doing an annual volume of under $1 million will not be covered by the act, while the dry goods store or department store across the street, which does an annual volume of $1 million will be covered and ultimately subject to a $1.25 minimum and premium pay for overtime.

Section 3(m) of the committee bill excludes from the term "wage," board and lodging which is not covered as a part of a collective bargaining agreement covering particular employees such as those working on construction projects in Alaska. The purpose of this section is clearly to exclude these fringe benefits from being considered for overtime purposes. Yet when the minority offered an amendment which would have exempted any employee who was represented by a certified collective bargaining agent, it was roundly defeated by the majority on the grounds that an employee should not be denied the protection of the act simply because a collective bargaining contract provides for less than the prevailing minimum.

Section 3(t)(3) provides coverage of enterprises engaged in operating streetcar and bus lines without any dollar limitation. Every other section of the proposed new coverage provides a dollar cutoff to determine those covered and those not covered. The minority offered an amendment bringing the local transit industry in line with all the other proposed new coverage sections, but it was not agreed to, without any reason being advanced as to why this industry should be covered completely while other industries growing below a certain volume of sales remained uncovered. Discrimination also exists in the treatment of employees within the same industry since those transit companies, municipally owned, would not be covered inasmuch as the term "employer" excludes from its definition any State or political subdivision of a State. Thus, competing transit lines operating in the same geographical area would be treated differently under the committee bill if one were privately owned and the other municipally owned, while taxicab companies enjoy a complete exemption.

Section 3(t)(4) deals with the construction or reconstruction industry. The committee bill originally contained a section covering construction enterprises having annual gross sales in excess of $50,000, but an amendment was adopted to strike out this provision. However, because of the fact that many construction firms would thereby have been covered under another provision, thus in part negating the amendment adopted by the committee, the minority moved to add a provision designed not to increase coverage in the construction industry. This proposal would have carried out what appeared to be the intent of the committee. Instead of adopting the proposal, the committee reversed itself by reinstating coverage for a substantial segment of the construction industry. However, instead of placing a $250,000 limitation on construction establishments, the limitation which applies to all other covered establishments, the figure was set at $350,000, thus destroying such uniformity of treatment as is extended to other industries falling under this provision. While it is true that $350,000 is just as arbitrary a figure as $250,000, there is no visible reason why such arbitrariness should not at least possess the virtue of uniformity.

Section 3(t)(5) was added by an amendment offered in committee. This amendment was adopted as a substitute for the minority's proposal to grant a complete exemption from the overtime and minimum wage provisions for employees of gasoline service stations. The intended effect of the committee amendment is to exclude from coverage all individual gasoline stations regardless of the ownership of the station. Many large oil companies own and operate chains of gasoline service stations. Every one of these stations which has less than $250,000 in annual gross sales would not be covered under the committee amendment. Thus, a station doing $249,000 annually, which is part of a large chain, would have a competitive advantage over a small independently owned Main Street station located next door, doing $251,000 a year. Here is a perfect illustration of the inconsistency contained in this act; employees of a station which is part of a giant oil company are not given the protection of the act while a small independent competitor must pay all his employees at least the minimum wage. Even more startling, in this light, is the treatment accorded an amendment offered by the minority prior to the adoption of the above.

This amendment would have provided an exclusion from coverage for all retail and service establishments doing less than $250,000 in annual gross sales. Its purpose was to protect those retail and service enterprises, some of whose establishments are located in small communities and practically all of whose sales are made not only within the State, but within a local market area. This amendment, which applied to the whole broad field of retail and service was emphatically rejected by the majority. Yet the committee adopted the principle of the minority amendment, but limited it solely to gasoline service station establishments, which is so poorly drafted that it probably does achieve its intended purpose. No evidence of any kind whatsoever was ever submitted justifying such discriminatory treatment of retail and service businesses outside the oil industry.

Equally unsound is the proposition that coverage should be extended to an entire establishment merely because one employee in the establishment is covered. If it is desired to cover the entire establishment, it would seem that the establishment's relationship to commerce should govern. To drag in all personnel of a business establishment based on one employee's activities is completely unrealistic.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In interpreting the provision which the Senator has just read from the bill, is it his understanding that businesses which are presently exempt by reason of the fact that most of their volume of business is in local intrastate business, but which may have one or two employees engaged in interstate business, will find themselves wholly within the purview of the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I brought out the illustration of the warehouse that could have one employee handling goods as they came off a truck which had come across a State line and who moved those goods into bins in the warehouse. That one employee could require the entire establishment to be brought under the purview of this act.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Let us take the example of a laundry located in a city near a State line, with one truck that goes across the State line to pick up laundry and to return it there when it is clean. Would the fact that one operator or one employee was engaged in interstate business in that way operate so as to bring the entire personnel of the company under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, even though now the company is exempt because that one employee produced only a very small percentage of the total business?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. This term "affecting commerce"—we keep coming back to it—is the joker that really makes a mockery out of exemptions.

Equally unsound is the proposition that coverage should be extended to an entire establishment merely because one employee in the establishment is covered. If it is desired to cover the entire establishment, it would seem that the establishment's relationship to commerce should govern. To drag in all personnel of a business establishment based on one employee's activities is completely unrealistic.

I repeated that paragraph to emphasize my answer to the very proper question the Senator from Florida proposed.

Moreover, the employer here will be faced with the gravest problems. The point was made that the Labor Department now has great administrative difficulties because some persons in a given business are covered while others are not. Whether or not this is true, present difficulties fade into insignificance when compared to what the employer will face in trying to determine when and in what weeks his employees will be covered. In one week, for example, an employee of a warehouse may handle mail or materials from out of the State. In such a week all his employees may, because of this, be due the minimum wage and overtime pay. The following week, however, neither this employee nor any other employee may handle out-of-State mail or shipments. In this week none of the employees will be covered. Of course, the employer must also consider whether his sales for the year will amount to $250,000—$350,000 for construction establishments. Since, however, this is a yearly test, he will not know until the year is up whether his establishment is covered or not.

I merely mention that to show the ridiculousness of this approach. The businessmen of this country are going to be driven crazy to try to keep ahead of the law. Nobody wants to violate the laws of this country, but if this bill becomes the law, a man may have done $200,000 worth of business last year, and then he finds a new outlet results in his doing $300,000 worth of business. All that year, up to that time, he thought he was in a $200,000 business, so he has not been paying the minimum wage or complying with the other provisions of this law. All of a sudden he finds he has violated the law. Down come the people from Washington parading into his office with subpenas, and other papers, and alleging that the man is a criminal because he has violated a law that is so complex that it would take 10 Philadelphia lawyers to decipher it.

III. CONCLUSION

We support every measure which will enhance the economic welfare of American workers, who constitute the vast majority of our entire population. Since earliest times, we have been a country that has been characterized by the absence of class distinctions. We believe that sound economic and fiscal policies that will insure a high level of general business activity will assure remunerative employment for most of our citizens.

But the committee bill runs contrary to these sound principles out of which the enormous expansion of our economy and our prosperity has developed. Moreover, it constitutes a graphic illustration that once Federal welfare legislation is enacted, it becomes well-nigh impossible to repeal it when the need which brought it into existence has disappeared. As a matter of fact, such legislation is often carried into and applied to conditions and circumstances which are directly contrary to those which gave rise to the legislation in the first instance. And it sometimes happens, as in the committee bill, that these provisions, which time and change of circumstance have rendered completely inappropriate, are not only retained but even more widely extended.

Thus, when the Fair Labor Standards Act was originally enacted in 1938, provision was made requiring the payment of a premium wage rate of 1½ times the regular hourly rate for overtime; in other words, for all hours worked in excess of 40 a week. The legislative history of the act makes it abundantly clear that the purpose of this provision was to discourage overtime work in order to spread employment as widely as possible in a period of profound economic depression and widespread unemployment.

That requirement is still in the law despite the disappearance of the conditions from which it arose and which, in the opinion of its sponsors, constituted its justification. With the country enjoying, as it has for the past 8 years, the greatest economic prosperity in its history, this mandatory payment of premium overtime pay is still the law. It no longer has the slightest relevance to its original purpose, but rather has come to be looked upon as a vested right. Many workers now regard overtime work, because of the premium pay, as something valuable and it is much sought after. There have even been strikes against employers who, for one reason or another, have eliminated overtime work.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the experience of the Senator from Florida in this field, which has not been great, the Senator from Florida has had several employees from several different establishments complain because they were not allowed to work overtime, because such overtime employment involved time and a half pay. Has the Senator from Arizona run into anything like that in his much broader experience?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. That is a very common "gripe," if I may use an old GI term, among the people who work. They seek overtime.

The original purpose of the act was to discourage overtime and to require an employer to hire more people. Today, I will not say that most, but many, many employees seek overtime work. Instead of forcing the employer to hire another man, the employee will say, "I will take that overtime job, because it means more pay." I cannot blame the employee for that. Time and a half pay is very good pay, on most hourly rates. At the same time, this man, with no intention of being selfish, is denying another American a job.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I was not thinking of the matter from that point of view so much as from the point of view of the man who desires to make a little extra pay and needs to make a little extra pay for a particular need for extra cash at home, who is not allowed to earn the money. Why is that? It is because the employer does not wish to pay time and a half for overtime. The employer has other employees who have not worked 40 hours in the week, who may do just as good a job. While the employer would be glad to accommodate the employee who is willing to work 44 hours or 48 hours or more—and there are many such still, thank the Lord, in our country—he has to let the man work only 40 hours, rather than subject himself to time and a half pay.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Has the Senator run into that situation?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes. We run into that situation all the time in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, in the letters we receive from people around the country objecting to this practice.

As I said, this has actually been the cause of strikes. It has been the "stickler" in many bargaining table meetings, for the employer does not want to pay overtime. The employer feels every employee can do his job in 40 hours. If an employer has to ask a man to work overtime, certainly he should pay him for that.

Those types of situation always arise. In a lot of industries today a man may work not an 8-hour day, but a 12-hour day, or an 18-hour day, or a 24-hour day, and the man may demand overtime. Under many agreements the man has to be given overtime. That not only destroys the original intent of the Fair Labor Standards Act on this particular area, but it also works an added hardship on the fellow workers as well as the employer.

It is hard to imagine a development in the application of our Federal law which constitutes a more flagrant perversion of the law's purpose.

I refer to that section of the Fair Labor Standards Act which stated that the original purpose of the act was to get more people working.

When the Fair Labor Standards Act was adopted in 1938, organized labor was weak, small in numbers, and obviously incapable through its own efforts of improving the economic lot of American wage-workers. A few unions managed to protect the wage and working standards of their own employed members, but were helpless to aid the vast masses of unorganized and unemployed workers. Since then, organized labor has grown from about 3 million to over 16 million—nearly 18 million—members. The overwhelming majority of these unions are strong enough to protect the interests of their members and the additional numerous employees they represent. Through the processes of collective bargaining they are generally capable of securing for them wages and working conditions well above the requirements of the wage-and-hour law, and where necessary, as has happened occasionally, if rarely, to contract collectively for wages below the statutory minimum where a higher rate would merely drive the employer out of business with a consequent loss of jobs for their members and other employees whom they represent.

This is as it should be, and is entirely consistent with the national policy to encourage collective bargaining as the means not only for settling labor disputes but for determining wages and working conditions. The labor union leadership has insisted emphatically that there should be a minimum of government intervention in the collective bargaining process. It has bitterly criticized certain provisions of the National Labor Relations Act as removing some issues from the area of collective bargaining and asserted that the Government should remove itself from this area by repealing these provisions, thus making them proper subjects of collective bargaining.

Minimum wages and premium overtime pay are terms and conditions of employment removed from the area of free collective bargaining and imposed by Federal law. The necessity for preserving these statutory requirements in situations where collective bargaining actually exists or is legally required is not only contrary to the considerations which led Congress to enact the Fair Labor Standards Act, but constitutes a negation of the Federal policy to encourage collective bargaining.

Mr. Meany implicitly recognizes this to be true. In his testimony before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee in 1957, he declared:

> Let me make it clear that we are not coming here to ask Congress to enact a pay raise for union members. The wage standards of union members for the most part are considerably above the present $1 an hour Federal minimum. We are speaking here for the unorganized worker who, because he is unorganized, must look to Congress for alleviation of his substandard conditions.

And again:

And this law (the Fair Labor Standards Act), this law runs right to the bottom of the structure.

As I point out, this does nothing directly for the people who are organized. People who are organized have been able to take care of themselves to a degree. They at least have somebody to talk for them, and this bill does not directly affect their wages.

Mr. Meany's statement here, although admitting that this legislation is not necessary for employees who have unions to represent them in collective bargaining, is nonetheless somewhat disingenerous. He says it is not directly beneficial to organized workers. The only thing he can mean by the use of the qualifying terms "nothing directly" or "not directly" is that although the minimum wage requirements of the law give nothing to unionized workers, it does help the more highly paid employees to insist upon wage increases necessary to preserve the differentials between themselves and the lowest paid workers in the bargaining unit.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did I not correctly understand that in an earlier portion of the Senator's address the Senator quoted Mr. Meany's testimony before the committee this year, which indicated that the salaries of all workers were keyed to the minimum wage?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct. Mr. Meany was followed by Mr. Greenberg of the Retail Wholesale and Department Store Union, who testified immediately afterward. It appears in that relationship in my discussion.

Mr. HOLLAND. While the distinguished labor leaders were stating, as they did, that the act would not directly affect workers who are in unions, they also stated—and their two statements must be taken together—that while the contracts made by the unions provide for much higher wages than the minimum, those contracts and the wages set therein are keyed to the minimum wage and are affected by any upping of the minimum wage.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct. This again gets at the heart of the proposal. The fact that we raise the minimum wage I say automatically raises every other wage, whether it is earned or not. It is not the dollar and a quarter as it relates to the dollar which is important, it is the overall total bill which is presented to the American public in the form in increased labor costs.

Thus, the minimum wage law not only has the effect of assuring a minimum wage for low-paid employees but of increasing the leverage for wage boosts for employees who already receive in excess of the statutory minimum, as Mr. Meany plainly implies. This result was certainly never intended or contemplated by the progenitors of the legislation, who, in 1938, were seeking protection for the great masses of unorganized workers, helpless because of depression, unemployment, and union weakness, to raise their wages without the aid of Federal law.

We have consistently supported collective bargaining as the most satisfactory method to distribute equitably the fruits of our expanding economy. Consistent with this point of view as well as with our national labor relations policy as expressed in Federal law, we offered an amendment in committee to exempt from the application of the Fair Labor Standards Act any employee represented by a collective bargaining agent with whom the employer is compelled to bargain collectively pursuant to the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. This amendment which would have removed our already overextended Federal bureaucracy from one corner of our economy, and substituted the processes of free collective bargaining therefor, was rejected by a majority of the committee.

In conclusion we wish to declare our belief that where, in times of peace, a governmental responsibility exists, because of economic depression or the absence of union organization, to help working people, it is the responsibility of each State, to its own citizens—and not of the Federal Government—to provide minimum wage levels that are consistent with health and decent living standards. We also believe, however, that it is ultimately futile for either the States or the Federal Government to attempt to repeal natural economic law or to legislate prosperity. Such methods have been tried throughout recorded history and they have always resulted in inflation and disaster. This is a course we must not follow. On the contrary, we must exert our efforts to create sound fiscal and monetary policies and establish a climate conducive to economic growth.

I remind my colleagues that from 1932 to 1939 the Federal Government spent approximately 52 percent of its total national budgets on what we might call crutches or props for the economy, and after 7½ years of spending more than 50 percent of the total Federal budgets in these fields, we were still in a depression in which 11½ million people were out of work, and it took a war to pull us out of the depression.

Anyone who thinks the laws of supply and demand can be upset is simply asking for disaster. We are watching what is happening today in the agricultural segment of our economy, in which the Government is slowly but surely stamping out 30 percent of our agriculture.

We have watched England try the same process in various fields, and we have watched England back away from it.

I say to my colleagues that such interference in the economy has been tried time and time again in history.

There is nothing new about a welfare state. Every dictator in history has ridden into power on the welfare state, and while this measure may not tie directly into the popular concept of the welfare state, whenever the Federal Government outgrows its constitutional bounds, we begin to play with disaster.

I suggest that any further encroachment into the field of minimum wage is precisely a step in the direction of disaster, especially when we recognize the term "affecting commerce."

I say to my colleagues with all sincerity and honesty that what I have said is not a political statement. It is a statement that has been born and nurtured and grown in me as the result of studying history and reading what has happened. This kind of approach has been tried before. It was tried in Babylon; it was tried in Egypt; it was tried in Greece; it was tried in Rome; and in every place where it has been tried the freedom of the people has vanished. I do not believe the United States will be an exception.

I say to my fellow American citizens that we are foolishly playing with dynamite when we inject the Federal Government further and further into our daily lives. I cry out to my colleagues and to all Americans to stop this foolishness. Remember the oath we took to support our Constitution. We swore to protect it and defend it against enemies, foreign and domestic. Yet we stand here on this floor preparing to legislate in a way that will knock one more prop out from under the 10th amendment, which to me, as I said earlier, is the keystone of our free Republic.

I pray and hope that the bill will be defeated. I hope that we can generate enough feeling against it and its dangerous implications that the Senate will very soundly defeat it, to the end that we might stop the constitutional silliness that we in this body have been engaged in for nearly 30 years, and that we can get our Republic back on the path of constitutional government, so that we shall once more recognize the true virtues and strength of the free enterprise system.

I say to my colleagues that if we do so, if we release the full strength of this giant of our economic system, and permit it to operate as freely as it can, we shall do more to combat unemployment, and bring about higher wages, higher profits, and better living conditions in 1 year than any government can ever do in its entire history.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The distinguished Senator is about to conclude one of the finest addresses I have ever heard delivered on the floor of the Senate. I express to him my very deep appreciation and give him assurance of my unbounded admiration for him. I am glad that he has been willing to assume and continue the responsibility of serving in a very difficult place as a member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, representing, as I believe he does, many of the people in America who decry the very tendencies which are bringing us into difficulty, and which the Senator has so eloquently said will bring us into greater difficulties unless we desist from them.

Speaking as only one voice of the hundred voices in the Senate, I wish to extend my assurance of very warm admiration. I only wish that every other Senator could have been present throughout the distinguished analysis and address which has been made by the Senator, because I do not believe a thinking person could listen to his statement without realizing that we are being asked to take a very hurtful and destructive step, which I hope we shall not take. I thank my friend the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my good friend from Florida for his kind remarks.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I congratulate the Senator from Arizona for placing before the Senate and the American people again some of the most constructive and fundamental philosophy, in the interest of the American system of government, that we have heard for a long time.

We are all aware that for many years the attempt to use emotional appeals to certain groups by way of dangling what one might call the dollar sheaf of oats in front of the animal in order to make him go, has been very popular in political campaigns. It has become popular, I believe, to the detriment of and as a threat to the very vitality of American citizens, as the Senator has stated. As the Senator said also, with the resiliency and the capacity of the American citizen, if the economy is only turned loose and permitted to operate freely, without the dead hand of government and the discouraging hand of bureaucracy hanging over enterprise and venture, we will solve problems which never could be solved under the proposals such as this bill makes to control, to regulate, to stifle, and to discourage adventure and expansion. Adventure and expansion have made this country great. The ability of a citizen, with his own genius and ingenuity, to develop and grow, contribute to his community, and contribute to the well-being and expansion of the economic area in which he lives, gives strength to our whole economic system.

There is another phase. Measures of this misdirected magnitude strike also at the very heart of the Federal system of this Government, which has been the major pillar in the strength of America and our system. As we chip away at the Federal principle which we have in this country, that is, the principle of local responsibility, whether it be State, community, or personal, and as we chip away at the principle of the federalized Government in this country, we move just that much quicker and by that same degree into Federal statism, which means control by the state over the opportunities and the destinies of the people.

As I interpret the Senator's remarks, in addition to their being directed at the particular provisions of the pending bill, to which he objects and to which I in the main object, I believe he is also talking about the political dangers which we face, as well as the economic dangers. I am thoroughly convinced that the enactment of the pending bill as it came out of committee would be the greatest destructive element in curtailing the activities of small business enterprises and new business enterprises in this country that could be devised. I know of nothing which will inhibit the growth of the small businessman, the small entrepreneur, the small venturer in our economic life, than the saddling upon him of burdens which he cannot meet, and whereby the economics of his competition will be greater than he can stand.

I congratulate the Senator from Arizona not only on his courageous leadership and his activity in the best interest of the American system, but I congratulate him also on his magnificent analysis of the economics and broad basic policies inherent in the proposed legislation, which I believe are inimical to the best interests of the free, competitive society under our American system.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend from Iowa.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I did not have an opportunity to hear in their entirety the remarks of the distinguished Senator. However, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Arizona on the part I did hear, and on the bold and courageous method he is using and which he has expressed in his speech today on the floor of the Senate.

I regret that for various and sundry reasons it was impossible to have more Senators on the floor during his entire discussion. I hope that most people will have an opportunity to read in their entirety his remarks, and to note the pitfalls he has pointed out, and the attitude the Senator has been trying to present, in fairness to our great American historical system, which has made this country great.

I pay tribute to the Senator, and I hope that when the bill is finally passed some of the dangers the Senator has pointed out will be removed from the measure.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend from Kansas, for whom I have the greatest affection.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the able and distinguished Senator from Arizona, not only on his magnificent address, which is a masterpiece, but also for the position he has taken on the pending bill. It demonstrates and illustrates the philosophy he espouses in this country, which is the true philosophy on which America has been built.

I should like to ask the Senator this question. Is it not true that if the bill were enacted it would in effect amend the Constitution of the United States by changing the historical interpretation of what is considered interstate commerce by expanding the definition of commerce to include "any activity affecting commerce" instead of the present construction of a business being directly engaged in interstate commerce, or manufactured goods moving in interstate commerce?

Is it not true that the bill would place an arbitrary, fixed amount, of $1 million gross income as a criterion in determining whether a particular establishment comes within the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act?

Is that not the construction the Senator would place upon the bill, and does that not do violence to the Constitution of the United States, which is plain and clear on that particular point?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I should like to approach the answer in this way. The term "activity affecting commerce," which is almost diametrically opposed to the description contained in section 3(b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, would in my opinion affect every businessman in the United States, regardless of how much business he did.

Under the interpretations the court could give it, and the regulations that would be assigned to it, it could destroy the exemptions contained elsewhere in the act.

This is what it would do to the Constitution. After our Founding Fathers had written that great document, they said, "Wait a minute. Someday there may be in this country some people who do not believe that we have rights, and do not believe, as Tom Jefferson has said, that we are endowed by our Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

How wise these men were. They sat down and wrote the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The 10th amendment very clearly says that the powers not delegated to the Federal Government shall remain in the States. In the writing of that document they wrote the commerce clause, and that gave the Federal Government the right and the responsibility to regulate commerce among the States and Indian tribes and nations.

If the bill were enacted as written, with the term "activity affecting commerce" included in it, it would so broaden the commerce clause that in my interpretation it would destroy the intent of the writers of the Constitution, when they did not give to the Central Government the right to interfere in intrastate business.

The Federal Government could very easily under this language say, "We not only have the right, but we have the responsibility to go into South Carolina, or into Arizona, or any other State, and begin to regulate purely intrastate business."

So it does two things to the Constitution. It knocks out practically the last prop left in the 10th amendment, because the courts have battered that amendment around a great deal, and Congress in its attentions has not been very kind to the 10th amendment; and it would enable the Federal Government to go into the States in a way the Constitution never intended it to do. It would, in my opinion, make a laughingstock out of the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. THURMOND. The enactment of the bill would increase the power of the Central Government in Washington; and in order to increase the power here, it would have to be decreased elsewhere. Is not that correct?

This further assumption of power by the Federal Government can only result in decreased authority by the States and by the people, for this is the only source from whence it can come. Such action can only lead to a dangerous concentration of power in Washington.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The whole purpose of writing our Constitution was to protect against the possibility of concentrating power anywhere. Our Founding Fathers fled from countries which had bureaucratic, centralized governments. They came here for only one purpose. That one purpose was to establish a government under which free men could live. They were men who recognized their freedom as coming from God, as was stated by Thomas Jefferson, as I mentioned before.

Anyone who reads the Constitution cannot help being impressed by the constantly reiterated fear that we might have a central government. Our Founding Fathers provided that at every election one-third of the membership of this body would stand for election; and that every 2 years the entire House would be up for election.

I must agree with the Senator from South Carolina that the passage of this bill, containing the provision "activities affecting commerce," would be one more gigantic step toward centralizing the Government in Washington. What will be the end result? The end result will be a bureaucracy of the type from which our forefathers fled to come to this country, where they created a constitutional republic under which free men can live.

That is why I am concerned about this. I am not so much concerned about the money. If this proposal were constitutional, we would find the money. It is the same fear I have with respect to Federal aid to education; with respect to Federal aid for the aged. It is not the money. It is the fact that, slowly but surely, we destroy the freedoms of men, and we make them the banner for a central government, whether in Washington or anywhere else in the country. That is why I say there is danger in this whole approach. That is why I oppose Federal control to break in where the Constitution does not give us the right to break in.

I am supposed to be a conservative. I am referred to as a reactionary. It is said that I want to go back to the days of the Neanderthal man. I have cartoons that show me emerging from a cave, wearing the garments of a caveman.

But it is the people who advocate such proposals as this who are the reactionaries in American politics. They are the people who want to go backward. They are not going forward when they propose a welfare state or a centralized government. They are the ones who want to go back to the dark days of England, France, and Germany, countries from which our forefathers fled to come to this country and establish this Government.

No. I say, as a conservative, that I am trying to keep those misguided souls from going backward. That is why I am so interested in fighting this kind of proposal. I am not against higher pay for people. I will put the working standards of my business against the standards of any other business in the country. But I know this: I know that the Federal Government wants to move into the lives of the people. As conservatives, we ought to be free to speak out. We ought to speak out and talk to the people. We should tell them that radicalism is slowly but surely taking us backward, down the path from which our forefathers fled so successfully.

I apologize for making such a long speech, but the Senator has raised a very favorite subject of mine.

Mr. THURMOND. Is the Senator from Arizona in accord with the view that the 39 men who signed the Constitution of the United States at Philadelphia in 1787, and those who adopted the first 10 amendments known as the Bill of Rights, several years later, had in mind, chiefly, two cardinal principles: First, to establish a tripartite system of government, consisting of a legislative branch—Congress—to make the laws; and an executive branch, headed by the President, to enforce the laws; and a judicial branch, headed by the Supreme Court, to interpret the laws; and that each was to be a check and a balance on the other? And that the other cardinal principle, under the 10th amendment, was to prevent the centralization of power in Washington; that all powers not specifically delegated to the Central Government—the Federal Government—were reserved to the States and to the people; and that, therefore, the National Government can operate only in certain specified fields which are named in the Constitution? Interstate commerce is one such field, the coining of money is another, foreign affairs is another, and the national defense is another.

Is there any authority which the Senator knows about to permit the Federal Government to enter such a field of activity as is embraced within the bill now being considered by the Senate?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; the Senator from Arizona must say, very emphatically, that there is nothing in the Constitution to allow us to do this or several other things which we are doing under the guise of the welfare state.

It is argued by some that in the preamble, the statement about promoting the general welfare gives us the right to do what is proposed here. I disagree completely. From my reading of stories about the writers or framers of the Constitution, I do not believe they ever intended that the welfare statement contained in the preamble should ever be interpreted in such a way as would destroy the major parts and purposes of the entire Constitution. But that is what we have been doing in this country for 30 years. We have been slowly but surely going around the Constitution, either in the mistaken idea that the welfare provision gives us the right to do it or with the purposeful meaning to destroy the Constitution.

Mr. THURMOND. Some persons would use the welfare clause of the Constitution to accomplish their goal of circumscribing the Constitution or violating the Constitution in order to achieve what they seek to do. Is it not a fact that if that interpretation could properly be placed upon the Constitution, the Central Government could go into any field of activity it wanted to enter on the ground that it was promoting the public welfare? There would have been no need for the Founding Fathers to specify the fields into which the Central Government could enter.

Is it not clear that the Founding Fathers had in mind that the Central Government was to be limited to the fields of activity which are listed in the Constitution, and that all other fields of activity were reserved to the States and the people, unless the Constitution should be amended in the way provided in the Constitution, and not by the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Government?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from South Carolina is historically and absolutely correct. In all my life, in my study of the Constitution and my reading of it, and of the documents pertaining to it, I have never found anything which would contradict the Senator's interpretation, as he has just stated it.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not true that the bill would not only expand the Constitution to an extent never intended and destroy the great principles of government on which this country is founded, but that also it would be a dangerous bill from the standpoint of the economy of our country, because it would have a vast, tremendous, vital impact on a great many industries, which would have to either curtail employment, raise prices, or close their doors?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I related earlier in my discussion the economic dangers in the bill; but I must say to the Senator that the dangers to the Constitution contained in proposed legislation such as this far override any dangers I see in the form of dollars and cents or people's jobs.

Mr. THURMOND. I must agree with the Senator on that point.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not true, too, that if we allow the natural laws to operate, and if we abide by the Constitution, if a man develops his talents, if he has ambition, if he has initiative, if he has energy, and if he is willing to work and study and prepare himself, he will be compensated, and Congress will not have to do it by law?

Furthermore, are we not playing with fire when we fix a minimum wage, because after a while the minimum wage will be at such a point that there will be little differential between the wage of a common laborer and that of a skilled worker, and there will be no incentive for people to improve themselves and become more skilled, in order to render greater service and thus to earn more money?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I have attempted to bring that point out in my earlier discussion of the bill on the floor. The statement is not peculiar to me; it has been made many times in history, that ours is the most successful form of government ever known to man. We have had the most successful economic system ever devised by man. It has been that way for almost 200 years. But in the last 20 or 30 years people have begun to say, "Well, there must be something wrong with it; it is too good." So they began to tamper with it. As a result of the tampering, the Government has been hurt.

Anyone who reads history will find in every government the same type of people who come along and say, "Things are going along too well. We had better monkey around with the reasons why it is so good."

When we started in the early 1930's to disregard the Constitution; when we started to circumvent the natural laws of supply and demand in our segment of the economy; we started to get ourselves in trouble.

In my opinion, it will take great courage on the part of the American people to pull themselves out of the trouble. This has happened before in history. It can happen again. I do not believe there is an economic problem which exists in America today which the free enterprise system cannot solve. I do not think there is a problem which the people, acting under the Constitution, if it is properly applied, cannot solve. I do not believe there is any problem which confronts the American people that they cannot solve, if they believe in our form of government and in our country.

I do not think there is any problem that confronts the American people which they could not solve if they would have a little more faith in their God and in themselves and in their country. I think we are weaning the American people away from the use of their own abilities—away from the use of their own "teeth," so to speak—and are attempting to get them to rely entirely upon what the Government decides, with the result that the people do not know what is best for their own good.

What is the result? We see the Federal Government attempting to take over my responsibilities to my own father and mother and the responsibilities my sons will have to me when I reach an older age. Those are the dangers which result from such legislation; and I am glad the Senator from South Carolina has called this point to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. THURMOND. Is it not true that when the Government tries to do more and more for the people, instead of helping them to help themselves, and when the Congress gets the people to lean more and more on the Government, then there may happen in our country the same thing that happened to Rome, which at one time was one of the great powers of the world. Rome did not fall because of attack by aggressors from without. Rome fell because of the decay of her own people, as a result of factors operating from within, when the people began to demand more and more of their Government, but their Government could not meet their demands. So Rome, once a great nation, fell from decay from within. If our Nation continues on the way to the welfare state, is that not what is likely to happen to the American people?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may reply by stating that inscribed on the front of the Archives Building, here in the city of Washington, is the maxim, "Study the Past. What Is Past Is Prologue."

I may say to the Senator from South Carolina that I do not think what happened to Rome will happen to the United States. On the other hand, human nature being what it is, and man not having changed very much in the thousands of years he has been on earth, the American people will be as susceptible to those weaknesses as were the Romans, the Greeks, the Egyptians, and the Babylonians. I think the American people realize this situation and this danger far more than we do; I think they are far ahead of us.

So I hope the people insist that the National Congress stop injecting the Federal Government into affairs which the Constitution says the National Government should not deal with or into matters regarding which action by the Federal Government is disallowed by the Constitution.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in closing, again I should like to express my sincere appreciation of the great contribution the able Senator from Arizona has made to the Nation by means of the address he has delivered here today.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, let me say that I, too, have enjoyed listening to the able presentation the distinguished Senator from Arizona has made.

I had the honor of serving with him on the committee for several years. Later, I escaped it. [Laughter.] Actually it was a great experience—and I was proud to be a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare which deals with so many human and economic problems. But I know the careful attention he gives to the work of the committee, and I realize that he has strong views about its work.

I should like to ask several questions, either of him or, perhaps, of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], who is a great lawyer, or of the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I think these questions may be helpful in connection with making the necessary interpretations.

In 1947, I served on a committee with the then Senator Donnell, of Missouri; we labored for months, upon amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act. They were the first amendments of great consequence to the act since its enactment. Following the enactment of these amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act the courts considered many cases arising from the legislation. A number went to the Supreme Court of the United States; and several of those cases were decided on the basis of the debate which occurred on the floor of the Senate, interpreting the debate to indicate the legislative intent.

My first question relates to the definition of "interstate commerce." In this connection, I request the attention of the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], who is an able lawyer.

It is correct that many cases—particularly in the last 30 years—have gone to the Supreme Court involving the question of whether a certain activity falls in the realm of interstate commerce. There are Supreme Court decisions determining that a certain activity affected interstate commerce substantially, and this was brought within its scope.

The bill before us defines the activities which would be covered; and on page 2, section 2, we find a change in definition relating to commerce:

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. Section 2 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out the words "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "engaged in activities affecting commerce".

Thereafter, in section 3, which begins on page 2, the definition is applied, and certain enterprises are named as those which are engaged in activities affecting commerce.

I wish to ask this question: Would the statement or recital that such enterprises are engaged in activities affecting commerce, determine the issue? Is it not correct that if a question were raised before the Court regarding a specific enterprise the Court would determine whether the particular business or enterprise which might do $1,500,000 worth of business was one which actually affected interstate commerce?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, let me reply, first, by saying that earlier the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] raised that point. However, let me say that the language contained in section 3, subsection (s), which defines "activity affecting commerce," is language the Court has used in several labor-case decisions, but it has never been used in a decision relating to this legislation.

Mr. COOPER. It has been used in fair labor standards cases, in the broad sense of the meaning of "commerce."

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; it has been used only in National Labor Relations Board cases. The Jones-Laughlin case, in 1934, was the first one, I believe.

The definition this one would replace is set forth in section 3, subsection (b). Instead of using the phrase "activity affecting commerce," they used to define commerce as meaning trade, transportation, transmission, or communication between several States or any places outside thereof. But when they attempt to define "activity affecting commerce," they get into trouble; it includes, according to the bill: "any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce."

We cannot outguess a court; and I am not even a lawyer, so certainly I would not attempt to do so. But since this measure includes language which the Court has used, I would rather be inclined to believe that the Court would go along in holding that the Congress did have a right to legislate in fields in which there were activities affecting commerce.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to express an opinion on this point, whenever he is through? Will he yield to me for that purpose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly. My question is as follows: Even though the Congress may write certain provisions, what weight would it have if there were actually raised in court the question as to whether a particular enterprise was one in commerce?

Mr. HOLLAND. In the first place, I do not pretend to be a profound constitutional lawyer; and I know that even if I were, I might be outguessed by the Supreme Court. But my understanding is that as of about the time of the passage of the Wage and Hours Act, the Supreme Court ruled—my recollection is that its ruling was in the Jones-Laughlin case—that activities which could not be held to be directly in the channel of interstate commerce affected it so greatly that they were activities which the Court held to be activities affecting commerce or affecting interstate commerce, successfully meeting the Federal constitutional test and permitting Federal law under the Constitution to be applied.

There have been several cases of that kind since, some of which the Senator from Florida is familiar with, and some of which he is not familiar with. But his understanding is that in that series of decisions none of them have been in this field. Those he has known of have been in the field of the National Labor Relations Act. There may have been some in other fields he does not know about, but he knows there have not been any in this field, the reason being that in the recommendations made by the then President, President Roosevelt, about the time of the Jones and Laughlin case in 1937, as I remember, and in the original act on this subject, passed in the following year, 1938, it was clearly stated that the long hand of the Federal Government under this new act, which voiced a new concept of Federal responsibility and Federal power as to business, both employers and employees had their field of operations carefully delineated.

The Senator from Florida thinks he remembers approximately the language that was used in the 1938 act, and it was repeated in the 1949 act, which was a substantial revision, and which has been followed ever since. It fixed the field of operation of this act as to businesses engaged directly in commerce—that means in interstate commerce—and in manufacturing goods for shipment in commerce—that means in interstate commerce—so that this much less direct field of possible jurisdiction was carefully eliminated from the operations of this act, and has been carefully eliminated.

The Senator from Florida ran up against this same situation in 1949, when a committee, operating just as the majority of this committee has in this instance, tried to give to this act much broader coverage by using the words "affecting interstate commerce."

At that time, after extensive argument and debate in the Senate, the Senate knocked down that interpretation as the field for operation of this act, and confined it again to the limited field announced by President Roosevelt and by then Senator Black who handled the legislation, and reenacted that part of the act exactly as it had been done, and then proceeded to interpret it in even clearer language in certain fields which we do not need to go into now.

The Senator from Florida understands that under this interpretation by the Supreme Court, it would be constitutionally possible, though I think wholly unwise, for this act to be extended into fields affecting commerce, because undoubtedly it would extend the operation of that act. That is the intention of those who are proposing it. They try to extend this act to businesses which, under the earlier wording of the act, were unaffected by the act. That is their purpose.

The point made by the Senator from Kentucky is completely valid, as the Senator from Florida understands it, from the fact that there is not any fixed, settled definition of what the term "affecting commerce" means. The Senator from Florida extends this as his own view, and he thinks he is right: That does not mean that everything anybody claims as affecting, no matter how remotely, interstate commerce, would necessarily have to be held as such by the Supreme Court. That is one great objection the Senator from Florida has to this proposal, because he thinks it will be 10 years before a lot of people could have any assurance as to whether they were, in their own operations, subjected to the operations of this law.

I see nothing wise in the use of these general, noncertain words, even if there were not the serious question which has been so well advanced by the Senator from Arizona. This is that under these words the long arm of the Federal Government would reach out to control all employers, no matter if their business was exclusively within States; all employees of those employers, if the Court should hold that their business was of such nature that it affected interstate commerce—as it surely would hold in many matters, as I do not think it would hold in all matters.

It is a twofold objection I have—the objection of uncertainty, of litigation, of suspense for years, which is self-defeating in this field; and the other objection, which I think is much greater, that we are interfering, and would be interfering for the first time, in such a way as to regiment intrastate businesses by Federal control from Washington, by those not familiar with the customs of employment or pay or service in the several States or communities, and that we would be going a very large step further toward the creation of the welfare state which most of us want to avoid in every way we can.

If that is an answer to the Senator from Kentucky, I hope it may be taken as such.

Mr. COOPER. I thank the Senator. As I have said, the chief reason why I raised this question was that I remember the litigation following the enactment of the portal to portal bill in 1947, which contained amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act. I think it is of some value to have discussion on this point. As I recollect the background of approval by the courts of fair labor standards legislation, the courts held that the Congress had power to enact wage and hour legislation because the low standard of wages in certain industries engaged in commerce bore detrimentally upon the free flow of commerce between the States. It follows that the Congress has power to enact now, amendments respecting minimum wages and hours for businesses which are in interstate commerce. I think that is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. If the Senator will defer, I will finish my thought. The Congress exercised its power in the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act, but made certain exemptions. Those exempted businesses may or may not have been in interstate commerce. The Congress is not required to legislate, but it can legislate as it sees proper regarding businesses which are engaged in interstate commerce. The question was raised during the Senator from Arizona's speech as to the constitutional right to enact the bill before us. It appears to me there is such a power to extend the minimum wage or hours law to any business which is engaged in interstate commerce. Congress may or may not decide to do it. But Congress has the power to do it.

I went one step beyond and asked this question: If the Congress, in this bill or in any other bill, attempts to extend minimum wage and hour provisions to a business which is actually not engaged in interstate commerce in the sense determined by the courts, is it not doubtful that such an enterprise not substantially affecting interstate commerce, could be brought under the act? That is a question I raised.

Mr. GOLDWATER. As we both recognize, that is a problem which the Court itself will have to determine. In view of the past decisions of the Court in the NLRB cases, I think we could expect the Court to say that activities affecting commerce would be constitutional as used in the act.

The decisions to which the Senator referred were applied to the employee. It was an employee test. The test was whether the employee was engaged in interstate commerce. It was made clear that there had to be a flow of commerce across State lines. Then the employee came under the provisions of the act.

In this bill we find the word "enterprise" for the first time. This is the new test; not the employee but the employer. That is something which I think the lawyers have to consider, as they guess what the Supreme Court or other courts might do.

There is a whole raft of language which is new to the Fair Labor Standards Act. It departs quite decidedly from the definitions used in the act to be amended. For that reason, I expressed concern about the language "activity affecting commerce," together with its definition, as to what it might do to the intent of the Constitution and what it might do to allow the Federal Government to get further into our business.

Offhand, I cannot think of any business in this country which does not affect commerce. I have the thought the definition should be restricted to businesses engaged in the flow of commerce across State lines. That is one thing. However, when we used the words "activity affecting commerce" that means, as I said earlier, if a shoe store in Miami, Fla., buys some shoes from St. Louis, the transaction certainly affects commerce.

The man would not be engaged in interstate commerce under the old interpretation, if he sold those shoes, even though he got them some place else. He himself, as I understand the law, to be engaged in interstate commerce, would have to sell the shoes across a State line. However, the language is sought to be broadened to include "activity affecting commerce," with the definition following:

"Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

That is very broad. Again, we cannot outguess the courts.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I am very much interested in the point which has been discussed by the Senator from Arizona, the Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from Florida. I should like, as a lawyer, to say that I think the Senator from Arizona has correctly stated the decisions bearing on this point.

As the Senator from Arizona has stated, up to some 25 years ago all retail establishments were considered to be engaged exclusively in intrastate commerce notwithstanding the fact that the goods they sold had been transported to them from other States. Furthermore, all service establishments which merely rendered services in localities were considered to be strictly intrastate businesses.

As the Senator from Arizona has pointed out, there is something exceedingly dangerous in the change of phraseology in a bill which undertakes to predicate congressional regulation upon such a term as "activity affecting commerce." On that basis Congress can extend its regulations far beyond the relationship between the employer and the employee.

Of course, this expression is used in subdivision 7 of section 152 of title 29, United States Code, which deals with the Labor Management Act. One of the circuit courts, in interpreting the meaning of this term in the case of the National Labor Relations Board against the Suburban Lumber Co., reported in 121 Federal 2d 829, says:

The word "affect" within subdivision (7) of this section has the widest conceivable scope and means to act upon, produce an effect on, touch, acting upon, working a change in, or concerning.

The Supreme Court of the United States refused an application for certiorari to review this decision making this definition.

I ask the Senator from Arizona, if I, as a resident of North Carolina, should go into a clothing store and buy a suit of clothes in North Carolina, which suit of clothes has been shipped into North Carolina from Indiana, we will say, would I not be engaged in an activity, in so doing, which would affect, to some extent, interstate commerce? If there can be a regulation of the relationship between the employer and the employee on that basis, then there can be a regulation of my activities on that basis. There would be no limit to the power of Congress in this field.

There is a question which confronts the Congress, as I see it, at this hour, which is a very serious question. It is whether we want to give further congressional approval to terms under which all the powers of Government, not only to regulate relations between employers and employees, but also to regulate the activities of individuals, shall be transferred from local communities to a centralized Government in Washington, D.C.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator's analysis with regard to buying a suit in North Carolina, which suit was made in Indiana, is certainly correct when the Senator reaches the conclusion that it has an effect on commerce. Certainly it has an effect on commerce. The first effect is that the merchant bought the suit. The second effect is that the merchant has to order another suit. This could become quite a habit. He could engage in quite a lot of activity. He might sell 200 of those suits across State lines. While the suits are sold to local North Carolinians in intrastate business, and although the money stays in North Carolina, it would be my opinion—and this is a nonlegal opinion, as the Senator knows, because I am not a lawyer—that anything we do under the term "activity affecting commerce," would give the Federal Government a feeling that it has the right to go in. As I said earlier, I think this probably will make the bureaucrats happier than anything which has happened in 30 years, because it really will open the door. Now there can be not only a regulation of commerce, but also there can be a regulation of people.

What will be the aftergrowth of this? There will be an effect upon freedom of choice in buying a suit, for example. Suppose a man does not want to be engaged in interstate commerce, or in any activity affecting commerce. He may start making his own suits in the backroom. Those suits may be of no value. Perhaps the Senator would not like those suits, and would have to go some place else to buy a suit. His freedom of choice would be tampered with.

I see nothing but trouble, trouble, trouble, if this should become a part of the law.

Mr. ERVIN. I went to law school many years ago, and I studied law a great deal afterward in the course of my practice and my work as a judge. I arrived at a definite understanding as to what the people who wrote the Constitution meant when they gave to Congress the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. I think all of us had definite notions about that matter. These notions were sustained by the decisions of the courts in all respects up to some 25 years ago, or approximately that time. They left a great deal of security to the country, in that they carried into effect one of the great things which made the American Republic possible, the doctrine of the separation of powers. Under the decisions, Congress had the power to regulate matters relating to interstate commerce, and the States retained the power to regulate matters relating to intrastate commerce.

Does the Senator from Arizona not agree with me that those who have the conviction that this is a proper interpretation of the Constitution, and that such an interpretation of the Constitution is necessary to preserve the America we have known and loved, ought to give serious consideration to the question of whether they should stick to what they conceive to be the correct interpretation of the Constitution, rather than to follow the judicial changes made in the Constitution during recent years?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator has expressed, as I very poorly tried to express earlier, the point that this is a very grave constitutional question. If the people of the United States want a welfare state, if they want to have Federal aid to education, Federal aid to medicine, and Federal control of wages, then I propose that they amend the Constitution, because I do not think that any man who understands the Constitution and who believes in the Constitution can agree to further encroachments upon its interpretation.

The "Federalist Papers" and all the writings I have been able to read concerning the commerce clause—and I have studied them particularly because I was trying to find a definition of "commerce," but I could find none—make it very plain that only a limited power was recognized. Of course, in those days the legislators could not envision, I suppose, the rapid communication and transport that we have today. Nevertheless, I think the provision of the Constitution is still valid, and I think the 10th amendment bears on this question, too, because if the Founding Fathers had wanted to grant the Federal Government the powers which are assumed by some to exist, they would have done so before the 10th amendment had been adopted, and it would have been contained in another article of the Constitution. However, they did not. They merely gave the Federal Government authority to regulate commerce between the States, with the Indian tribes, and with other nations.

I believe that interpretation is clear. I do not have to go to a court to get an interpretation of that language. I have been in business all my life. My business is in interstate commerce. I have no doubt about it, because I sell across State lines. But my little competitior across the street is not in interstate commerce. By the language of the bill he would be under this definition, because he "affects" interstate commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. Under the Constitution there is undoubted power in legislative bodies possessing a competent knowledge of the area concerning which they are legislating to pass minimum wage laws. I refer to the fact that under our Constitution as interpreted by the older decisions and as interpreted by the Senator from Arizona and by myself, the State legislatures have undoubted power to pass minimum wage laws, if they deem them advisable, governing the localities over which the legislatures have jurisdiction. Is that not true?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct, and he has touched upon a point that I failed to bring out. I am indebted to him for doing so.

I shall put my statement in the form of a question, so that the Senator from North Carolina, who is a distinguished jurist, can state an opinion.

What would happen if a State had minimum wage laws of its own, and the Federal Government came along with the proposed legislation, and provided for Federal preemption? Does it not in effect actually preempt, based upon history?

Mr. ERVIN. I believe that at least 50 percent of the Court, if not a majority of the Court, as now constituted, would undoubtedly hold such to be true.

My own State of North Carolina, through its legislature, at the last session, enacted a minimum wage law for North Carolina, and I am of the opinion that the legislatures of the various States are far more competent to deal with matters of minimum wages in what are essentially local activities because of diversity of conditions in the States than is the Senate of the United States.

The Senator from Arizona and I served on the so-called Rackets Committee, and we saw the result in our investigation and study as members of that committee of the use of a somewhat similar term as "activities affecting commerce" in the act of Congress creating the National Labor Relations Board. We found that the courts held that under the doctrine of preemption as applied to that Act the States no longer had jurisdiction of many labor controversies, that the National Labor Relations Board was unable to handle all of these controversies, and that as a result of the centralization of that particular power in the National Labor Relations Board we had a condition under which individuals and companies had legal rights they could not vindicate and suffered legal wrongs which they could not redress. As a consequence, we found that something which is abhorrent to any system of justice had been brought about by the use of this very term. That is something which ought to give the Congress pause before it undertakes to give further congressional approval to the use of such a loose term.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I do not look on this as a loose term, however. I think this is a very broad term, and it has been successfully resisted prior to this time. This type of language has been offered before, and a very heavy floor fight ensued, during which the amendment was rejected. I am hopeful that my colleagues can resist the vote appeal in the term "minimum wage," and recognize the economic dangers and the constitutional dangers in the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. I used the words "loose term" to imply the difference between the proposed legislation and former legislation enacted by the Congress such as the Sherman Antitrust Act, in which Congress was careful to use the term "commerce among the States," as that term is used in the Constitution. Undoubtedly the term "activities affecting commerce" is as broad a term as can be devised in this area. As we pointed out before, it is even broader than the field of relations between employers and employees, because it can be made to embrace any activities of any individual, which may affect, touch upon, or have any impact upon interstate commerce.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. If we were to adopt the proposed language, we might wind up with a Constitution consisting only of a preamble, because this proposal could strike out all the restraints against power contained in the Constitution. It could negate the division of powers even between the legislative and other branches. I think it would lead to the ultimate control of wages and then prices. That is the danger I see in the measure.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the Senator from Arizona for his patience in yielding to me for these questions. I know he has been on the floor a long time. I am especially grateful to him in view of that fact.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend.

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] has asked that we put into the RECORD a list of the 29 States which have minimum wage laws, and I ask unanimous consent that the list be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that request for a moment?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I withhold the request.

Mr. KENNEDY. I congratulate the Senator from Arizona on the vigor with which he has expressed his point of view. I wonder whether the Senator can advise the Senate whether the Senate is likely to have an opportunity to vote today.

Mr. GOLDWATER. My guess would be—and it is merely a "horseback" guess—"No." We were told last night by the majority leader that there would be no votes after 7 o'clock. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON] has a speech, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has a rather involved amendment which will require lengthy discussion. So I think his prediction that there will be no votes after 7 o'clock is a healthy one, because there will not be any before that time.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator has suggested on other occasions that he has perhaps 30 amendments to the bill. I know that other Senators have amendments. As we shall deal with many questions which will come before this body in the next few days, when we shall be trying to accomplish business and consider at least some of the 22 or 26 bills which the President has recommended, of which this is one, I wonder whether we can expect to vote tomorrow on many of the amendments offered by the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is successful——

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Arizona would not need any additional amendments?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would not say "any additional amendments." I have about 32 very carefully selected amendments. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] should prevail, or if the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] should prevail, the necessity for most of the amendments I expect to offer would be obviated. If a vote on those amendments takes place tomorrow, if we get a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Florida and it is accepted by the Senate, I see no reason why we should not go right along. If it is not, then I intend to call up my amendments one by one. I do not know how much discussion each amendment will require. Some are not too important, but some are of a very serious nature.

I have no intention of holding up matters. I cannot, however, enter into a unanimous-consent agreement as to controlled time. I have no intention of filibustering the bill. This is the longest speech I have made in my life, and my back is beginning to feel it. My admiration for the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has just gone up. I do not know how he did it. I would not wish to guess as to the time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator think that we could conclude by Saturday night if we assume—and this is a reasonable assumption, I believe—that the amendment of the Senator from Florida will not be adopted, and if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], if it strikes out all new coverage, will also fail? Does he believe that under those assumptions we will be able to finish consideration of the bill by Saturday night?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think that is a reasonable assumption. I will not take long to go through my 32 amendments. If the Senator from Oregon were presenting 32 amendments, that would be a different matter. [Laughter.] I shall be rather quick in dealing with them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I doubt whether the Senator can make that assumption. Interest in the bill is not localized on this side of the aisle. The very fact that the distinguished Senator from Oregon has not yet submitted his amendments—and I am waiting breathlessly for the sheaf of amendments he will offer—shows that the matter is not localized to this side of the aisle. Undoubtedly there will be other amendments offered as the discussion unfolds. So we cannot make any assumption that the matter will be disposed of or concluded by Saturday night.

Mr. GOLDWATER. My leader is now speaking. I spoke from inexperience and from a desire to get on with the matter. I want to have a thorough discussion of the subject. If the amendments of the Senator from Florida do not prevail, and if the amendments of the Senator from Illinois do not prevail, we will undoubtedly have some long discussion about the "activity affecting commerce" part of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thought we had that discussion today.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I had my discussion of it, but there are many other Senators who will wish to discuss it. That is an important part of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Massachusetts is not busy, and he is prepared to stay here this fall, if it should be necessary.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Is that a promise?

Mr. KENNEDY. But we should realize that there is other proposed legislation that must be disposed of. If the Senator has 30 amendments, there are undoubtedly other amendments also. Perhaps there will be 60 amendments that will be offered to the bill. That is a reasonable assumption. I should like to see us move along with some speed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator speaks about the need to move along. That is a correct assumption, if we assume that we have to pass everything. I am one who believes that we would be much better off if we did not do some things, and the American people would be better off too. After all, it is not always what we do that helps the country, but very often what we do not do.

The Senator from Massachusetts knows my feeling about the minimum wage, Federal aid to education, and Federal aid to medicine. He knows that I will do everything in my power to help defeat those proposals. I was hopeful that we would not come back into session. If we could not get the job done in 2 years, why should we try to do it in 3 weeks? I would be willing to wait until January—if the Senator is still in this body, or wherever he might find himself—and then proceed with a brand new, fresh discussion, rather than beat an old sack of bones.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I wish to say that I am in a somewhat peculiar situation about the time factor, because I assured one of my distinguished friends that he might go to check upon the activities of his dairy breed cattle, or whatever he agreed to do today; and, having a speech of my own that I believe will take 2 or 3 hours to deliver, and having known that 2 or 3 other Senators had speeches they wished to make, and having heard the majority leader say what he said yesterday, that there would be no votes today after an early hour this evening, I felt safe in giving my friend that assurance.

I am distressed to have my able and distinguished friend from Massachusetts assume that my poor amendment is destined to defeat, to failure, even before it is offered. If that is the case, I assure the Senator that there are other amendments that will follow, not only those to be offered by the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Illinois, but some also by the Senator from Florida, in which he is joined by a sizable number of Senators who sit on the same side of the aisle occupied by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Florida.

Therefore I would venture the suggestion that unless we are to have round-the-clock sessions—which did not prove to be very effective earlier in this session—we will not be through by Saturday night.

I should like to say, in addition, that the Senator from Florida feels it is not necessary to criticize, by assumption or otherwise, those who feel that they should have the right to discuss this matter briefly.

I remember that this bill has been in the very distinguished committee headed by the Senator from Massachusetts for nearly 2 years, with many hearings held on it. My recollection is that it has gone all the way from 7½ million coverage, as introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, to 11 million coverage as reported by the subcommittee to the full committee, and then down to 5 million coverage, as now presented on the floor of the Senate. Surely that indicates some arguable matters contained within the covers of this very interesting and complex bill. Not having any thought at all of a filibuster—the Senator from Florida has never liked the word, and he does not use it now—he does not anticipate that there will be any unlimited discussion on this bill. However, the Senator from Florida will object to any limitation of time this week, because he believes that there are a great many matters to discuss in connection with the bill. Last evening he got the very definite impression from his able and distinguished friend, the Senator from Oregon, whose remarks were so thoroughly educational to the Senator from Florida, and also interesting and informative, that the Senator from Oregon had several matters he proposed to discuss during the course of the debate.

Therefore, the interest is not limited to one area of the country or to one side of the aisle, or to the bill which the committee brought to the Senate. I am sure it will be discussed quite at length before we come to a final vote on it. That does not refer to a vote on any particular amendment, because I do not believe there will be extensive or long debate on any particular amendment. However, there will be many amendments offered.

I say again that I regret that my distinguished friend from Massachusetts has jumped to the assumption that my amendment is certain to meet defeat. I hope his prediction will not come true. However, I am afraid that probably he has better information on what will happen than has the Senator from Florida.

Mr. KENNEDY. I merely said that because the adoption of the amendment would destroy the bill, and I do not believe that the Senate is prepared to destroy the bill. This matter is a matter of priority on the part of the President and on the part of the majority leader. Therefore, I should like to see it move along. I am glad that we have had a chance to make a record and to make an assessment of how vigorously we are moving along.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to assure the chairman of the subcommittee, with whom it has been an honor to serve for the past 2 years, that if I offer any amendments, I will not discuss any of them for more than 10 minutes.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I merely wish to say that no Member of this body has taken less time of the Senate in discussion than has the junior Senator from New Hampshire. The only reason why the junior Senator from New Hampshire desired some time this afternoon was the fact that he heard the majority leader state yesterday that for various reasons there would be no votes today. For that reason the junior Senator from New Hampshire thought this was a good time for him to make certain statements he desired to get into the RECORD. He wished to get these remarks into the RECORD at some time during the debate on the pending bill. If what I understood to be the announcement is not true, and if those who are in control on the majority side are willing to go to a vote on the Holland amendment tonight, the junior Senator from New Hampshire will forgo making his speech, and get it into the RECORD at some other time.

It was simply on the assumption that a vote could not come that the Senator from New Hampshire was asking for some time to make his speech and have it out of the way, so that it would not delay matters later. I want to make it clear, however—and I believe most of us feel the same way—that we want to discuss the matter reasonably and to expedite action on every single amendment. I would be willing, very gladly, if there is a chance to vote tonight, to defer speaking and to let the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] proceed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The only reason why I suggested that possibly we would not vote tonight—it is now almost 4 o'clock—was that the majority leader announced last night that there would be no votes after 7 o'clock. I know that many Senators are planning on that, expecting to have a chance to spend the evening with their wives or friends. I would not expect many Senators to be present.

Mr. COTTON. In that case, I should like to make my speech.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield, for the purpose of permitting me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. COTTON. I will yield for that purpose, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr HOLLAND. With that understanding, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with the objectives and the philosophy of the Federal minimum wage law. Not only have I no quarrel with it, but during my years in Congress I have twice voted to increase the Federal minimum wage, once when I was a Member of the House of Representatives, and once since I became a Member of the Senate.

We all know that the original purpose and reason for the Federal minimum wage law was to prevent one manufacturer from securing an unfair competitive advantage over another through the exploitation of his workers, and to protect from exploitation the workers of the Nation who were engaged in those enterprises which actually operate in interstate commerce in the real sense of the term, not in a strained or technical sense of that term.

I shall not touch upon the discussion which has taken place already in the Senate regarding the right of Congress to seek to extend the constitutional interpretation of interstate commerce. It is rather clear that the Supreme Court of the United States for a long period has steadily extended the interpretation of the term "interstate commerce" until the definition could apply to almost every commercial activity in the country. I suppose that if Congress chooses to follow the lead of the Supreme Court the perfectly practical result will be that we can reach into every kind of commercial activities, no matter how small and infinitesimal, and no matter how far removed that activity is from bona fide interstate commerce.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to talk about the technicalities of this matter or the right of the Congress to do this. I shall not address myself particularly to the raising of the minimum wage.

I, for one—recognizing the increased cost of living—am ready to vote for a reasonable increase, in the minimum wage.

Mr. President, I wish to pinpoint and to call to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of our people the practical effect of the enactment of this bill, the so-called Kennedy wage and hour bill, insofar as it would extend the coverage of the Federal minimum wage law. Thoroughout the country, Mr. President, there are today many persons who have preconceived and erroneous notions that if we vote for this extension of its coverage, we shall be voting to do something beneficial for those who are working in the intrastate businesses of the country, for the workers in the small plants, in the commercial houses, in the retail stores, in the service establishments, and in the hotels, the motels, and the restaurants of the country.

Mr. President, I can speak with authority only about my own section of the country and the State I represent. But I wish to take a few minutes of the time of the Senate this afternoon to nail to the mast, to make crystal clear, for the information of anyone who hears or reads these remarks, the real effect of this proposed extension of coverage, not only on the businesses affected, but—even more important—on those who work for those establishments.

In the first place, Mr. President, the part of the bill I am discussing—namely, the part which deals with the extension of coverage to local retail and service establishments—is based, and has to be based, upon the philosophy and the theory that we cannot trust the States of this Union, through their legislative bodies, their Governors, the public opinion and sentiment of their people, and the organization and the power of their workers, to see that a just minimum wage prevails within their own jurisdictions.

My own State of New Hampshire has a State minimum wage law. It has had it for many years. That law has periodically been amended and revised by the legislature of my State, to extend its coverage and to increase the hourly minimum wage. I should like to inform the Senate and I should like to remind the people of my own State, and particularly those who labor there, that the minimum wage now set by the State of New Hampshire, in an act adopted by the New Hampshire Legislature and effective November 30, 1959, is $1 an hour, and is applied to both men and women.

The coverage of that law is broad, far broader than the coverage proposed in the pending bill. It covers every retail store, every manufacturing plant, every laundry, every drycleaning plant in New Hampshire. Under my own State law, enacted by our legislature, every one of those business enterprises must pay a minimum wage of $1 an hour.

The only important group of employees not covered by that law of my State is composed of those who work for restaurants, hotels, and motels. Although these persons are not covered directly by our State's statute, the New Hampshire law does provide for a wage-board procedure by which a minimum wage is set administratively for women and minors who work in those establishments. That minimum is at the present time set at 50 cents an hour for service personnel, such as waitresses and others who receive gratuities and tips from the public, and 75 cents an hour for those who do not directly "serve" or wait on the public.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, the present New Hampshire law, which I have just now been describing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the law was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From New Hampshire Revised Statues Annotated]

CHAPTER 279—MINIMUM WAGE LAW

279:21 Minimum hourly rate: No person, firm or corporation shall employ any employee at a rate of less than $1 per hour with the following exceptions:

I. This limitation shall not apply to employees engaged in household labor, domestic labor, farm labor, outside salesmen, summer camps for minors, restaurants, hotels, inns and cabins.

II. This limitation shall not apply to employees engaged as newsboys or golf caddies.

III. This limitation shall not apply to employees of hospitals, orphanages, or homes for the aged organized as nonprofit corporations, except that no nonprofit hospital corporation or nonprofit orphanage, or nonprofit home for the aged shall employ a laundry employee or nurses aide or practical nurse at a rate of less than 80 cents per hour.

IV. No person, firm or corporation shall employ any employee as usher at a theater or pin boy at a bowling alley at a rate of less than 75 cents per hour.

V. This limitation shall not apply to a person with less than 6 months' experience in an occupation, or a person 18 years of age or under, provided that such person shall not be paid less than 80 cents per hour.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I have said that the so-called Wage and Hour Act which we now have under consideration is based, first, on the theory that we cannot depend upon the States to take care of their obligations to the employees and employers in the State which actually are not engaged in any form of interstate commerce—and I am not speaking in the narrow, or technical, sense.

There is a second theory or philosophy which must, and in my opinion does, underline the pending bill; and it is that the only important thing to consider in relation to those who work in the activities not now covered by the Federal law is their wage scale.

Mr. President, certainly in my own State, and in neighboring States with whose conditions I am familiar, and, I suspect, all over this country, there are those who need to work and need to receive compensation, but who will find their jobs destroyed if this bill, unamended, is enacted into law.

It is just as important that we preserve jobs as it is that we preserve wage scales.

I have in mind a mercantile establishment in my own little city, a department store, in which numerous widows of around my own age, whose income left them by their husbands probably is not sufficient to maintain them, have employment. They do not do heavy work. Their hours are short. While their pay is not large, it augments and supplements and pieces out their income and enables them to live. In addition, it enables them to contribute fruitfully and constructively to the general well-being.

Mr. President, the minute that Congress exercises its power to reach into the States and say that in retail establishments and service businesses we will establish a high minimum wage, it means that those people immediately will lose their jobs, because if a higher wage is to be paid, more active clerks must be hired, high-pressure salesmen, who will work for a sufficient number of hours, with added burdens and duties, so that fewer will do the work that more had done before.

Of course, I know the answer. I know what other Members of this body may have in mind instantly to call to my attention—that the proposed act before us is sugar coated. It is sugar coated with regard to extension of coverage to local businesses because it does not apply to those establishments that do less than a million dollars of business a year. It is also sugar coated in that it affects them gradually. The knife goes in easily and slowly over a period of 4 years.

But, Mr. President, there is not a Senator on this floor or a Member of Congress, or anyone else who has served in Congress, who does not know what happens when an act of this kind is enacted to provide that there shall be an exclusion, that corporation A, which is doing $1,100,000 worth of business shall be affected, and that corporation B, which is doing $950,000 worth of business, shall not be affected. Instantly there is an unfair situation, an unbalanced situation, an arbitrary discrimination which is revolting to those whom it affects.

Furthermore, these little tranquilizing provisions may be put in a measure to sugar-coat the pill and get an entryway, but we all know that next year, or the year after, next Congress, or the Congress after that, the act will be extended to all businesses, to every local retailer or service businessman. I am not questioning for a moment the sincerity or the good faith of the committee or of the Senators who have inserted these provisions in the bill in an attempt to make this measure palatable, but anyone who places any reliance on this distinction being maintained into the future is nurturing false hopes.

I am deeply concerned, as a Senator from my own State of New Hampshire, because the State of New Hampshire is one of the great, I am proud to say, resort States of this country. Without any reflection on the beauties that other States have to offer, I should like, at this point, to call to the attention of Senators that they can travel far and wide, but they can never find a more beautiful State than the land of the White Mountains. Thousands and thousands of people come to visit us each year, with the result that the livelihood of one-third of the people of New Hampshire is in the recreational field. One-third of the livelihood of the people is derived from resort activities, the resort hotels, motels, restaurants, golf facilities, chair lifts up our beautiful mountains, and all the rest. I will state, incidentally, the State is divided about equally, one-third recreational, one-third agricultural, and one-third industrial. One-third of our income is based on recreational activities.

As a young man, when I was working my way through preparatory school and college, I worked as a bellhop in some of our resort hotels every summer. I waited on tables in some of our restaurants. I was able to earn fairly substantial sums during my summer vacations to help me pay my tuition and my way through college. Many, many thousands of students in my own State will be found serving in those capacities at this very moment. Those jobs will not continue to exist under a Federal minimum-wage act.

To be sure, again, this measure, as it appears today, does exempt from its provisions those who serve the public and have tips and gratuities. But I also washed dishes; and there are many who are running dishwashing machines.

So when the Federal Government decides it has got to have its last pound of flesh, that it is going to have a minimum-wage law that reaches into every nook and crevice, and eventually exempts nobody, it can be seen what it does.

Mr. President, I am not talking for business. I am talking for the people who work. I am talking for the people over whom some of the proponents of this bill are wringing their hands and are crying about all over this country, and will be doing so from now to November.

See what would be done for the boys and girls who want summer employment so they can have an education. This Congress has wrung its hands and expressed concern that our boys and girls shall receive an education so that we can compete with the Russians, and has appropriated money toward that end. Then we turn around and take away from them self-reliant means so they can earn their own living.

See what will be done to the elderly people in my State, who are deriving comfort, benefit, and sustenance from their present employment in retail and service establishments.

What would such an act eventually do to those people, to that pool of labor?

Mr. President, I make these remarks with all charity. We have watched the progress of proposed legislation in this body. Those who are behind this far-reaching bill, which would tear down the barriers and would extend the coverage, are the same ones who have steadfastly opposed any act to be passed by the Congress of the United States to enable the elderly who are on social security to earn a reasonable amount of money themselves.

I cannot understand the theory of such people. The theory of those who are supporting this phase of the bill is that they desire to put the older people on the shelf. They wish to have them spend their last years and days in frustration. They wish to have them eke out a living on what they can get from social security, and to earn not more than $1,200 a year, or otherwise lose some or all of their social security. That is the theory of many of the country's labor leaders—not all, I am happy to say. Their theory is that job opportunities should be maintained, saved, and reserved for those in their youth, in the prime of life, and that when a worker reaches the age of retirement he should be put on the shelf, even though medical science has extended the span of his years, so that he has health, so that he has ambitions, so that he is eager to work. They feel he should be put on the shelf despite the fact that he has skills and judgment and is trained to work. These are the people who have something to offer their communities, yet some desire to put them on the shelf.

I join the distinguished Senator from Florida in deploring the fact that already the amendment to retain the retail and service exemption which the Senator intends to offer has been referred to as "hopeless." It has been said that it is bound to be beaten. Mr. President, if the Senate considers and discusses the question, and faces the facts involved in the proposed legislation long enough and carefully enough, the amendment will not be beaten. The bill, if the coverage is extended as it is sought to be extended, will serve as the entering wedge for further extensions, and its safeguards are bound to be torn away year by year. In my opinion, it will turn out to be one of the most atrocious things we shall have done to the working people of this country for a long, long time.

At whom are we striking? At the aged. At the women. At the widows. At the young people.

I wish to mention a few other items. I hold in my hand the summary of the minimum wage bill as reported by the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. The summary emphasizes and enumerates some of the so-called, supposed safeguards. These are what I refer to as the "sugar coating on the bill."

There is a reference, of course, to the $1 million gross sales provision in connection with retail establishments. I have already commented on the discriminatory nature of that proposal, and how certain it is, if the bill is passed, to be taken away.

I was very interested in item No. 5. It refers to telephone operators:

Changes existing exemption for switchboard operators limiting it to switchboard operators employed by an independently-owned public telephone company with 750 or fewer telephones.

That limits the exemption to operators in independently owned companies. That illustrates one of the great inconsistencies in the entire measure. Will someone kindly tell me what is to happen when the switchboard operators of an independently owned telephone company, a small company, find that the girls across the street, the girls with whom they went to high school, who are working in the next town for some component of the Bell Telephone System, are guaranteed a higher wage? We know exactly what will happen. What always happens every time we establish a minimum wage for one group or one class or one business and then try to exempt somebody else, to apply a double standard? These people are going to have to pay the same wages. That exemption is one of many exemptions which is not worth the paper on which it is written, as a practical matter.

The summary also lists another very sweet sounding provision in the bill which could lull us to sleep and make us all vote for it, but I hope it will not. Under the "other provisions" we find the following:

Nonprofit hospitals, educational, and other eleemosynary institutions not covered.

That is a great privilege. The bill does not, of course, cover the nonprofit hospitals, educational, and other charitable and eleemosynary institutions. I hope someone will be able to tell me how the Federal Government can reach into my city or into some other city, into my county or into some other county, or into my State or into some other State, to raise the minimum wage for people who are doing the same work, with the same responsibility and the same requirements, and then expect hospitals and other nonprofit activities to be able to hire help at a different wage. We are not being very practical.

That is another example of what happens. Of course the bill would strike the hospitals and would strike the charitable and nonprofit organizations, unless the whole community, the whole county, or the whole section had nothing else. When we raise the minimum wage for workers we raise the minimum wage for all workers. The so-called exemptions which are put in the bill are completely unrealistic, completely impractical, and only serve to illustrate and to emphasize the hidden dangers in the bill insofar as the extension of coverage is concerned.

Mr. President, I have covered briefly only one point in connection with the bill. I should like to repeat it. I am prepared to support a reasonable increase of the minimum wage, with due regard for its impact on inflation, on the soundness and buying power of the dollar, and on employment levels. But I cannot support the bill as long as it extends the long arm of Federal wage regulation far into the Main Streets of America.

This bill, with its extension of coverage, will do what?

The proposed legislation would strike one of the most vicious blows to small businessmen in small communities—the 2-, 3-, 4-, 5-, 8-, 9-, or 10-man business or enterprise—that has never been struck by any legislation that has ever been passed by the Congress in all of its history.

Observe what the measure proposes. Even if there were permitted to remain in the measure the impractical and unrealistic standard of a $1 million gross business for a mercantile establishment, which will not remain, as I and other Senators know it will not, what would happen? At a time when we are crying out that we must increase the gross product and the gross income of this country, at a time when some of our friends are saying, "Oh, yes, we can have all this pie in the sky and we can give all these things to people because we are going to grow, and grow, and grow, in accordance with this great growth philosophy," what would happen? If the bill were enacted in its present form and allowed to remain, incentive would be removed. Not only that, but Congress would be saying to the small business people of this country, "You had better stay small. You cannot grow. If you reach the point where you have gross sales of over $1 million, then immediately you enter a new class. You enter the class to which different ground rules and a different system are applied."

Here is evident another inconsistency in the so-called exemptions, limitations, and restrictions. The small businessmen are told, "You had better not let your business grow. You had better keep it small. If you do not, you are in trouble."

Actually, however, while that is an apparent defect, it is not a defect that I care to emphasize; because that $1 million limit will be rescinded, and the Federal act will be extended to every small business—small store, small restaurant—along the Main Streets of this country, if we breach the present exemption.

If we travel along the road of this warped and distorted and legalistic definition of interstate commerce, and if the Federal Government from Washington is going to reach into the Main Streets of every town and hamlet of this country, without knowledge of local conditions, without knowledge of local wage scales, without knowledge of the availability of local labor, we shall in effect be saying, "This is the Procrustean bed upon which you are going to be compelled to lie; you will pay this wage no matter what may be the conditions in your community; never mind if we put old people out of a job, no matter if we make it harder for students to earn some money during their vacations; never mind if people fall by the wayside: We will have a great standard minimum wage that goes into every community in the country."

I hope a realization of what the bill means, at least the provisions relating to the extension of coverage, to which I have confined myself, will seep into the minds of Members of Congress, and that more important still, it will seep throughout the country. If the people of the towns and communities of this Nation knew what the bill provides and what it would do, every Senator would receive the greatest outpouring of letters, telegrams, and requests that he has had for many, many a long moon.

I have been impressed by something on the other side of the fence which I wish to mention. Like every other Member of the Senate, I have talked with members and officers of labor unions about this minimum wage bill. I have said to them frankly that I would certainly consider voting for an increased minimum wage but not for an extension of coverage. In every case that I have talked with them face to face I have said to them, "Does it affect you? Does it affect the people in your community in the State which I have the duty of representing in part in this body? What does it do to you? What does it do to the people in your plant?"

Individual members of unions have talked to me about the question. In every instance these individual union members, who usually are employees of a textile mill, a shoe plant, or some other manufacturing establishment, have said,

"No, it will not do anything for me. My minimum wage is above whatever you would be giving. We are just interested in the little fellow throughout the country."

The little fellow throughout the country, I am guessing, is no different from the little fellow in my State, and the little fellow throughout the country, if this bill becomes law, will wake up and find that instead of having his wages increased, he will be out of a job.

So I wish to finish where I started by saying once more that the bill is based upon two philosophies—first, that the States of the Union, their legislatures, and their people are not competent to take care of the minimum wage requirements of their own small business enterprises and to look after their own workers in those enterprises that are, strictly speaking, not in interstate commerce.

Second, it is based upon the fallacy that we concentrate on wages and do not consider jobs. Wages may be temporarily increased, but the measure will destroy jobs for the people who need them most.

I certainly hope that the amendment which I understand will be offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] will prevail. I have enough confidence in the good sense and the practical knowledge of the Senate to believe that the amendment will be agreed to. If the bill does not contain a provision for the extension of coverage, I hope to be able to vote for a reasonable increase in the minimum wage throughout the country for those people for whom the law was designed. But I cannot vote for a bill that crucifies, destroys, and injures the people who need employment in the towns and cities of my own and other States.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. First, I wish to compliment the Senator very sincerely for his fine address, so evidently based on his long observation and on his deep conviction. I certainly appreciate his having brought us the benefit of his experience.

The Senator has spoken with feeling of the elderly people in his State, such as the widows in his State who seek part-time employment, light employment of various kinds, to supplement their slender income. I am glad that he mentioned that point, because my own State, more than perhaps any other State, except one or two, and probably on a parity with them, is filled with elderly people, who have come to our State for health reasons, or simply for their declining years, because they enjoy the warm climate. Many of them come thinking that they have sufficient substance to maintain them throughout the rest of their lives.

Unfortunately, due to the inflation which in part is due to this same law that we are talking about, many of them have had to seek employment or part-time employment. Many of them are employed in our hotels and other establishments which would come within the provisions of this bill. Many of them have eagerly sought an enlargement of the allowance, which the Senator spoke about so accurately, of $1,200, which is the maximum that they can make without shutting off their social security payments.

I have endeavored to remedy that particular situation, as perhaps the Senator knows. The Senators from Florida have introduced over the years measures raising that $1,200 figure to $1,800, and to $2,400. We have never been able to get a sympathetic hearing on that attempt to raise the allowance.

Mr. COTTON. If I may interrupt the Senator briefly, I would say that both Senators from New Hampshire have introduced similar bills, and have striven to bring about that result but they have found their efforts frustrated by the same objections by the same people.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator's experience is so like my own I can see that the misfortunes of our States, though many miles apart in geography, are much the same in connection with this problem.

I certainly commend the Senator's statement in full, particularly the part to which I have referred, because it deals with people who seek jobs which do not carry heavy payments. For instance, I know an elderly woman who is a salad mixer in a large hotel, or an assistant in that field—I do not know how many salad mixers are employed—and she is delighted with the part-time activity each day. I certainly would not want her employment disturbed.

Others who come to mind are those who work in telephone exchanges, or as answerers in a telephone exchange, to fill in for people who are out of town. The Senator is familiar with that kind of service. Others work in various other services, which also would be brought under the provisions of the pending bill.

I believe that those who have drafted the bill have too frequently been blind to the fact that they are going to do a great disservice to some people whom, I suspect, they are most anxious to help.

I thank the Senator for calling attention to this fact.

Mr. COTTON. I think—or at least I have seen figures which indicate it—that the State in the Union which has the largest percentage of elderly people is actually New Hampshire, with Florida close behind. So we do have indeed much in common in our solicitude for those of whom we have been talking.

Mr. HOLLAND. I certainly thank the Senator for that additional observation.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I am happy to yield to my distinguished senior colleague.

Mr. BRIDGES. I wish to compliment my distinguished colleague from New Hampshire for the very outstanding address he has just made. He has hit on many key points and on many fundamental aspects of the bill, particularly those sections that have to do with extended coverage. He has made a valuable contribution to the debate.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. COTTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. There is another provision in the bill which very seriously hits at people in my own State, and I wonder if it also adversely affects the people in the great fruit and vegetable industries in the Senator's State. What I have in mind refers to subsection (b) of item 8 shown on the summary of the bill which has been distributed to the desks of all Senators. The present law provides for 28 exempt overtime weeks each year, because by its very nature it is a seasonal business. I am wondering if those who put up preserves and berries and fruits and vegetables in the Senator's State would also be adversely affected by that provision, cutting down the time and cutting down the hours of work permitted without overtime being paid.

Mr. COTTON. I would say that, so far as I know, and from the information I have received from my State, that particular problem is not of paramount importance to my State. While we have quite a problem of securing seasonal help in picking our apples and harvesting our fruits, and indeed in connection with the potato crop and other matters, my information shows that the processing and canning done within our own State has not been seriously affected by the provision. We sell our fruits and send them to Boston and other industrial areas for processing.

I can readily understand that this would be of very grave significance where the processing and canning occupied a large amount of activity.

Mr. HOLLAND. The citrus processing industry in my own State is the largest fruit processing and canning industry in the world. I am advised by both the people who work in the industry and the employers that they will be very adversely affected by this provision. I thought that perhaps it might apply in the Senator's State also. I have eaten with great pleasure some delicious preserves and canned berries and small fruits which came from the State of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I thought perhaps that this limited season, which would be made even shorter by the suggested law, might affect his State also.

Mr. COTTON. It might well do so in some respects. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that this, with many other provisions in the bill, illustrates the whittling away of exemptions in the bill, which would be a continuous process.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to congratulate the able and distinguished Senator from New Hampshire for the brilliant address he has made this afternoon. I have had the pleasure of serving on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. I have always found him to be sound in his thinking and dedicated to the services of the people of his State and Nation. I wish to commend him for his fine address.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the able Senator from South Carolina. My regard for him and my deep respect and admiration for him make his words particularly precious to me. I thank him very much.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I was delighted to read in the President's message on Monday that he considers legislation relating to the coverage and the level of the Federal minimum wage to be an essential part of the work which Congress must do during this resumption of the 2d session. I agree entirely with his observations as to the necessity for proceeding, getting at, and sticking to the program which he has enunciated, as well as other necessary legislation.

We should not be limited to a select list which any one group or individual may have submitted to us.

The President, on May 3, in his special message to Congress, urged us, in the strongest possible terms, to take up minimum wage legislation. In his message on Monday, he again urged us to enact legislation in this vital area.

There is no reason at all why we could not have enacted this legislation during the regular session of Congress. We had ample opportunity to do so; there were weeks and months at a time when very little was accomplished here.

At any rate, all that is now behind us; and today we are confronted with proposed minimum wage legislation. It is clear that we could have considered this bill at greater length and with more deliberation and care if we had begun to do so several months ago.

As a matter of fact, minimum wage bills have been before the 86th Congress since it opened its doors for business early in 1959. Mr. President, there is little justification for the delay in getting at this important legislation.

As I see it, Mr. President, the fundamental theory underlying the Fair Labor Standards Act, which the pending bill would amend, is that the Federal Government should play a role, although a limited one, in determining the specific wage level below which workers do not receive a sufficient income to adequately support themselves in the society in which we live. Such a minimum living wage has been established in order to prevent instances of suffering and abuse. Furthermore, it was designed to protect all Americans against instances in which underpaid workers would become burdens on the communities in which they lived and upon the Nation as a whole.

I wish to share to this extent in the observations made by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. He expressed regret, as do I, over the failure of this Congress to do anything about the very serious problem relating to older workers who are confined in their earnings to the unrealistic limitation of $100 a month, and who lose their social security benefits if they earn more than that amount. For a long time I have felt that if the social security system is to be a true insurance system, there is no reason at all why older workers should be limited in any way as to the amount of their outside earnings during the later years of their lives. Many of them would enjoy working and would have more useful and happier lives if they were working part time. If we are not prepared to remove the limitation entirely—as I feel sure we will at sometime—in the case of men between the ages of 65 and 72 and women between the ages of 62 and 72, certainly we should substantially raise the amounts they are permitted to earn without having to lose their benefits under the social security law.

The principle of a social minimum—and I stress that it is only a minimum—is a sound one. It has worked effectively since 1938, the year in which the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted.

The pending bill calls for a gradual increase—extending over a period of years—in the minimum, to $1.25.

Mr. President, on May 2 of this year there was published in the Washington Post an excellent editorial on this problem. This editorial was extremely persuasive on the need for a gradual increase in the minimum wage, culminating in $1.25 an hour. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial from the Washington Post be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 2, 1960]

HIGHER MINIMUM WAGE

Modernization of the wage-and-hour law before Congress adjourns ought to be considered an essential. The coverage of the act has not been broadened since 1946, and the minimum wage of $1 an hour has not been changed since 1955. In fairness to the underpaid workers who have felt the rising cost of living but who still earn pitifully low wages, the protections of this act should be enhanced.

Most urgent, in our opinion, is the inclusion within its provisions of many workers not now covered. Originally the act was applied to manufacturing, mining, wholesale trade, finance, insurance, and transportation. Now the Department of Labor thinks it is feasible to extend it to an additional 3.1 million workers in retail trade, construction, transportation, and communications. Unfortunately, this would leave nearly 5 million employees still unprotected, but a gradual approach probably is wise in extending a law so vitally bearing on employment and the cost of labor.

There is much disagreement as to what the new minimum wage should be. One bill under study would set the rate at $1.25 an hour—a 25 percent increase—and require it to be paid to all 8 million workers not now covered. This would be a drastic measure that might cause some unemployment. Secretary Mitchell testified that a 25-cent increase would have twice as great an impact on the low-wage industries—chiefly small business—as did the similar increase which became effective in 1956.

Whatever figure Congress may adopt for employees now receiving the $1 minimum, it would be desirable to let the newly covered employees step up to it over a period of months. As some of the uncovered employees now earn only 60 cents an hour, a $1.25 rate would more than double their pay. That might be ruinous to some small businesses and in any event would be a strong incentive to payroll trimming. Substandard wages ought to be eliminated from the American economy, but this should not be attempted in such long leaps as to defeat the purpose.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, as all of us know, at the time of its inception the Fair Labor Standards Act met with strong opposition from many quarters. But I believe that almost all Americans today recognize and accept the basic purposes of that act and are in essential agreement with the declaration of policy set forth in the preamble of the original act; namely, that it seeks to prevent labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for the health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers.

Certainly my own party has, in its recently adopted platform, recognized the necessity for minimum-wage legislation. In our platform, we pledged an upward revision in amount and extended coverage of the minimum wage to several million more workers.

Minimum wage legislation involves both the Federal Government and the governments of the several States. In industries classified as intrastate commerce, it is the States which must act if workers and communities are to have the benefit of minimum-wage regulations.

New York State has always had model minimum-wage legislation. Our first minimum-wage bill was enacted in 1937, 1 year before the Federal law was enacted. That New York State law established a minimum wage on an industry-by-industry basis, by means of State wage orders set by minimum wage boards appointed by the New York State industrial commissioner. Not only is New York's minimum-wage legislation of long standing, but it has been kept up to date. This year, under the leadership of Governor Rockefeller, our legislature passed a State law increasing the New York minimum wage from 75 cents to $1 an hour and extending coverage to an additional 700,000 workers. This law is presently being put into effect through the promulgation of new wage orders.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a memorandum by Governor Rockefeller, filed with the assembly bill passed the New York State Legislature on April 18, 1960 which raised the New York minimum wage to $1 an hour.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM BY GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER

This bill, recommended to the legislature in my annual message, establishes for the first time a statewide wage floor of $1 an hour and streamlines the flexibile industry-by-industry wage board procedure for establishing higher minimum wages for workers in the State.

The State's minimum wage law was enacted in 1937. It sets no general minimum, but provides for a tripartite wage board, appointed on an industry-by-industry basis, to establish minimum wages for each industry or occupation. Under this procedure, up to the present time approximately 1,300,000 workers in 10 different intrastate industries have been covered by minimum wage orders. This coverage has been slowly achieved and a great many workers, although not excluded by statute, remain uncovered by wage orders. A number of these workers are in lowpaid occupations.

This bill combines the simplicity of a statutory minimum wage with the desirable flexibility of the industry-by-industry wage board procedure. Specifically, the bill—

Extends minimum wage coverage to 700,000 workers who are not covered by either a State minimum wage order or by the Federal minimum wage law and establishes for them a minimum wage of $1 an hour.

Raises to $1 an hour all rates in the 10 existing minimum wage orders that are lower than $1 an hour.

Retains necessary provisions for allowances for gratuities and meals, lodging and other items supplied by the employer.

Permits wage rates lower than the minimum for learners, apprentices, handicapped persons, and students employed at resort hotels and camps, in order to prevent curtailment of job opportunities for these workers.

Establishes a more expeditious wage board procedure by reducing, in a reasonable manner, the time-delay between the convening of the board and the effective date of new wage orders.

Requires the posting of reasonable security on appeals within the Labor Department in order to protect workers against negation of wage orders through default or dissolution of employers.

Reduces the number of hearings required for promulgation of a final wage order, while preserving fully the opportunity of all interested persons to be heard.

This measure represents a most significant achievement for the State of New York. It establishes for the first time a statewide wage floor of $1 an hour. It also permits adjustment of minimum wages in sensitive response to general wage levels and living costs while, at the same time, preserving the flexibility required by the problems of each industry and occupation.

The bill is approved.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, although minimum wage legislation has always been of great importance to my State, the evidence clearly indicates that wages in New York State are well above the Federal and State legal minimums.

Let us look at the figures.

Mr. President, I submit two tables showing the average hourly wages in New York in both manufacturing and nonmanufacturing industries. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, a quick review of these data will show that none of the rates listed for manufacturing industries are below $1 an hour, or, indeed, below $1.25 an hour.

In the case of nonmanufacturing industries, I do not have the hourly rates. However, it is clear from the weekly rates given and the average hours worked, that in these industries, as well, New York's average rates are well above the existing Federal minimum, or the proposed minimum of $1.25, which is before us here today.

I realize, of course, that these are averages, and that there are undoubtedly industries and workers that are not represented which could be markedly affected by any change in either State or Federal minimum wage rates statutes.

Nevertheless, it is clear that New York State has done well by its people. We have had responsible government, and we have had a sound economy for years, and we are very proud of that fact. But there is one "catch." It is ironical that, in many cases, because of New York's good wages and community services, we have in recent years suffered the loss of industries which have moved to low-wage areas, oftentimes areas where wages have been deliberately and systematically kept down, to take advantage of these lower rates.

Although they were not intended for this purpose, Federal minimum wage laws have helped New York and other similarly high wage industrial States. By bringing wages in low-wage areas up to the Federal minimum, Congress reduces the capacity of low-wage areas to "pirate" away the industries of States which have good laws, strong laws, to take care of their workers.

In addition to the fact that minimum wage legislation is of very great assistance to lower-paid workers and their families, its effect in reducing industrial relocation to low-wage areas is, to my mind, another and important reason for seeing to it that from time to time we make needed and realistic adjustments in the Federal minimum wage.

I am fully aware that many who are concerned about the bill before us today, S. 3758, are particularly interested in certain of its provisions which would extend the coverage of the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act to industries not previously covered.

I am aware of the basis of this concern, and shall certainly listen to the full debate which will take place on many of the amendments which will be offered to change, increase, or decrease here or there, coverage under the provisions of this bill, and will weigh these coverage provisions very carefully. In the final analysis, it is these sections which are, in many respects, the most significant and far reaching issues raised by the bill now before us.

As to the level of the minimum wage, I am entirely willing to accept the rates established in S. 3758. It calls for $1.25 an hour for all presently covered workers, to be accomplished in gradual stages—actually reaching the $1.25 level in 3 years.

For a 40-hour week, $1.25 an hour means $50 a week, or around $2,600 a year. All of us know that today this is, by any standard, a very modest wage. A worker with a family is hard pressed to provide adequately for all of his needs on $50 a week. In all those cases in which the jobs concerned are those of family breadwinners, with children, $1.25 an hour is certainly not excessive. Below this level, real hardship can, and often does, result.

Mr. President, I have received many letters written by individuals, not inspired by organizations, which have been very persuasive in favor of the necessity for establishing a higher minimum than that under the present law.

There has been, of course, very active espousal of an increase in the minimum wage by several of our national organizations. I have met with many representatives of labor organizations and of trade and industrial organizations affected by this legislation. I have listened to their presentations with great interest and carefully reviewed the arguments of those on both sides of this issue.

I should like to pay tribute to the manner in which all of these organizations presented their views to me. They have been courteous and fair in their presentation, and I have appreciated the manner in which they have received my thinking on the subject.

Mr. President, at this point, I should like to offer for the RECORD a letter from the director of the Joint Minimum Wage Committee of the A.F. of L.–CIO, together with an attached list of New York representatives with whom Senator JAVITS and I conferred on minimum wage legislation. It is typical of the courteous way in which so many groups responded to discussions with them of minimum wage legislation. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and list were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR AND CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, D.C., February 8, 1960.

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KEATING: At the request of Miss Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, I am sending you a list of names and addresses of the trade union delegation which met with you and Senator JAVITS last week.

The delegates have asked me to thank you for the time you spent with them discussing the importance of the $1.25 an hour minimum wage and extended coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

We sincerely hope that we can count on your support of this legislation when it comes before the Senate.

Sincerely yours,
KENNETH MEIKLEJOHN,
Director,
Joint Minimum Wage Committee.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, one type of letter which I received, and which has carried great weight, has been from workers who themselves are not affected by any change in the minimum because they are now receiving more than the minimum, but who have recognized the necessity for relief for their coworkers who are not as fortunate as they. I want to commend the unselfish attitude of the many persons who have written to me in this vein.

When one takes the increase in the cost of living into account, its impact over the past several years, and its potential impact between now and the next 3 or 4 years up to 1963, when the $1.25 minimum would begin, it is clear that the minimum wage cannot be held static.

It would be a fine thing if we could completely stabilize the increase in the cost of living. Great progress has been made in the course of the past few years as compared to the preceding years.

But there has been an increase in living costs. And even if human appetites are constant, prices do go up, and the needs of workers and their families can no longer be met satisfactorily under a minimum wage keyed to a previous period. But this increase in the cost of living, this inflation is not the only argument. As our national prosperity rises and tastes change, it is clear that our personal goals of achievement also change.

At one time, the average homeowner was content with a fireplace and good supply of fuel. Now, he needs central heating. To an extent, our minimum wage must take into account increases in living standards, which require that the wage earner's take-home pay be somewhat greater. I do not want to belabor this point. I think it is valid and of importance.

When all is said and done, the minimum wage must be of that level below which the savings to the employer are much less than the additional—and may I add, unwarranted—costs incurred by our total national economy.

Mr. President, as I pointed out earlier, the passage of statutes raising the minimum wage does not have a marked impact on New York State. New Yorkers are, in fact, often the victims of insufficient coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I refer to those cases in which other lower wage areas are able to "pirate" industries away from New York because of the lower wages prevailing in these areas.

The force of competition makes it hard for the manufacturer to turn such opportunities down. The real loser is the worker who is exploited to attract him. It is this worker and his family who pay the price for this type of industrial relocation. More often than not, relocation turns out to be a headache to the new employer as well as to the community from which he moved.

Mr. President, to sum up, I am in agreement with the principle of a minimum wage. I do not feel that $1.25 in 1963, 3 years from now is excessive.

I am eager to hear the debate and study the provisions of S. 1046 as to extending the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I am definitely convinced that it is these provisions which are most fundamental and perplexing and which we must scrutinize and discuss to the fullest possible extent in our consideration of the bill which is now before us.

We must consider these provisions, which have been the subject of considerable study by members of the committee and those outside the committee who have also given much conscientious study to these provisions.

I feel sure that we can enact a measure which will be satisfactory, which will, in turn, be approved by the Chief Executive, and which will become law, to the benefit of all our Nation's industries and to the benefit of workers in these industries.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HEALTH PLANS FOR THE AGED

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Finance and, indeed, as a Senator, I have a particular interest in the various proposals for health plans for the aged which are now before the Congress and the committee.

I am convinced that such programs should be under social security and that, in addition, we should provide a health plan for the aged who are outside social security. I am a sponsor of the McNamara bill and I believe in the principles which are to be found in it. In addition, I shall support in committee, as a minimum, the Anderson amendments which, while they do not go as far as the McNamara bill, would establish the program under social security and would provide an excellent beginning.

The Anderson amendments provide for an increase in the combined employer-employee contributions of one-half of 1 percent with a corresponding increase of three-eighths of 1 percent in the contribution of the self-employed.

As I reviewed the proposal it seemed to me that perhaps even more benefits might be provided for the increase of one-half of 1 percent in payroll contributions than the estimates by the Social Security Administration gave for the Anderson amendments. I therefore addressed a letter on August 1, to Mr. Robert J. Myers, the Chief Actuary of the Social Security Administration, proposing some additional benefits and asking for an official actuarial cost estimate of the proposal.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my letter to Mr. Myers, along with the specific proposals for health benefits for the aged be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter and specific proposals were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 1, 1960.

Mr. ROBERT J. MYERS,
Social Security Administration,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MYERS: Would you kindly give me estimates on the cost of the attached proposal for providing health benefits for the aged as part of the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance system?

My objective is to provide a constructive program which can be adequately financed by additional contributions of one-fourth percent by employers, one-fourth percent by employees, and three-eighths percent by the self-employed on earnings up to $4,800. These contributions would start in 1961, and benefits would be payable September 1.

I would appreciate knowing (1) the level-premium cost by item, and the early-year cost in percent of payrolls and in dollars; (2) whether the proposal can be considered actuarially sound.

With best wishes.

Faithfully,

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

PROPOSAL ON HEALTH BENEFITS TO COST 0.5 PERCENT OF PAYROLLS

Persons eligible: OASDI eligibles 68.

Benefits (starting September 1, 1961):

1. Hospital care up to 180 days with an initial deductible of $75.

2. Skilled nursing-home recuperative care, up to 180 days, but with a ceiling of 300 days on combined hospital and nursing-home care.

3. Home health services by a nonprofit home health service agency—365 days.

4. Diagnostic outpatient hospital services.

Possible modifications (to reduce cost if the above exceeds 0.5 percent on an actuarially sound basis):

1. Increase the initial deductible to $100, with or without a 3-day limitation.

2. Introduce a deductible of $10 in connection with diagnostic outpatient hospital services.

Financing: One-fourth percent contribution by employers and employees, and three-eighths percent by the self-employed, starting in 1961, with a special account or trust fund.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The proposal differs from the Anderson amendments primarily by cutting out the second $75 deductible to be paid after 24 days in a hospital; by providing for home health services in addition or in lieu of visiting nurse services; and by providing for diagnostic outpatient hospital services.

These are very important items. They would allow a doctor, for example, to consent to bringing in practical nurses or others to clean up the home and care for the aged a few hours a day without having to have this done either by a registered nurse or by a licensed nurse.

In addition, the proposal would allow a doctor to have an elderly person receive diagnostic services without actually entering a hospital. This is important for a variety of reasons, namely as a step in preventive medicine and so that the elderly may receive some treatment before they become so ill that they have to be hospitalized or institutionalized to receive help.

Mr. Myers replied to me on August 4. He stated that the total level premium cost for the proposal was 0.51 percent of payroll and stated that "the proposal as it stands can be considered to be fully financed and thus actuarially sound."

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of his reply be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., August 4, 1960.

Hon. PAUL H. DOUGLAS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DOUGLAS: This is in response to your letter of August 1 requesting actuarial cost estimates for a proposal and several alternatives for providing health benefits for all eligibles of the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program aged 68 and over. This would be financed by an increase in the combined employer-employee contribution rate of one-half of 1 percent (and a corresponding increase in the contribution rate for the self-employed).

Under the proposal, benefits would first be available for September 1961, while the additional contributions would begin in January 1961. The first benefit would be hospital care up to a maximum of 180 days, with an initial deductible of $75; this has a level-premium cost, according to the intermediate-cost estimate, of 0.44 percent of payroll. The second benefit would be skilled nursing home recuperative care up to a maximum of 180 days (but with an overall maximum of 300 days for this benefit and the preceding one); the level-premium cost is 0.01 percent. The third benefit would be home health services (by a nonprofit agency) for a maximum of 365 days; the level-premium cost is 0.01 percent. The fourth benefit would be diagnostic outpatient hospital services (without any limits prescribed); the level-premium cost is 0.05 percent.

The total level-premium cost for the above proposal is thus 0.51 percent of payroll, which is almost exactly the same as the additional contributions provided, so that the proposal as it stands can be considered to be fully financed and thus actuarially sound. The total cost of the proposal in the first full year of operation is estimated at $710 million, which is equivalent to 0.34 percent of payroll.

You suggested two possible modifications to reduce the cost of the proposal, if necessary for actuarial soundness. Although this does not seem necessary in view of the above analysis, I am nevertheless giving you the effect of these modifications. First, if the initial deductible for the hospital benefit is increased from $75 to $100, the level-premium cost would be reduced by 0.04 percent of payroll. Second, if a $10 deductible is introduced for the diagnostic outpatient hospital services, the level-premium cost would be reduced by 0.01 percent of payroll.

I hope that this furnishes you with the information that you desire. If not, or if there is anything further than I can do for you, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT J. MYERS,
Chief Actuary.

Mr. DOUGLAS. On August 9 I sent Mr. Myers a telegram asking for more detailed year by year statistics on the contributions and the cost of benefits and the size of the ultimate reserve.

I ask unanimous consent that my telegram to him appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 9, 1960.

Mr. ROBERT J. MYERS,
Chief Actuary, Social Security Administration, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Washington, D.C.:

Deeply appreciate your full and courteous reply to my letter of August 1. I am greatly reassured by your figures. You estimate the cost for the first year of the constructive program which I outlined at $710 million, or equivalent to 0.34 percent of payroll. You also state that the total level premium costs of the proposals would be 0.51 percent of payroll. I would now appreciate more detailed statistics year by year giving the balance of contributions and benefits and the size of the ultimate reserve.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Myers replied on August 10. His figures indicate that until 1985, contributions would exceed benefits. During the next 15 years, or to the year 2,000, benefits would exceed contributions. In the next period, or to the year 2015, contributions would again be greater than benefits, and following that benefits would again exceed contributions. However, Mr. Myers points out that up to the year 2040, any excess of benefits over contributions would be counterbalanced by interest earnings credited to the account.

In addition, Mr. Myers points out that the fund would build up from a figure of $2 billion by the end of the year 1965, to $4 billion by the end of 1970, $13 billion by the year 2,000, and $27 billion by the year 2040.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Myers' further memorandum and attached tables appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum and tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 10, 1960.

Memorandum: Robert J. Myers.

Subject: Progress of medical insurance fund under proposal of Senator DOUGLAS.

This memorandum presents an estimate of the progress of the medical insurance fund that would be established under a proposal by Senator DOUGLAS. The level-premium cost of this proposal according to the intermediate-cost estimate is 0.51 percent of payroll, or slightly more than the additional combined employer-employee contribution rate of one-half percent provided by the proposal.

The attached table shows the estimated progress of the medical insurance fund consistent with our long-range OASDI cost estimates. In calendar year 1961, income would exceed outgo by over $700 million, since contributions would be collected during the entire year, but benefit payments would be made only for the last third of the year; there would, of course, be some lag in the collection of contributions, particularly in respect to self-employed persons. In 1962 and the years immediately following, contributions would be about $300 million more than benefit payments, with the difference gradually decreasing in future years; and, in fact, becoming virtually eliminated by 1985. From 1985 to 2000 benefits would exceed contributions. Between 2000 and 2015, contributions would again show a small increase over benefits, because of the relatively small size of the aged population at about the turn of the century. Thereafter, however, benefits would again rise more rapidly than contributions and would exceed them by a significant amount. However, up to about the year 2040, any excess of benefits over contributions would be counterbalanced by interest earnings credited to the account. From then on, benefits are expected to exceed the combined income from contributions and interest.

As a result of the significant excess of contributions over benefit payments for the next few decades, a sizable amount in the account would be developed. This would amount to over $2 billion at the end of 1965, almost $4 billion at the end of 1970, $13 billion in the year 2000, rising to $27 billion in the year 2040, and from then on, gradually declining.

ROBERT J. MYERS.

Estimated progress of medical insurance fund under proposal of Senator Douglas

[All figures in millions]

Calendar year	Contributions	Benefit payments	Interest on account	Account at end of year
1961	$835	$134	$9	$710
1963	1,053	716	35	1,438
1964	1,069	770	48	1,785
1965	1,084	803	61	2,127
1970	1,177	941	124	3,921
1980	1,372	1,262	216	7,413
1990	1,593	1,625	303	10,309
2000	1,852	1,852	393	13,391

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, these figures indicate that even somewhat greater benefits than those provided by the Anderson amendments can be fully financed by the contribution of 0.50 percent of payroll provided in the Anderson amendments.

It is of great importance that this long overdue program be gotten under way at once. It is clear that the Anderson amendments are more than actuarially sound and that when the bill gets to the floor the benefits for the level premium cost of 0.50 percent of payroll can be increased considerably.

Personally, I am prepared to move even beyond this and provide that nursing home care be available not merely as "recuperative care" after a hospital stay but in combination with or in lieu of hospital care. In other words, I think we should provide for nursing home care initially as well as following hospital care. This would cost an additional 0.10 percent of payroll. I favor this for I think it is of great importance that the aged of this country be provided with adequate medical care both within and outside hospitals.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. McNAMARA. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if he now feels that the age limit of 65 established in the original bill that he cosponsored is not actuarily sound?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think it is actuarily sound if the assessment is raised to the figure provided by the Senator from Michigan.

The Anderson amendment was an attempt to reduce the total.

Mr. McNAMARA. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I merely say that within the limits of the Anderson amendment more benefits could safely be provided than contemplated in the original proposal of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. McNAMARA. With a very slight pick up in our gross national product and with a comparable pick up in our economy, I believe that we can stick with the bill that the Senator from Illinois and I sponsored originally. I believe that Mr. Myers has gone overboard on the safe side. I hope the Senator will not leave us at this point.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am a follower of the Senator from Michigan on this subject. He is the chairman of the Subcommittee on the Aged. I think his is the best bill, and I will support it. I merely say that if we are driven to the Anderson bill, we can provide more benefits under the Anderson contribution rates than the Anderson benefit provisions now provide.

Mr. McNAMARA. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Merely for the purpose of information from the Committee on Finance, can the Senator tell us whether, when the committee brings whatever bill it brings to the floor, it will bring us the various responses to actuarial and factual questions which it has received?

I believe that would be extremely helpful. As the Senator knows that is a subject in which I have a very deep interest. I think it would be helpful if they did what the Senator is doing graciously today, give us the individual data that they have accumulated, such as the cost of the alternative of a home-care nursing program along the line of the information the Senator has given us with respect to the additional one-tenth of 1 percent of payroll deduction. That is extremely important. I hope the Senator will help us to have that information on the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not the chairman of the committee, but I agree that the Membership of the Senate should have available to it the fullest information on the approximate cost of various features, not merely as totals, but broken down with respect to individual items.

Mr. JAVITS. As they have already been ascertained, so we will not have to guess about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. McNAMARA. I should like to say to the Senator from New York that we have all kinds of breakdowns. I shall be glad to answer any of his questions along that line. We have those figures in our subcommittee.

Mr. JAVITS. I hope very much that when we get the bill on the floor this information will be available. I think this is one bill that will be written on the floor.

Mr. McNAMARA. We will have the information available.

THE PROMISES AND PROBLEMS OF AMERICA IN THE 1960'S

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I believe in the system of government established in the beginning of this Republic. In plain words, I am a man who takes the Constitution seriously.

Not only do I believe in its validity as law; I also believe in the broad philosophy of government that inspired the Founding Fathers to devise the Constitution. These were men who had known tyranny firsthand. Their uppermost thought was to guard against it.

I believe in the principle of federalism. And I agree with Abraham Lincoln that "the Union must and shall be preserved." I disagree with those who say all government is evil. An unorganized people is incapable of maintaining internal order or of defending themselves. However, strongly centralized government—fascism, communism, or socialism—can survive only at the expense of freedom.

A union of strong State and local governments offers the best hope of maintaining strength without losing freedom.

NO MAGIC IN GOVERNMENT

The older I grow the more I marvel at the willingness of many people to believe that there is magic in government; the more government we have, the more magic available.

I have been a Member of the U.S. Senate for 24 years. Before that, I served as Governor of my State. During those years, I have never seen evidence of any magical formula for solving problems of government.

Nevertheless, there is no shirking the fact that we seem to need a good deal of governing—more in our time than 50 years ago. Our vastly more complex social order appears to require more complicated types of regulation. But, the best regulation is self-regulation; the most efficient government is self-government.

When neither the efforts of individuals nor of local governments can cope with a problem, the State, and then, if necessary, the Federal Government should step in.

The American system of government is serving our people magnificently. I shall not dwell on the statistical facts reflecting our tremendous economic growth. Let it suffice merely to mention that, in 1952, the average weekly earnings of factory workers was $67.97. Today it is well over $90.

During this same period, homeownership has risen at a steady and healthy rate—and I mention that because I know of no more reliable and significant indicator of economic health. Today more than 60 percent of us own or are buying our own homes.

THE PROBLEM OF INFLATION

During the past quarter century of crisis during which economic catastrophe was followed by war, more economic troubles, and yet another war, the problem of inflation reared its ugly head, and the cost of living soared.

The 100-cent dollar slipped downward to 90 cents, then 80, 70, and so on, until, during the Korean war, it skidded to 52 cents. We put the brakes on the inflationary roller coaster in 1953, and since then, have held the depreciation of the dollar to just a few cents. It is now worth approximately 48 cents, in comparison with the 1939 dollar.

No matter how we express it or illustrate it, inflation is a major problem. It is a black mark on the record of our economic performance and a black cloud on the horizon of the 1960's.

In my opinion, although we have effectively slowed down inflation in the past few years, it is still the major domestic problem facing the Nation.

THE THREE CAUSES OF INFLATION

There are three principal causes of inflation. One is profiteering by business.

Another is excessive wage demands by labor. The third, and the one I am most directly interested in, is irresponsible Government spending.

The clearest lesson of the past is that no society can long tolerate continued depreciation of its currency. Within the present century inflation has played a major role in the destruction of pre-Communist Russia, pre-Hitler Germany, and pre-Communist China. More nations have fallen as a result of inflation than as a result of war.

I believe the following quotation illustrates this point graphically:

The first panacea for a mismanaged nation is inflation of the currency; the second is war. Both bring temporary prosperity; both bring a permanent ruin. But both are the refuge of political and economic opportunists.

INFLATION THREAT MUST BE MET HEAD ON

This threat, which dominates the domestic problems confronting us in this decade, must be met head on. There is no magic formula that will solve it. It cannot be solved by political drumbeating or the reckless spending of the people's money.

We must set higher standards of fiscal responsibility. The prevailing policy too often has been a combination of promising handouts to every special interest group that comes along, plus an unwillingness to tell the people frankly and honestly what the cost will be in terms of higher taxes or deficit spending—and the cruel indirect tax of inflation which inevitably results.

BALANCED BUDGET KEY TO PROGRESS

The mistaken idea has been planted that the drive for a balanced Federal budget stifles progress. On the contrary, by balancing the budget, the Federal Government can contribute to solid progress by stabilizing the dollar. The alternative is creeping or leaping inflation—depending on the amount of deficit spending.

Inflation is not progress—it is only the illusion of progress. During inflation we receive higher wages, but it buys less than before, so how can we say we are making progress?

The greatest service the Federal Government could do for the people right now is to put its fiscal house in order. The greatest service the people could do for the Federal Government is to demand fiscal responsibility of elected representatives.

MY OPPONENT IS INTERESTED IN DOLLARS; I AM INTERESTED IN PEOPLE

One political accusation that I am sick and tired of hearing is the one that goes something like this: "My opponent is interested in dollars; I am interested in people."

That is the cry of the demagog. What hogwash.

This absurd charge is usually leveled at any conscientious public servant who questions a costly Government spending program designed to benefit a special interest group.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Do not Senators of every conviction, of every philosophy, in every area, in every party have to be elected by the votes of the people?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. They, therefore, very directly represent the people and have to be elected by them before they can get into office.

Mr. BRIDGES. They certainly do, and should be.

Let me ask this question: Whose dollars are we talking about? Are they not the people's dollars? Or have we forgotten the screams of anguish against Government spending the last time income taxes were due?

I think this question should be asked of every Government spending proposal: Is it the best use of the public's money in the public's interest?

THE MORTGAGE ON AMERICA'S FUTURE

Many people know that we have a so-called public debt of $292 billion.

But even that staggering figure does not tell the whole story of the mortgage on America's future.

If there is any group which should be interested in the mortgage on America's future, it should be the young people of the country.

The fact is that our present national debt of $292 billion doesn't include present Federal liabilities for past services in even greater amounts.

These present liabilities for past services—in the form of military retirement, retirement for civilian Government employees, pensions and compensation to veterans—come to another $350 billion. I am not criticizing these particular programs. They are justified and, I believe, sound. But nevertheless, they must be added to the tally.

But even that is not the whole story.

On top of all that is $98 billion of commitments for future Federal spending for such things as the Interstate Highway System, public works, public housing, and unexpended balances in the defense program.

This comes to an incredible grand total of $740 billion.

That is the Federal Government's mortgage on America's future, beyond the regular annual costs of defense and necessary domestic programs.

Now I ask: Do we have a right to allow this time bomb to keep getting bigger and bigger until it explodes under future generations of Americans?

I say we have no such right.

I say we have a responsibility to our children and their children to start reducing this mortgage by making some payments on the principle of our national debt.

Common sense tells us we cannot live forever on credit cards. The same thing applies to government.

The Government has to start paying its own way, now and in the future.

LEGISLATION TO CURB INFLATION

I believe this so strongly that over the years I have introduced and supported as much, if not more, legislation than any other Senator now in the Congress, aimed at curbing the trend toward fiscal suicide. I am proud to say that many of my proposals have been adopted. I am sorry to say that others have not. But I shall never give up this fight.

The distinguished senior Senator from Virginia, HARRY F. BYRD, and I cosponsored the Bridges-Byrd constitutional amendment that would put the Federal Government on a pay-as-you-go basis. When enough of our senatorial colleagues are sufficiently concerned with the alarming state of the U.S. Treasury, I believe this proposal will be adopted.

Despite the huge public debt, there are certain domestic programs that need to be instituted, expanded, or revised. Some of them would save tax money. Some would cost money. I think we could accomplish these programs, and pay as we go, too.

SOCIAL SECURITY MUST BE MODERNIZED

A person who works 30 or 40 years, through savings, participation in a pension plan, and/or the social security program, is entitled to live out his years in peace and financial security.

However, when a person saves on the basis of a 100-cent dollar, but upon retirement finds that he must pay for food, shelter, and clothing on the basis of an inflated dollar—it is like changing the rules in the middle of the game, and it is not equitable.

The rules have changed in the past 20 years, during which, as I mentioned earlier, the dollar has depreciated from 100 cents to 48 cents. As a result, many of our senior citizens are caught in an inflationary trap not of their making.

We relieved the pressure somewhat when the personal exemption for income tax purposes was raised to $1,200 for persons over 65 years old. This move I supported for a long period but the seriousness of the problem calls for additional action.

There are various recommendations before Congress having to do with easing the pressure on our senior citizens. One, which I introduced, would permit a man or woman to earn up to $1,800 a year without sacrificing any of his social security benefits. This, it seems to me, is logical and just. The Nation needs the wisdom and skills of our elder citizens. And they need the freedom to work and earn, to the limit of their capabilities. The present law puts a penalty on those who are able and happy to work and earn.

MEDICAL AID FOR THE AGED

Another proposal before Congress of interest to our retirees is the plan for hospitalization insurance for citizens over 65 years old.

Actually, there are several proposals. One is the Forand bill—a compulsory, socialized-medicine approach that would be operated by the Federal Government. Another is the administration's Medicare plan—a voluntary plan in which responsibility would be shared by the Federal Government, the States, and the individual. In addition, several other plans on this subject have proposed greater or less coverage than the first two proposals.

The Forand bill benefits many people who do not need the benefits, but leaves out 4 million aged not covered by social security, more than half of whom have incomes of less than $1,000 a year. And the Forand bill is compulsory for those who come under its provisions.

I am opposed to compulsion.

I believe in personal freedom.

I will support a workable, and equitable plan which will benefit the largest number of our senior citizens in the lower income brackets.

INTERNAL SECURITY

I often refer to the Communist conspiracy as "international," because it operates in every country of the world including the United States. It will continue to be a grave problem for many years into the future.

This means that our law enforcement agencies at every level of government will have to devote time, study, and manpower to this evil menace.

Everybody is against communism, but all too few of us fully understand the nature of the beast and even fewer of us do anything practical to expose and retard it from making further inroads into our society. Merely being "against" leprosy is not going to do much to stop the spread of that dread disease or to prevent others from contracting it. Communism has been aptly described as a leprosy of the human soul. It most positively is not the result of poverty and ignorance as so many well-meaning but badly informed people will still try to tell you even today.

HOME-GROWN COMMUNISTS AND COURT CONFUSION

It has been pointed out years ago that those States with the highest income levels and highest expenditures per capita for education also have the largest percentage of Communists.

During 1947 and 1948, when the House Committee on Un-American Activities was holding its sensational hearings exposing Soviet atomic espionage in this country, a long list of witnesses took the fifth amendment, not only on the question of whether they were Communists, but also on the question of whether they had ever engaged in espionage. With two or three exceptions, they were all native-born Americans with exceptional scholastic records.

In spite of the proven threat, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled, in the Steve Nelson case, that the States could not enforce their anti-subversion laws. The Court's decision was based on the so-called preemption doctrine that the State's law had been invalidated by Federal law.

I have sponsored legislation that would specifically authorize the States to enforce their anti-Communist laws. We must fight communism with every weapon of the law, at every level of government.

THE LOYALTY OATH

The attack on the loyalty oath provision of our National Defense Education Act is another symptom of misguided liberalism. I see nothing wrong in asking all persons who are receiving any kind of financial assistance from American taxpayers to pledge allegiance to the principles for which the Nation stands.

We need more patriotism in this country, not less. We need, as we have never needed before, young people who will realize what has made America strong. And we need young people who are not ashamed to stand up and proudly say that they pledge their allegiance to the United States of America.

THE PROBLEM OF CRIME AND JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

According to FBI figures, one murder or other major crime is now committed in the United States every 4 minutes. Last year, some 271,000 autos were stolen.

Some believe that crime was largely the product of poverty, ignorance, lack of schooling, bad companions, and bad home influence. But some of our most shocking and senseless crimes are committed by youngsters from good homes and the products of the best and most expensive educational system in the world. Some 800,000 youngsters under 18 years of age were arrested in 1958 for crimes other than traffic violations. Almost 20 percent of some 2 million persons arrested were under 21. Obviously, all of the 800,000 juveniles involved in crimes in 1 year could not have come from broken homes or underprivileged families.

When testifying last February before a congressional subcommittee, J. Edgar Hoover stated that lewd films, indecent magazines, sensational yellow journalism, and lurid, crime-inciting TV shows were in part responsible, particularly books, magazines, TV shows, films, and other media which glamorized and glorified criminals and poked fun at traditional religious virtues, morality, and ordinary decency.

COMMERCE AND SMALL BUSINESS

The Constitution proclaims, in part, that Congress shall have the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States."

This is as it should be. Chaos would result if each State made its own rules and regulations concerning the tons of products which flow across State lines and abroad, in trucks, trains, ships, and planes.

I hold the view that Federal laws affecting commerce should be predicated on the mutual well-being of all the States, and should never benefit one at the expense of others.

Therefore, I have opposed, in its present form, the so-called depressed areas legislation, because it could be used as a license for industry pirating, subsidized by taxpayers money.

With equal vigor, I support trade policies, both foreign and domestic, that serve the long-range interests of our industrial shareholders and our workers' wages.

For my native New Hampshire and for the overall well-being of the Nation, I have for 24 years used my good offices on behalf of the textile, lumber, leather goods, mica, and other industries, and the millions of American workers they represent.

Small business, the backbone of our economy, deserves special attention, and has received it. The Small Business Administration, created by the 83d Congress, is one of the finest and most efficient agencies of government in this country. I voted to create it, and I have consistently voted to sustain it. My only regret is that more small businesses do not take advantage of the services offered by the SBA. But I believe they will as time goes by and as its work becomes better known.

THE FARM PROBLEM AND SURPLUSES

The farmer is caught in a vicious cost-price squeeze brought on by ever-rising labor, tax, and other production costs. But the farmer's best interests are not served by merely imposing high, rigid price supports on the crops deemed to be basic.

Such Federal policies may bring temporary relief to those on the receiving end of the subsidies, but they do not solve the long-range farm problem. On the contrary, they aggravate the situation, by encouraging the production of greater surpluses and by bringing about higher taxes which fall equally upon the farmers and the industrial workers.

When I review farm legislation and proposals, sometimes I wonder whether the authors have ever seen the inside of a dairy barn. Price supports on feed grains have cost billions of dollars during the past several years to the poultrymen, the dairymen, and the feeders of other livestock.

The farmer's problems will be solved by seeking to eliminate the causes of current dislocations in agriculture. Surpluses must be reduced; the wage-price spiral in industry must be halted; and strict economy must be observed in the administration of our farm programs.

Net farm income must be raised; and, at the same time, the inflated levels of other segments of the economy must be lowered, so that farm income has a chance to catch up.

EDUCATION, LABOR, AND MANPOWER

As a member of the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences and as a member of the Preparedness Investigating Subcommittee, I have taken part in what I consider the most vital deliberations of this session of Congress.

In plotting our Nation's role in the conquest of outer space, we have had to give prime consideration to the shortage of engineering, scientific, and technically trained manpower. More than that, we have had to consider the future problem of manpower for the Nation's industrial machine that produces consumer goods. These problems are closely related. This Nation seeks to avoid a situation such as that which exists in Russia, where the people are starving for consumer goods because manpower is siphoned off for the production of other goods.

OUR SCHOOL SYSTEM SUPERIOR TO THE RUSSIANS

Let me make one thing clear before going any further: I am not panicked by the rather loose comparisons being made these days between our educational system and that of the Soviets. Such talk got its inspiration from Russia's success in launching the first earth satellite—Sputnik I in October 1957.

Their capability to accomplish such "spectaculars" is based on their ruthless power to regiment their human and material resources, including their educational system, without regard to the real needs of their people.

They pinpointed their efforts while we advanced on a broad front. The result is that now we are far ahead of them in overall scientific achievement in space exploration. At the same time, we have produced more and better consumer goods for our people.

To me, this is evidence that our educational system is superior to anything behind the Iron Curtain. We have better teachers, better school facilities, and we turn out a better finished product.

Our school system was built at the local level by local people with local revenues. They maintain it, and they improve it as has been done on a gigantic scale during the last few years.

I cannot see that any improvement would be realized by having the Federal Government take the money now spent locally, and then dole it out again—minus expenses, of course. Federal aid to education is costly. And it opens the door to centralized influence and limitations of academic freedom.

MANPOWER REQUIREMENTS OF THE 1960'S

The manpower challenge of the 1960's has been charted. The calculations are not guesswork. All those who will enter the labor market between now and 1970 are alive today. We know their age, sex, education and other characteristics. We foresee problems affecting youths, older workers, women, and minority groups.

Employers will have to forgo the luxury of racial, age, and sex discrimination in order to fill their work schedules.

Educators must lead the way, not only in education and training, but also in career guidance, to fit our youths to the jobs that await them.

Our labor unions must modernize, culling out any obsolete practices that might retard the technological revolution.

WOULD CHANGE LABOR LAW IF NEED ARISES

The Landrum-Griffin law—officially, the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1959—was enacted with near unanimity after years of deliberations. I believe it is effective and fair to all concerned—labor leaders, rank and file union members, management, and the American people.

It protects the worker and the public from abuse by a small minority of labor leaders and businessmen, and it creates no hardship for legitimate leaders of labor and management.

It guarantees the secret ballot for union members in electing their officers and conducting important union business.

It protects the union member from coercion.

It protects his money in the union treasury or welfare fund.

It removes the no man's land between Federal and State law, thus guaranteeing every man his day in court.

I think it is a good law. But, if the test of time should prove otherwise, I would be the first to recommend needed changes or, if necessary, new legislation.

THE THREAT OF INTERNATIONAL COMMUNISM

The international Communist conspiracy directed from Moscow poses the threat of world domination by force. And with equal vigor, it threatens, by propaganda and political cunning, the principles of morality and freedom that are our fundamental strength. I have fought communism with all my heart and soul for a quarter of a century. As long as this menace exists, I will continue to combat it with all the power at my command.

There are those who seem to believe that communism and capitalism, or communism and freedom, or communism and belief in God, can coexist. The architects of communism deny this.

I remember pointing out in 1934, in New Hampshire, that the worst thing that had been done, and the most far-reaching act that had been done by the then current administration, was the recognition of Soviet Russia; and that has certainly proved true many times in the past quarter of a century.

More than 40 years ago Lenin said:

> We cannot live in peace. In the end, one or the other will triumph—a funeral dirge will be sung over the Soviet Republic or world capitalism.

And Stalin wrote that religion, belief in God, must be exterminated everywhere before communism is safe anywhere.

This is Communist doctrine, unchanged by the succession of masters of the Kremlin. Each Soviet dictator makes it increasingly plain that world domination by force and the complete abolition of religion is basic Communist policy.

Perhaps it is to our advantage in the so-called cold war that the Communists make no bones about their ultimate purposes. But how sad for humanity that they prove their words with deeds.

They strangled freedom in Hungary in 1956. They did it by murdering unarmed and defenseless Hungarian patriots, sending a wave of revulsion throughout the free world. Then, as an act of deliberate treachery under the guise of peace talks, they seized, held, and finally executed the Hungarian leaders.

Much closer to home, we know that Latin American Communist Party leaders have been undergoing training in Moscow since 1953. The number of Communists and their sympathizers in Latin America is estimated at about 700,000. This is a small percentage of the population in those countries, but, as J. Edgar Hoover pointed out, the hard-core Communist is a dedicated, disciplined person who obeys the instructions of Moscow. It is the hard core that counts—not sheer numbers.

COMMUNISTS SUPPRESS RELIGION

The fruit of the tree of Communist intrigue in Latin America is ripening in Cuba—only 90 miles from our shores. With Castro's agrarian reform as a front, the conspirators have taken over. I am reliably informed that a move is already afoot to drive an order of priests out of Cuba as the first blow against the church. I have made this charge before and it has not been challenged at home or abroad.

I remember when Mr. Castro was invited to this country by a group of newspaper editors, when he was wined and dined by political leaders of this country, when he was met and received by Members of the Congress, that I stood on the floor of the Senate and protested it, and told them exactly what he was doing; that if he was not a Communist, he was surrounded by Communists; he was playing the Communist game. I am sorry that has all come true.

Gradual suppression of religion is basic Communist philosophy. The tragic imprisonment of Bishop James E. Walsh in Red China should dispel forever any doubts about this. This devoted and dedicated man knew it was coming, but his devotion to the spiritual welfare of his fellow Christians was so deep as to compel him to remain on the Chinese mainland despite the persecution of his church by a Godless regime.

Communism is evil. Its ends are evil and its means to those ends are evil. We can no more compromise with communism than we can compromise with sin.

When circumstances force communism to do something good and right, it is only an expedient to advance their over-all purpose.

When they permit long-overdue improvements in living conditions, it is only because even dictators must make some concessions or face the wrath of the oppressed.

When they industrialize, it is to strengthen their capacity for aggression.

When they talk peace, it is just another means of waging war.

When their emissaries tour other countries, it is part of the grand strategy to probe the weaknesses of others and to win acceptance of their country as a law-abiding member of the family of nations.

The thing to remember about the Soviet system is that it is not a real government; instead, it is an international conspiracy dedicated to the overthrow of the free world.

SOVIETS TALK PEACE: ARM FOR WAR

The Russians have violated practically every major international agreement to which they have been a party over a period of 30 years. Why should we expect them to honor new treaties now?

The collapse of the summit conference this June startled many people. It should not have. It was no national tragedy.

A great many Americans opposed such conferences all along. We remembered earlier summits, when Western heads of state were out-maneuvered and cheated by Khrushchev's predecessor—the cunning Stalin.

Khrushchev's 180° turn from so-called peaceful coexistence at Paris was just a reminder of how fully he remains a dedicated Communist. When he saw that he was not going to get away with anything, he flip-flopped around and tried to embarrass the President for his own political advantage.

Khrushchev is a pure Communist agitator, from the top of his head to the soles of his feet.

Any time he can talk the world into a crisis, we can be sure he will do so. His failure at Paris was that he did not panic the world. Our President, to his everlasting credit, withstood his inflammatory onslaught with dignity and forbearance. In my opinion, that saved the day for the free world.

KEEPING THE PEACE: THE PURPOSE OF FOREIGN POLICY

The fundamental purpose of our foreign policy—a purpose which we sometimes seem to forget—is to provide for our own survival and to keep the peace. That is the acid test.

During the past 8 years—since the close of the Korean war—our foreign policy has been highly successful. We have kept the peace. No American armies are fighting in foreign lands. No American blood is wetting alien soil. No American boys are dying on faraway battlefields.

Diplomatic blowups are disturbing, but they are neither fatal nor final. In some instances, such blowups might even be beneficial to the cause of understanding and future efforts. I believe that to be true in the case of the summit collapse, and, to a lesser extent, in the case of the Communist-inspired student-Socialist riots in Japan.

I am steadfast in my belief that, in the long run, traditional diplomatic methods carried out by the trained and dedicated men and women of our Foreign Service, offer the best hope for successful international relations.

TO KHRUSHCHEV, PEACE MEANS SURRENDER OF FREE WORLD

While the Communists talk peaceful coexistence and disarmament, they stockpile new and more horrible weapons of war.

They have put high priority on the development of lethal gases which can wipe out entire populations; men, women, and children. They have other gases that can immobilize entire nations by causing temporary blindness or paralysis, while they move in and mop up.

Soviet military leaders have boasted that they are fully prepared to use chemical weapons, and we know that Communist soldiers are trained in the use of these weapons.

It is a paradox that words do not always mean the same thing to different people. Peace to the Kremlin conspirators means surrender of the free world to communism.

Peace to us means self-government of people who have freely banded together—without outside domination.

Khrushchev offers his brand of peace—we have only to surrender to communism. But we demand peace on our terms—with freedom and justice for all.

The way to preserve peace is through strength.

The American Republic has learned the meaning of peace through strength by hard experience. We learned at Pearl Harbor and we got another lesson when the Communists invaded South Korea.

We have learned and shall never forget: The key to lasting peace is overwhelming strength.

GROWTH OF U.S. MILITARY POWER SINCE KOREAN WAR

In 1953, no ship afloat was powered by atomic energy. Today we have 9 nuclear submarines in commission and 23 under construction or being converted.

In 1953, the Polaris missile system was just a dream.

This year it is a reality, as two of these submarines, each capable of firing 16 warheaded missiles while submerged, join our active defense forces.

At the close of the Korean war, just 7 years ago, an airplane expected to operate at speeds greater than the speed of sound was in its early design stage. Today, Mach 2 aircraft are part of our regular forces, and a Mach 3 plane is on the way.

In 1953, the Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile was a hazy concept. It was surrounded by doubters. They said it would be operational by 1965. But today—1960—we have Atlases on the launching pads, with an incredible record of successful test firings, and a proved accuracy far exceeding the most optimistic hopes of a few years ago.

In 1953, the intermediate range ballistic missiles, Jupiter and Thor, were not even contemplated. Today, the Thor is in the hands of our allies in the United Kingdom, and the Jupiter booster launched our first earth satellite in 1958.

All of these changes that I have mentioned, and many more, have taken place in just 7 years—since the close of the Korean war. It is amazing to me that so much could have been accomplished, and there is absolutely no doubt in my mind that this progress in the military field, backing up our foreign policy, has been the main factor in keeping the peace during these critical and trying years.

FOREIGN AID FOR MUTUAL ADVANTAGE

It is American commonsense to aid friends in need and to cooperate with them for mutual advantage.

Our foreign aid programs are in line with this commonsense, except in one respect.

We have helped our friends abroad to our mutual advantage. I have always favored this as long as no scoop shovel approach was employed.

But I believe we have been misguided in throwing away our hard-earned substance in the vain hope of converting Communist regimes, such as those in Yugoslavia and Poland, to our way of life.

To get somebody to do the right thing one does not reward him for doing the wrong thing. That, too, is commonsense, it seems to me.

A CRITICAL DECADE AHEAD

If we are going to overcome the problems posed by international communism, the opportunities of space exploration, the perils of fiscal irresponsibility, and inflation at home, and the threats to liberty both international and domestic—in short, if we are going to face squarely the challenges of the sixties, we must use our system of economic and political freedom, as it is the greatest asset we possess. We must unleash the strength of a growing economy, mobilized by the dynamic force of individuals making their own decisions. We must adhere to a philosophy which exalts the individual. We must appeal to an energetic, optimistic, enterprising people.

The decisions of the next decade are going to do much to reshape the world as we know it and as our children and their children will know it. Never has civilization been so much on trial.

I am confident that, while the challenges are very great, we shall be equal to the job. Together with men of good will everywhere, we can go forward and bring to practical fulfillment the bright promise of this new decade.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator is discussing the menace of communism to the world and to our Nation. About 3 years ago the Supreme Court invalidated the law which gave to the Secretary of State the ability to deny passports to known Communists. The Secretary of State feels that a new law is necessary, which law will vest in him, in accordance with the pronouncement of the Supreme Court, some power to deny the issuance of passports to Communists in the United States who wish to visit Communist Russia.

The request has been pending for 2 years. Bills have been pending which would vest that power in the Secretary. No action has been taken.

I do not know whether the Senator from New Hampshire was on the floor yesterday morning when I discussed this subject. I merely wish to state that with all the declarations about what legislation is vital to be passed in this month, it seems to me we ought to give attention to the need for a law to give to the Secretary of State the power to deny passports to avowed Communists who, with practical certainty, wish to go to the Kremlin to deliver information there which they think will be of help to the Kremlin and of harm to us.

I should like to have the Senator's comment in that regard.

Mr. BRIDGES. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Ohio. I think that measure should have top priority in the actions of the Congress.

I am rather shocked and amazed to think that in the months which have passed—in the years, even, which have passed—we have had no action on this measure. I think it is deplorable.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yesterday I stated, and I repeat tonight, that hearings were conducted early in 1959 on those bills. Only a couple of organizations came before the Committee on Foreign Relations and testified against the proposal. One was the Communist League of the United States. Through their supreme ruler, they presented the argument that no law should be passed impeding the right to travel. The second was an alleged veterans' association of New York. I questioned their commander as to how many members they had and what dues were paid, and an examination of the record will indicate there were elusive answers. To me it was nothing but an organization on paper.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There was a third organization which appeared. I shall not identify it at this time.

Those were the agencies which said no such law should be passed.

A year and a half has elapsed and still we have done nothing about the situation. It seems to me that this is a vital piece of business confronting us, especially when we consider the great publicity which is going to be given to the Powers trial. We sleep. We do nothing. We give encouragement to propagandize and to indulge in subversive activities in our country, and then, if I may put it that way, on our knees we give these Communists passports.

Mr. BRIDGES. I agree with the distinguished Senator. I wish there were more great American patriots like the distinguished Senator from Ohio. This country and the free world would be better off.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much.

I direct attention to this item because I think we shall commit a serious error if we believe that the subject is inconsequential and that we need not take care of it, and let another 2 years go by while subversive actors are moving about undisturbed and uncontrolled.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator for his comments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, some reference has been made today by various speakers to the effect that I propose to offer an amendment to the pending measure, S. 3758. I am not ready to ask that that amendment be made the pending business, because I wish to defer to members of the committee who are handling the proposed legislation, if any of them wish to offer any amendments first.

However, there has been a request from several Senators to know about the provisions of my amendment. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in full in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. The amendment has been lying on the table and is designated "8–10–60—L."

There being no objection, the text of the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 3, beginning with the colon in line 10, strike out through the word "establishments" in line 24.

On page 4, beginning with line 4, strike out through line 17 on page 5, and insert the following:

"(t) 'Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce' means an enterprise engaged in such an activity, which is in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier.".

On page 7, lines 6 and 7, strike out "(1), (2), or (3) or in an establishment described in section 3(t)(4) or (5)".

On page 13, lines 13 and 14, strike out "(1), (2), or (3), or in an establishment described in section 3(t)(4)".

On page 17, beginning with line 8, strike out through line 22 on page 18 and insert the following:

"(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, professional, or local retailing capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesman (as such terms are defined and delimited by regulations of the Secretary of Labor, subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act); or

"(2) any employee employed by any retail or service establishment, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services is made within the State in which the establishment is located. A 'retail or service establishment' shall mean an establishment 75 per centum of whose annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is not for resale and is recognized as retail sales or services in the particular industry; or

"(3) any employee employed by any establishment engaged in laundering, cleaning or repairing clothing or fabrics, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of such services is made within the State in which the establishment is located: Provided, That 75 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of such services is made to customers who are not engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, or communications business; or".

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for certain employees engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the Act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, for the clarification of the RECORD, and because the proposed legislation is so complex that it is rather difficult to follow the various points in the amendment, I wish to make it very clear that the amendment which I propose is to reenact without any change whatever the exemption given under existing law, as adopted in 1949, to retail establishments and to service establishments regarded under that amendment as intrastate business or business operating within State lines in the main.

There is only one additional concept which is included in my amendment to the exemption adopted in 1949 and now in the existing law, and that is that I propose to add the provision that the exemption and the law be subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act, which, I understand, was suggested by the committee.

With that amendment included in the RECORD for the reading of all Senators who may be interested, I have nothing further to say, unless some Senators wish to ask me some questions.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I heard the Senator's description of what his amendment would do. In the 1949 law, were the intrastate industries which the Senator has in mind specifically exempted from the law?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes and no. While not exempted by name, they were included under a description made so clear in the exemption that there could be no question whatever as to whether they were exempted. The wording, substantially, was this: Employees and businesses primarily engaged in business within State lines and in the retail trade to such an extent that a majority of their business was within the State, or in service industries under the same conditions, were exempted from the provision of the law. I may say to my distinguished friend from Ohio that that is exactly the same exemption that was intended to be included in the original act, passed by Congress in 1938. But the language in that act was not as strong as the language which we adopted in 1949. Because of the inadequacy of that language, various court decisions had operated so as to cut down the exemptions, and various administrative regulations had gone still further. Various people who were intended to be exempted under the original law found themselves subjected to it. Therefore, the amendment of 1949 was merely a clarification and a clearer statement of the precise exemption, without any change from what was intended to be enacted when the original law was enacted.

My amendment proposes a reenactment of that same exemption, with only one addition, and that is to make the law subject to the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If there is a business within a State, with the major part of its operations being intrastate, as distinguished from interstate, then the law would not apply. Is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. There has been no trouble under that exemption or that statement of exemption; whereas under the statement of what was thought to be the identical exemption contained in the 1938 act the situation was such that there was much trouble under it, both by reason of court decisions and administrative rulings. I do not have to tell the distinguished Senator, who has been the Governor of his great State for five terms, that there are bureaus and agencies of government which like to extend their authority by administrative rulings. That is the situation we have encountered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is my understanding correct, then, that the purpose of the 1938 enactment and the 1949 enactment was not to subject to regulation those businesses the major part of whose operations dealt with purely intrastate affairs?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator has completely and clearly stated the purport of the amendment.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it the Senator's position that the bill pending before the Senate contemplates changing the 1938 and 1949 purpose of the law?

Mr. HOLLAND. It certainly does. It changes it very materially, and includes such provisions as would make it possible, either under the proposed act or other acts following the same philosophy, to completely destroy intrastate business as the Senator and I have known it.

I may say, before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat, that I have spoken of this as my amendment. I was joined in offering this amendment in 1949 by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. Both of them have honored me by joining me again as cosponsors. The other two sponsors at that time are not now, unfortunately, in the Senate. But I am being joined by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], who was a member of the committee and of the committee of conference at the time the original bill was passed, and who feels very keenly about this matter; and also by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], who is thoroughly conversant with the whole chain of circumstances which I have mentioned.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Do I correctly understand that in 1949, an effort was made to change the law of 1938, and the amendment of the Senator from Florida being successful, it precluded the change from being adopted?

Mr. HOLLAND. That is correct. I am sorry to have to tell the Senator from Ohio that the committee then, just as our committee now—the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare—reported a bill which attempted to widen greatly the coverage of the bill and to do substantially what is proposed in the present bill. The debate on the matter was extensive, and the Senate, at that time, by a majority of more than two to one, upheld my amendment and adopted it. It upheld the philosophy of the 1938 act and restated it in firmer form, rejecting the effort of the committee to broaden the coverage of the act and to destroy, for all practicable purposes, intrastate business as the Senator from Ohio and I have always known it during our practice as lawyers.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from West Virginia wishes to be recognized. I yield the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, we have listened this afternoon to several Senators who have indicated that the enactment of the proposed legislation would adversely affect the economy of the United States.

Approximately 24 million workers in the United States are now covered by the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the original act of 1938 having been amended from time to time. Approximately 20 million workers within the United States are not covered by the present provisions of the wage and hour law.

Perhaps it is important that we think interms of what the $1.25 minimum would mean. It was charged earlier today that to raise the present wage from $1 to $1.25, running over a period of 3 years, would be inflationary. It is important, I think, to consider why the members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare thought the figure of $1.25 an hour was a valid one. I know that my beloved friend, the senior Senator from Florida [SPESSARD HOLLAND], is always interested in obtaining all the facts concerning legislation.

I recall the testimony of Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of research for the AFL–CIO, in which he gave a very lucid statement, buttressed with figures and facts, indicating that the $1.25, which is proposed in the bill, is not an unrealistic figure, but is a figure which is based upon study and reasoning, and which, very frankly, provides a measure of genuine justice to the workers in the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks certain statements which were made during the hearings by Mr. Ruttenberg, and which go to the very heart of the controversy which was raised earlier today by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] as to how we could pluck out of the air, as it were, the figure of $1.25 an hour. Why was it not $1.40 an hour, or some other figure? There are three real reasons why we believe the present economy, the current gross national productivity, and the development of our system of industry, commerce, and business make the $1.25 an hour a realistic figure. I ask unanimous consent that only those portions of Mr. Ruttenberg's statement relating to the specific subject which was raised earlier today be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Now as to the reasons for selecting the $1.25, both Senator GOLDWATER and Senator PROUTY have raised a question as to why pick the $1.25 as against any other figure.

I guess one can't very well do anything except what appears to be politically feasible. Certainly, $1.25 is inadequate in terms of any base you want to use, but it is interesting to examine the basis for it if one wanted to justify it on the grounds other than that it is necessary to meet minimum standards of living and necessary to eliminate poverty and destitution and to really improve living standards for the people.

One could justify it on the same basis which the Senate Labor Committee justified the increase to $1 an hour in 1955. In the report of 1955 from this committee there was a justification for the $1 minimum being raised at that time from 75 cents. What was done was to take the cost of living from the time of the previous increase, to the time of the one in 1955, and also to take the general trend of productivity in the economy as a whole and not in any particular industry because nobody is claiming this ought to be done in relation to the minimum wage, but what is done is to show the minimum wage should bear some general relationship to the movement of the economy as a whole.

So, in 1955 the committee did come up with a figure showing that the cost of living between 1949 and 1955 had gone up 14 percent; productivity had gone up some 20 percent.

When they applied both of these factors to the 75-cent minimum, the committee's report comes out with a figure of $1.02½ and so they say we will raise it to $1.

Using this test and applying it now, you come out at about $1.25 because the cost of living increase since the 1955 increase went into effect has been 8 percent, and the increase in productivity, if we take the general trend of productivity advance as estimated by the Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, as included in the President's Economic Report in January 1958, the general trend has been between 3.4 and 3.9 percent productivity increase, per year.

Senator KENNEDY. This percentage rise in productivity was not characteristic of the past 5 years, was it?

Mr. RUTTENBERG. If you took the years 1957 and 1958 when the economy began to operate at considerably less than capacity, the productivity rise was considerably less.

Senator KENNEDY. How about the period from the end of the Korean war. I don't think you would find an increase of 3.5 percent in productivity per year, would you?

Mr. RUTTENBERG. The general trend from 1947 to 1956 was between 3.4 and 3.9 percent for the private economy, depending on which measure of productivity you used.

Senator KENNEDY. You took the period from 1954 to 1958 which included the Korean war. I don't think your average would be 3.75 percent in a period excluding the war.

Mr. RUTTENBERG. It excluded the Korean war.

Senator KENNEDY. I wouldn't think that taking the period from 1947 to 1950 with the recession of 1949 that you would have anything near this 3.75 percent rise in productivity. You wouldn't have anything like the rise we observed from 1955 to 1958.

Mr. RUTTENBERG. Well, here is a table in appendix F which is attached to my statement and which is based from the Department of Labor report as presented to the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress.

It shows that, with 1947–49 equal to a hundred, you come up through 1950 and have a 10-percent rise over 1948. You come on up through 1957 and you get a 32-percent rise.

Nine years on 32 percent gives you roughly 3½ percent, and this is the index of real productivity of man-hours for the total private economy.

Senator KENNEDY. You say that the 1957–58 figures went up 1 percent. You figure from 1930 to 1958, and the first quarter of 1959, you will have an 8-percent increase?

Mr. RUTTENBERG. Yes. Ewan Clague, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, has appeared before the Joint Economic Committee and pointed out what the facts are. The year after we come out of any recession as in 1949–50, as we can see by this table or as we can see as we came out of the 1954 recession, the year 1954–55, there is usually a very substantial rise, and if I recall correctly, this rise out of the 1949–50 recession was about 7 to 8 percent; the rise out of the 1954–55 recession was about 4½ percent, and it is estimated that the current rise may well be substantially above that because of the great expenditures for plants and equipment which took place in 1955, 1956, and 1957.

It is estimated that the productivity rise moving into 1959 will bring us well back to the trend which we departed from on a downslide because of the recession in 1957–58.

I think it is quite reasonable to assume that the figure of 3.4 to 3.9, the long-term postwar rate in productivity could be applied now and if it were applied, you will see by the calculations on page 17 of my statement that you will come up with a figure of between $1.23½ and $1.26 and, roughly, the midpoint is about $1.25.

It is interesting to note, of course, if you wanted to carry this further, that the productivity figure used in the committee's report of 1955 was 20 percent.

If one looks at what has actually developed with the figures that have been published since this report, the actual productivity rise was 24.2 percent instead of the 20 percent used by the committee.

If one had used 24.2 percent, the overage over the $1 minimum, it would have been about 6 cents and not the 2 cents. So that fits in and we get this figure. If you applied this back, it could move on up to $1.30–$1.31, on the basis of the same analysis used by the committee in 1955.

I don't want to belabor that point any further.

I think the next general problem noted on page 19 of my statement is the question of the movement of the general wages and the movement of the minimum wage, and at the top of page 20 is an interesting little table that I think would be well to have in mind.

Let's take 1949. The average hourly pay was $1.40. This is for production workers in manufacturing. The minimum wage at that time was 75 cents, and the gap there between this wage and the minimum was 65 cents.

By March of 1959, the average wage was up to $2.21. The minimum is $1. The gap between the minimum and the general wage is $1.21.

Now if you actually brought the minimum up only to $1.25, the gap would still be 96 cents, which is considerably more than the gap was in 1949.

I would like now to deal in the remaining time with the concept of the cost of this $1.25 minimum. It has been estimated by the Department of Labor that the total cost of raising the $1 minimum and extending coverage would be $2.9 billion, the total cost to the economy.

This figure is based principally on data more than a year old. In the past year, as we can see merely from these recent stories in the Wall Street Journal and elsewhere, such as this story which says the wood furniture makers have raised their minimum to $1.25 because of the talk in Congress of the rise in the minimum, wages have risen for some low-wage workers.

The same is true of the textile industry, for almost the entire textile industry in the South has moved to the $1.25 minimum in anticipation of the Congress acting.

As a result of these and other wage movements which the $2.9 billion figure has not taken into consideration, we figure the total cost would be much closer to $2.5 billion, probably even a little less than that; but, using the $2.5 billion or even using $2.9 billion if one wanted to use it, the relationship of this to the total value of goods and services produced in the economy, which is running in the neighborhood of $460 to $480 billion by the end of the year, is a little more than one-half of 1 percent of the total of the gross national product. If you relate the $2.5 billion to the total wage and salary bill of the country, which is roughly about $260 billion, it is less than 1 cent out of every dollar on the payroll to raise the minimum to $1.25 and extend the coverage as S. 1046 does.

That becomes, it seems to me, a relatively minimal cost to pay for such a tremendously important move to improve the living standards and the wage level of the very lowest paid workers in the Nation.

I will skip over, if I might, to the problem of inflation.

The argument has been used repeatedly and it was raised again this morning that the increase in the minimum to $1.25 might be inflationary on the economy.

I think one has to keep in mind some important considerations here. In addition to those I have already mentioned, there are one or two more.

The $2.5 billion or $2.9 billion cost of the $1.25 minimum would be less than 1 cent out of every dollar of payroll and would be roughly about a little more than one-half of 1 percent of the total gross national product.

This is assuming that, if there is no absorption whether the increased cost as a result of productivity or anything else, then the total increase in price cannot be in excess of one-half to three-quarters of 1 percent as it relates to the total gross national product.

I think there is an important consideration here to keep in mind. I might say this was noted very clearly by the staff report done for this committee several years ago by Dr. Fred Blum and other recent surveys done by Professor Brinker out in Oklahoma, the results of which were printed in the Monthly Labor Review. They point out that wage increases required in the very low paid industries stimulates those low-paid industries to improve their efficiency, a stimulation they do not otherwise have. This study made in Oklahoma and which I refer to on page 24 of my statement, finds that, and I will just quote the one sentence from the summary article in the Monthly Labor Review, in September of 1957.

"The firms paying below $1 an hour showed a better record of employment than the firms already paying all employees over $1." The firms paying below $1 an hour were stimulated to increase production more, add more machinery and increase efficiency.

In other words, the lowest paying firms were able to absorb the increase from 75 cents to $1 because they were pressed into improving their own efficiency.

One must take that into consideration when you are talking about the total cost of the $2½ billion and whether this will automatically be transplanted over into the economy to increase prices by that total amount because, obviously, the whole will not be passed on because there is this specific incentive to improve their efficiency.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I have the feeling that ofttimes Senators may fail to digest a voluminous hearing, such as we have had on this bill. But if tomorrow morning, perhaps, an opportunity is given them to read the remarks which I am making briefly this evening—if I can, in other words, focus attention on this subject without attempting simply to present one side, but to give the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and Mr. Ruttenberg—I believe it would be of some value.

It is my considered judgment—I speak not in any manner of determination beyond simply my own very real conviction—that the passage of the Senate bill, the Senate bill then being sent to conference with the House, so that the previously passed measure of that body may be considered with the action of this body, and then the adoption of a conference report and the passage of legislation which can go to the President, and I hope receive his approval, would be in the interest of the people of the United States and would advance the general welfare.

RECESS

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 58 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, August 12, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 11, 1960

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I was privileged day before yesterday to attend the annual meeting of the Shenandoah Valley Electric Cooperative at Harrisonburg, Va., and to address the members briefly. The accomplishments of this, the largest electric cooperative in my State, are truly impressive to me and, I hope, to my colleagues in this body. I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks on that occasion printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REA—THE FARMER'S FRIEND

In working as a boy on my grandfather's farm in Culpeper, I learned something about the problems confronting our farmers and a lot about the hard work that goes into the production of the Nation's food supply. Consequently, throughout my public service, first in the Senate of Virginia, and then in the Congress of the United States, plans to promote the welfare of the rural areas of our State and Nation have been for me major goals. Many of you will recall that as a State senator, I advocated better roads, better schools and better conservation of our natural resources. I served on the commission to lay out the State highway system; was a joint patron of the bill to create it; I was an active supporter of the Mapp bill which revised our public school system, and I helped to frame the bill that created the first game department. All of those programs have paid rich dividends. In my opinion, Virginia's highway system, and especially the secondary roads that serve rural areas, is second to none; our school system compares favorably with States of comparable per capita income and few States can surpass the recreational opportunities offered by our State parks and public hunting and fishing areas, our national forests and our marshlands and beaches in the Tidewater area.

In the Congress, two programs which I have supported from their inception, and which I feel have paid the richest dividends, have been soil conservation and rural electrification. Both of these programs have been administered at the local level, both have been voluntary porgrams, the first program being a matching one in which local farmers contributed 50 percent or more of the cost of the program and the latter being supported without cost to the Federal Government except for the loans made available to the REA co-ops, practically all of which have been met at maturity.

One of the distressing aftermaths of World War II was the fact that American farmers were encouraged to greatly expand their production to meet the needs of our allies as well as ourselves for food and fiber and after the end of that abnormal foreign demand for our farm products, no sound and workable plan has been developed under which our farmers could exchange what they produce for what they needed to buy at a fair and equitable price. However, the disparity in recent years between the farmer's share of the national income and that of either industry or organized labor would have been far greater but for the benefits which our farmers have derived from the availability on the farm of electricity. In the 50-year period prior to the rural electrification program, urban communities fully enjoyed the blessings of electric power and light but that advantage of a scientific age reached only 10 percent of our farmers. In 1935, prior to the start of the REA program, only 7.6 percent of Virginia farmers had electricity. Those of us who advocated the REA program argued that lack of modern equipment was keeping American farmers from enjoying a scale of living comparable with their city brethren and lack of modern conveniences was making farm life unattractive to young people on whom we must depend for future food and fiber production.

We said that since the Government had set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a lending agency for business enterprises trying to work their way out of the great depression of the thirties, it was no more than reasonable to provide aid in the form of soundly secured loans for the 90 percent of our farmers who had been denied advantages which most city dwellers had enjoyed for 50 years. Aside from the benefits to the farmers themselves we felt that this program would benefit the Nation generally by promoting more efficient production of food and would create a better balanced economy by encouraging small industries to locate in rural sections.

The REA program has been even more successful than those of us who originally supported it could anticipate. We foresaw that electric lights would make it easier for the farmer to go about his chores and that electric power could reduce manual labor required for moving crops, grinding feed, milking and pumping water. We knew that electricity in the home would save the women from the drudgery of carrying water, standing at the washtubs and enduring the heat of the wood cookstove. We did not fully anticipate how scarce and costly farm labor would become and how essential it would be to substitute electricity and machinery which, it has been estimated, now gives every man, woman and child in our country the work equivalent of 30 hand workers. Nor were we able to imagine that a farmer would find as many as 250 productive uses for electricity, including the innovations which have helped to make the Shenandoah Valley one of the top poultry-producing areas of the Nation.

When I attended the Shenandoah Co-op meeting in 1944 I was able to report that since the start of REA electrification of rural homes in the Nation had risen from 10 to around 42 percent and in Virginia from 7.6 to 30 percent. At your meeting 2 years later I had figures showing that the national percentage was up to 45 percent and the Virginia figure to 35. It is even more pleasing to know today that the latest annual report of the REA showed Virginia had reached the national average, with 97 percent of our farms electrified. As for the Shenandoah Valley Electric Cooperative—it has become the largest in the State, with 11,465 customers to whom it furnished last year 52,083,000 kilowatt-hours of electric power.

The economic implications alone, are impressive enough to warrant considerable attention. Electricity, for its users, is simply energy in its most usable form. Once a farm is supplied with this silent, flexible, versatile means of energy, it automatically becomes a potential market for all the products that have been devised to harness it for useful work.

No amount of persuasive salesmanship on the part of any electrical appliance dealer could transform a farm family into a customer for his products without an available form of electric energy.

Once a farm is electrified, however, it becomes a potential customer for electric stoves and heaters, for lamps and washing machines, for ironers, radios, television sets, milking machines, and modern plumbing operated by electric pumps. The list of products that an electrified farm is in a position to buy is almost endless. The impact on our economy of this still-developing market is directly beneficial to thousands of stockholders and millions of our industrial workers, some of whom may never have been on a farm at all.

Benefits of the program to the farmer can appropriately be listed under the two heads: "Monetary Gain" and "Social Gain."

1. MONETARY GAIN

(a) Grinds feed for all farm stock.

(b) Ten- to twenty-percent increase in egg production by poultry house lighting.

(c) Ten-percent saving on feed by electric brooding and lighting and 2 weeks less finishing time for broilers.

(d) Marked increased efficiency in dairying through electric milking machines, sterilizers and coolers, cream separators and churns, and light in winter months in dairy barns.

(e) Saving in fences through the use of electrified fences.

(f) Electric hay driers especially valuable in curing alfalfa and pea hay.

(g) Workshop, grinding mowing blades and repairing farm machinery.

(h) Pumping water for household use, farm stock, and irrigation.

(i) Labor-saving devices in the home such as washing machines, vacuum cleaners, electric irons, churns, ranges, hot-water heaters—in a word, the full equipment of a modern city apartment designed to be operated by the housewife without servant help.

(j) The development of summer homes for city people.

2. THE SOCIAL GAIN

(a) Radio and prompt news coverage.

(b) Adequate lighting, including study lights for schoolchildren and lighting for schoolhouses and churches.

(c) Sanitary facilities made possible by pressure water systems.

(d) Deep-freeze and locker units for winter consumption of fresh fruits and vegetables as the means of a better balanced rural diet and the conservation of perishable foods.

(e) The stimulation of community pride and the accentuation of the advantages of farming as a means of life by reducing the drudgery and inconveniences involved. The time saved to farm mothers in not having to fill oil lamps and clean lamp chimneys, churn by hand and not having to bend for hours over washboards can now be devoted to the improvement of family relations and to community enterprises.

The electrical revolution that has taken place in the rural home has been even more impressive, in many ways, than the labor-saving equipment installed elsewhere on the farm. A variety of electric kitchen equipment, freezers, refrigerators, electrically controlled heating plants and television and radio sets have all served to make the farm home a more comfortable place to live.

Estimates indicate that the average farm use of electricity has risen from 600 kilowatt-hours per year 25 years ago to nearly 4,000 kilowatt-hours at the present time. In another 15 years, this consumption is expected to rise to the challenging total of more than 10,000 kilowatt-hours annually. This is a figure both of challenge and opportunity, because it indicates that the work of the REA is far from completion.

The challenge will be to provide the necessary power to meet this anticipated need, to hold the cost to a reasonable figure and to assure that REA cooperatives will have their fair share of the giant power pools of the future.

As we meet these challenges one by one, new ones will arise, based on technological changes we cannot now fully appreciate. But we must keep pace with all these changes or else allow our Nation's agriculture, which George Washington called "the noblest occupation of man," slip into the position of a third-rate industry.

It is not agriculture, alone, that looks to the REA to assure its future. Our national security, itself, as well as the general prosperity of our population, depend on our ability to bring to the beneficial use of all our people the electric power network on which all of us depend for communications, for conveniences and for more efficient production.

The REA has made it possible for millions of nonfarmers to make their homes in rural areas and for thousands of industries, small and large, to locate their plants along rural electric lines with such profitable and pleasant results for themselves and for their workers.

But the rewarding satisfaction that I feel over the splendid results accomplished by a program which I supported at its inception 25 years ago and have continued to support ever since, is tempered by the realization of the new problems both at home and abroad which have arisen for our farmers during those years. One relates to the disparity of income, to which I already have referred. One inflation factor which has eroded one-half of the purchasing power of our money is called the wage price spiral. Industry is organized and industrial labor is organized. And over a period of years when the actual cash income of farmers was declining, to say nothing of the decline in the purchasing power of the farm dollar, industry has granted to organized labor many wage increases which were promptly followed by price increases. Our farmers have never been able to control their output in the way that industry can control its output and the always serious problem of a fair and adequate price for farm products has during recent years been greatly complicated by the accumulation of price depressing surpluses, resulting from a poorly managed farm program. One of the major undertakings of the next Congress will be the disposal of those surpluses with a view to the establishment of a freer and more competitive market for our farm products. Another recent development which is going to have a price-depressing effect, is the organization in Europe by six European nations, formerly the best customers for our cotton, tobacco, and wheat, of what is known as the Common Market. We fear that those six nations in order to stimulate their own farm production may discriminate against our farm products.

There also is another European trade organization recently formed called the Outer Seven. That is an organization led by Great Britain of seven nations that were not invited to join the Common Market group. The Outer Seven has organized for the protection of their trade and perhaps to force trade concessions from the Common Market group. All of those 13 European nations, most of whom have been the beneficiary of lavish grants and loans from us since the end of World War II, have become highly competitive with us, especially in the industrial field. But since we are normally dependent on export markets for some 40 percent of our cotton and tobacco and some 20 percent of our wheat, the problem of solving in a satisfactory way our current farm problem can be intensified by trade restrictions that may be adopted against us by these two European groups.

While I know that our farmers are concerned about their economic future, I am sure that they are likewise concerned, as are all the rest of us, over the threat to our survival posed by the rapidly developing military power of the Soviet bloc. We are now devoting, and as long as the cold war lasts, will continue to devote, at least one-half of our national revenue to the development of our Defense Establishment. While the Soviet Union may at the moment possess some slight superiority in the field of guided missiles and in the size and equipment of its land army, we still have overall military superiority. We hope that a continuation of that superiority carrying with it the implications of destructive retaliation in the event the Soviets should start another war, will be sufficient to preserve an uneasy peace. But all of us must recognize that it is an uneasy peace. All of us must recognize that in the event of another world war, the worldwide destruction by nuclear weapons will be so terrific that there can be no victor in the true sense of the word. Therefore, we should daily pray that the same God who befriended the early settlers in this valley against hostile Indians and gave them the strength and courage to overcome the hardships of a wilderness, that the same God who was the ally of the Founding Fathers during our fight for independence from Great Britain, and the same God who has enabled us to develop in a relatively brief period some 13 small and struggling Colonies to a Union of 50 States—the richest and most powerful empire in the world—will continue to be our ally in the fight we are making against the anti-God ideology of communism. For, I am convinced that we labor in vain to build a temple of peace that is not dedicated to the victory of moral force.

Soviets Tear Down United Nations—Statement by Senator Wiley and Editorial From the Milwaukee Journal

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, August 11, 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement I have prepared. It is entitled "Soviets Tear Down United Nations." I ask to have printed in the RECORD following my statement an editorial published in the Milwaukee Journal.

There being no objection, the statement and the editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOVIETS TEAR DOWN UNITED NATIONS

(By Senator WILEY)

The U.N.—serving the interests of peace, order, law, and justice—offers one of the great hopes of the 1960's for creating a world safe for freedom.

Reflecting the will of mankind, the U.N. embodies great moral force. As this can be put into action, the outlook for a global climate in which the integrity of nations shall be respected and in which more people have an opportunity for self-determination will be greatly brightened.

Only a youth 15 years old, the U.N. has taken hold of difficult situations and contributed to solutions of difficult problems which, if unresolved, might spark world war III.

In addition, it offers one of the best hopes for the newly emerging nations to get on their feet without imposition of outside forces stepping in and taking control.

We recognize, of course, that the Communists—both inside and outside the U.N.—specifically the Soviet Union and Red China, will continue their efforts to thwart ways to accomplish peace. The history of the United Nations, in fact, reveals that time after time the Soviets have attempted to block efforts by the U.N. to resolve difficulties. Instead, they have themselves stirred up greater trouble.

[From the Milwaukee Journal, Aug. 9, 1960]

SOVIETS TEAR DOWN U.N.

From the beginning of the present African crisis, Soviet Russia has sought not to join in dampening fires of discord, but to add fuel to them. It has tried to set Africans against Africans, black men against white men, the Congolese against the United Nations. Even Secretary General Hammarskjold, a diplomat of cautious words, has openly criticized the Soviets for their troublemaking.

There is nothing unusual about such Russian activities, of course. From the time the U.N. came into being at San Francisco in 1945, Moscow has sought in every possible way to thwart, discredit, and defeat it.

More than any other nation, Russia used the veto power to frustrate U.N. action. Molotov, Vishinsky, Malik, and Gromyko sought to turn the world peace forum into a hall of deceit, slander, and demagoguery.

The Soviets encouraged the North Koreans to invade South Korea in defiance of the U.N., then long blocked U.N. efforts to win or end the war that resulted. They defied the U.N. in Hungary, after crushing the "freedom revolt," even refusing to let a U.N. investigating committee, or the Secretary General, enter that country. At the time of the Suez crisis, rocket-hurling threats of Khrushchev were of no help to U.N. leaders in trying to restore peace. Most recently, when U.N. representatives went into Lebanon to help that nation maintain independence, the Russians accused the U.N. of "foreign armed intervention."

Efforts to hinder the U.N. have extended even to the subsidiary organizations, concerned not with peace and war, but with helping mankind live better. Russia has never contributed its proper shares financially to such organizations. When it has participated in activities, the purpose has usually been to confuse or propagandize.

Thus, from the start, the Soviets have tried to hamper the United Nations, even as they paid lipservice to the organization and mouthed dedication to its high U.N. principles.

This is most obvious in connection with the very first purpose of the U.N., as set forth in article 1 of the charter. This purpose is "to maintain international peace and security." The Russians signed this pledge, along with all the others, at San Francisco. They constantly talk about peace, but they seem dedicated to blocking the U.N. from effectively carrying out this purpose for which it was created.

SENATE

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 11, 1960)

FRIDAY, AUGUST 12, 1960

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, God, in the abundance of Thy mercy, another day is added to the record of the fast-hurrying years.

We thank Thee for the petaled loveliness of summer flowers, for the far-off twinkle of the stars, for the music of crystal streams, the deep call of the sea, the far stretches of the plains, and the purple majesty of the mountains. Heaven and earth are full of Thee. O God, from whom we ask so much, show us that most of what we need to serve the present age is ours already if only we would stretch out the arms of our faltering faith to take it.

As patriots, make us, we pray, worthy of the past and equal to the present. To this end, plant a more sensitive understanding of our brother's need in our hearts. May the healing breezes of good will to all men blow across all the areas of our minds, cleansing our deepest desires of the dross of narrow nationalism and partisanship. Make us prophets of the new dawn of righteousness when earth's crooked things shall be made straight in the radiant Kingdom of Thine all-embracing love.

In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW YORK COUNTY CONVENTION OF ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the resolutions adopted at the annual convention of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of New York County, held in New York City on May 19, 1960.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS, NEW YORK COUNTY CONVENTION, ON MAY 19, 1960, AT THE AMERICAN LEGION HALL, 155 EAST 88TH STREET, NEW YORK CITY

About 124 years ago a group of Irish immigrants, taught by experience and hardship the joy of kinship, the strength of unity and the excellence of charity, founded the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America in this island of Manhattan.

They were united in patriotism to their adopted country; in loyalty to their motherland and in fraternal sentiments toward each other. The success of the society appears to be due to these guiding principles as set forth by the founders and in the wisdom of their successors in following that pattern.

The membership comes from all walks in life. They represent every profession amongst whom are those who have fought the cause of Ireland with pen and sword, with voice and deed.

The organization cooperates with all Irish societies in the city of New York in every endeavor to promote the welfare of the Irish race and has from its beginning an unbroken record of participating in the great St. Patrick's Day Parade in the city of New York.

The organization may now look backward upon a glorious record of constant growth in numbers and prestige; on its many noteworthy contributions to American-Irish culture; its generous support of the Catholic missionaries and its innumerable charitable deeds.

Justly proud of the record of the past we are confident that future achievements will reflect credit on the members as Americans and descendants of the good, proud people of Ireland.

We, the members of the New York County Board of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, representing an organization founded in 1836 here on the island of Manhattan, in convention assembled on May 19, 1960, at 155 East 88th Street, New York, adopt the following resolutions:

"Whereas the purposes of the organization provide that we have unfailing loyalty to the Government of the United States, its Constitution and institutions;

"That we aid the Irish people in establishing a Republic in the 32 counties of Ireland and that all of its activities be in harmony with the doctrine and laws of the Roman Catholic Church; and

"Whereas His Holiness Pope John XXIII and the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower, being men of peace, are endeavoring to calm the world's present unrest: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we pledge our love, loyalty and devotion to His Holiness Pope John XXIII, Vicar of Christ on Earth and pray that God spare him and crown his efforts for peace with success;

"And that we assert again our faithful allegiance to the United States which gave our forebears a haven and a refuge in difficult days and provided opportunities denied them in their homeland;

"And that we pray God that our illustrious President Dwight D. Eisenhower have continued good health to continue his untiring efforts to achieve a just and lasting peace; and be it further

"Resolved, That the partition of Ireland, imposed by England in 1920 by cutting off 6 of Ireland's 32 counties from their 26 sister counties, is a perpetuation of England's 700 years of war against the Irish and that England's army of occupation commits daily acts of aggression against Irishmen in the occupied 6-county area of Ireland;

"That we request the Congress of the United States to help abolish the unjust partition of Ireland and to help remove the present English army of 50,000 men who now occupy northeast Ireland and which occupation has made it another police state;

"That we call upon our State Department to investigate the political injustices, economic sanctions and illegal imprisonments which an English created police state in northeast Ireland inflicts and imposes on Irish citizens who seek freedom for their native land;

"That it is the hope of all those who love freedom and who believe that an ancient nation like Ireland, having a population capable of self-government, should receive help from the United States in gaining full freedom for all its territory and that the United States should give equal attention and treatment to all peoples including the Irish who make complaints against foreign powers of acts of oppression and denial of freedom;

"That we call upon the Government of the United States to demand that England and its puppet representative acting as a government in Belfast, release from custody all Irish political prisoners now held in the jails of England and Belfast.

"That we pledge to support the people of Ireland in their just fight to free their homeland from English occupation in order to establish one government for all their land and to have Ireland in their time made a nation once again; and be it further

"Resolved, That we do all in our power to aid and improve the economy of Ireland by purchasing and urging the purchase of Irish goods, particularly those whose manufacturing does not conflict with industry in the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That we condemn the flood of indecent literature and pornographic pictures which now pours through many channels into the hands of the youth of our Nation and we exhort the Congress of the United States to curb this menace."

HARRY M. HYNES,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.
JAMES J. COMERFORD,
Chairman of Convention.
MARTIN A. MACNAMARA,
Secretary.

Whereas the President of the United States journeyed to Paris on May 16, 1960, to meet with the heads of the governments of France, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union for the purpose of promoting world peace; and

Whereas the President of the United States undertook this mission with no other intent than to secure peace for the world; and

Whereas while engaged in this endeavor, the President of the United States was subjected to the vilest abuses by the dictator of the Soviet Union, which abuses not only insulted him personally but the people of the United States as well; and

Whereas the force of these vilifications was such as to infuriate any human being; and

Whereas under these trying circumstances, the conduct of the President of the United States reflected credit on himself and the people of the United States: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Ancient Order of Hibernians of the County and State of New York, meeting in convention, this 19th day of May 1960, commend the President of the United States for the integrity and fortitude displayed by him on this occasion; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be given the widest publicity; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States.

HARRY M. HYNES,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.
JAMES J. COMERFORD,
Chairman of Convention.
MARTIN A. MACNAMARA,
Secretary.

BEACH EROSION CONTROL, SAN DIEGO COUNTY, CALIF.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague from California [Mr. ENGLE] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize certain erosion control off the shore in San Diego County, Calif. By reason of the exigencies of the military situation in that area, there has been, I regret to say, a considerable beach erosion problem arise near the city of Oceanside, a problem recognized by the Department of Defense.

The bill, were it to be approved, would provide for the elimination, or at least the control, of the beach erosion in and near the city of Oceanside, Calif., caused by the necessities of the national defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3838) to authorize certain beach erosion control off the shore in San Diego County, Calif., introduced by Mr. KUCHEL (for himself and Mr. ENGLE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF LATIN AMERICA AND RECONSTRUCTION OF CHILE—NOTICE OF HEARING

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a draft bill providing assistance in the development of Latin America and in the reconstruction of Chile, and for other purposes.

This bill is being introduced at the request of the executive branch and is designed to give effect to the request of the President that a total of $600 million be authorized for assistance to Latin America, and that an additional $100 million be authorized for the mutual security contingency fund.

In introducing this bill, I, of course, reserve my right to support or not to support it or to propose amendments of any kind that I believe appropriate. The bill will provide an instrument to which the Committee on Foreign Relations can direct its attention in considering the President's proposal.

In this connection the committee has scheduled a hearing for next Monday morning, August 15, 1960, at 10 a.m. in room 4221, New Senate Office Building, to hear Under Secretary of State Dillon in support of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3839) to provide for assistance in the development of Latin America and in the reconstruction of Chile, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960—AMENDMENTS

Mr. STENNIS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SMATHERS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 3758, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. THURMOND submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 3758, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FREE ENTRY OF CERTAIN MICROSCOPES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. CARLSON submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 11573) to provide for the free entry of an electron microscope for the use of William Marsh Rice University of Houston, Tex., and an electron microscope for the use of the University of Colorado Medical Center, Denver, Colo., which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

LIMITATION OF TERM "WATERPROOF" WHEN APPLIED TO COTTON CLOTH OR FABRIC—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the next printing of Senate bill 3828, to limit the term "waterproof" when applied to cotton cloth or cotton fabric, the names of the Senators from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH and Mr. DODD] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] be joined with mine as cosponsors. Through inadvertence, the name of the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] was omitted from the first printing, although I gladly accepted his cosponsorship, as the RECORD indicates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF EDWIN M. MARTIN TO BE AN ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate today received the nomination of Edwin M. Martin, of Ohio, a Foreign Service Officer of class 1, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I commend the Senate for its diligence and for the interest of Senators in transacting the public's business. Thus far this week we have acted upon a very important matter of relations with other nations, the Antarctic Treaty, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. We had full and thorough discussion and voted upon the treaty. We notified the President of the result.

Subsequently we handled one of the most important appropriation bills which will come before the Senate this session, the public works appropriation bill.

Presently we have before us the very important minimum wage bill, reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. It affects millions of people and thousands of employers.

Senators are making inquiry of me about when we expect to vote. I am informed there are a number of amendments which have been offered and which will be called up in due time.

In an attempt to arrange a schedule, so that all Senators may know of it, I asked for a quorum in order that I might suggest that we have a limitation of debate on amendments of, say, 2 hours on each amendment and, say, 8 hours on the bill, the time to be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents. I would be willing to increase the 2 hours on amendments on any special amendment Senators have in mind, if Senators think it would take more time for its consideration, because some amendments are more important than others. However, if we can get that kind of a schedule and can understand it, then we can make plans better as to what time we come in and what time we go out.

I understand some Senators need to be away on Saturday. Other Senators need to be away on Monday. I should like to suggest to the Senate that we enter into an agreement providing for 2 hours of debate on amendments, unless there are some special exceptions, in which event I would be glad to add time for them; and 8 hours on the bill, the time to be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, objection has been filed with me, and I feel compelled to register that objection at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I shall explore the matter further with the distinguished minority leader from time to time.

I should like to ask unanimous consent now that we have a morning hour, with a limitation of debate of 3 minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I regret very much to feel constrained to object to this request, but the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has served notice that he would call up in the morning hour, when it would not be subject to objection, a bill that he introduced the day before yesterday, attempting to write into law the provisions of the Republican Party platform in the area known to some people as civil rights.

I do not think it will be any great handicap on the Senate in not having a formal morning hour. Any Member of the Senate who desires to do so can rise in his place and, as an individual, request that he be permitted to introduce bills and request to have matters printed in the RECORD. The only purpose of the morning hour is to limit the discussion of those matters to 3 minutes.

For my part, I do not propose to be caught here with a 3-minute limitation of debate in case the distinguished Senator from New York were to determine to move to instruct the committee to report the bill in a matter of, say, 2 or 3 days.

As the matter now stands, under the rules of the Senate, the second reading could only be had by unanimous consent. If I waive that privilege and agree to the pending request, the Senator from New York could have the bill read a second time as a matter of right.

Mr. President, I regret that this matter is so incessantly injected into this session as to make this kind of action necessary, but this is a campaign year. I suppose we shall have to pay whatever price is involved in the matter of the people of the United States selecting their leader for the next 4 years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have requested the Senator to yield only for the purpose of emphasizing what the Senator has already said. Any Senator can secure recognition in his own right, to make any kind of a speech or to insert into the RECORD a proposed bill, resolution, or memorial, if he desires to do so.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct. I hope, and indeed I know, that our colleagues will be considerate of the rights of other Senators and not take too long in asking unanimous consent for these individual requests.

As I have said, Mr. President, I did not anticipate that this course would be necessary. At the time the Senate went into recess in July, I did not hear a single Senator refer to the subject of civil rights as an appropriate matter of discussion and legislation in this after-recess session of the Senate. We heard a great deal about a health program for the old people in this country. We heard a considerable discussion of the minimum wage bill. There was a discussion of situs picketing, education, and housing bills. But I did not hear a single word and did not read in the press a single suggestion to the effect that it would be necessary to dedicate this short, "bob-tailed" session of the Senate to the question of civil rights. That suggestion did not arise until after the conventions were held and after the presidential campaign was under way.

This proceeding is a sad commentary on this country. When we are ready to consider a bill that deals with the assurance of health protection for the elderly citizens of the United States, a minimum wage program, and other matters that I have discussed, we are now asked again to consider civil rights, and to send down the drain the bill for health protection for the elderly. What is the point in discussing the minimum wage bill or the housing bill? What is the need of talking about aid to education? We must rally to the cries of those who wish to pass another so-called civil rights bill.

We spent 9 weeks this year in hammering out a civil rights bill. When it passed, the only ones who were not fairly well pleased with it were the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and about two other Senators who are on the aggressive side of the civil rights issue, and the 18 Senators from the Southern States—who were associated with me in opposing any bill whatsoever.

The Attorney General said that we had passed a good bill. The President of the United States signed it. He thought it was a fine bill. Our distinguished minority leader took the floor of the Senate and lauded it as a fine bill. No one said then that we must immediately address all of our time and attention for the rest of this year, and for henceforth and forevermore, to deal with the question of so-called civil rights to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. My comment must be taken somewhat like the comment I often make when I drive along Washington Boulevard and say, "That is a very beautiful home, isn't it? What it needs is a sun porch and a carport and a few other things." It was a good home as far as it went, but it needed a sun porch and a carport. I tried to introduce the two proposals referred to the other day, but I was not successful.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Illinois is not willing to seek a solution to the problems of a minimum wage bill, which we have started to consider; he is not willing to devote the attention of the Senate to the amount of money needed for medical aid to elderly people, or to draw the plans necessary for a housing bill or aid to education. No, he must attempt to put a sun porch in the area of civil rights.

Mr. President, it is a sad commentary on the state of the political life of this country that strong men must drop everything else and put a sun porch on the edifice which the Senator says is already a beautiful building.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I believe it was a professor at Johns Hopkins who told of going through the agony of propounding what he thought was an irreducible and incontrovertible truth. Then when his professorial associates knocked his statement into a cocked hat, he fairly screamed, "Is nothing eternal?"

One of his associates said, "Yes; one thing is eternal, and that is change."

There has been some change since we were here last in July.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; there have been events that have changed the situation considerably. Things have happened that make the sun porch more important in this area than the rest of the structure, which includes the 5 million people who are proposed to be brought under the minimum wage bill, or the 20 million people who would get a pay increase by virtue of the proposed legislation, or the 15 million elderly people whom it is proposed to benefit. While we may differ violently as to the means by which these things can be accomplished, I believe everyone in this enlightened age wishes to do something in these areas. We know that with the highest standard of living the world has ever known, some of our people—wholly without their own fault—are being denied adequate medical care. But this matter, and others I have enumerated, must stand aside while we rush in to build a sun porch.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the best argument was contained in the President's message last Monday, when he recited all these same measures to which my distinguished friend alludes, and then said we should stay on the job until it is finished.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as the matter now stands, I feel constrained to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is a bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act, Senate bill 3578. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Does the majority leader still hold the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The floor is not held by any Senator at the moment. The Chair is about to recognize the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY]. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield for the purpose of enabling me to answer the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has named me as the Senator who is depriving the Senate of a morning hour, if that be a deprivation, and so if I may have the attention of the Senator for a minute, I should like to say something on the subject.

It has not been my intention today to press such a motion as has been referred to.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator makes that statement, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. JAVITS. I have the floor myself now, and I should like to say a word on this subject, because the Senator has given us a real opening for doing so. What is being put out to the country by the opponents of civil rights—and they are relatively a minority—is clear.

The two measures offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] could be passed in a half day. They have been debated; they have been considered; they have been before the Senate for months. There is very little question about them. What is being put out to the country is that people like myself and others who have deep convictions upon this subject are delaying or digging a grave for medical care for the aged, for minimum wage, for housing, for aid to education, on which, I say advisedly, over the years my voting record is better than that of any dug-in opponent of civil rights. Why? The answer is that a minority—not we who are for civil rights—by talk can kill these other measures. The country must understand it, not because the majority does not want civil rights measures, but that the majority is to be denied the opportunity to consider civil rights in a very limited way—not before, but equally—with these other measures that affect the lives of all our people.

We talk about the millions involved. It is a fact that civil rights not only affects the lives of many millions of Americans, but it affects the domestic tranquillity of our country, and when we observe what is happening in Africa, we know it affects the peace of the whole world.

Let us be clear. A small dug-in minority—not we—in this Chamber reserves unto itself the right to kill every one of the measures listed if we dare to bring up the measure on civil rights, which they oppose. We can bring up this subject at any time. The Senate on one occasion gave a committee only 5 days in which to bring in a report. We do not want 3 weeks.

I was prepared to announce this morning that we should not press civil rights at this particular time, in view of our having had our vote earlier in the week, in which the majority party showed that it was going to yield to the small minority which held within its power the ability to kill all measures, if it chose, and if the majority would not assert its right of imposing cloture, which is within the power of this body if it wishes to assert it.

I think for this week the situation is clear to the country. I do not think we have to prove it again this week. Therefore I state to the Senate that it is not my purpose to ask for a report from the committee at this time, but we reserve all our rights to include it in a discharge petition, in an amendment to a bill, or in any way we think we might press the civil rights issue. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has given us an excellent opportunity to see that the new technique is not the filibuster for the moment; it is only to use the shield of these other measures which the country wants. Let us see how long the minimum wage bill is debated. Let us see how many votes we get. Let us see what passes in the Senate in the next week or so, and the country will get a pretty good idea about who is on what side of the issues which are being used now as an excuse for not dealing with civil rights.

A DOCTOR'S DREAM

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I now yield to my distinguished colleague from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator from Vermont may yield without losing the floor, so I may have 2 or 3 minutes on a strictly noncontroversial subject.

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Vermont, with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, it is not often that a small business, born and nurtured in the country, grows to a size that it commands national attention. and yet resists the urge to move to a big city. Such is the case of a company that is now completing the erection, in the heart of the Green Mountain State, of one of the finest and most modern office buildings in the United States.

This building, the home office of National Life Insurance Co., in Montpelier, Vt., has been referred as "A Doctor's Dream"—but a dream come true. It was more than a century ago that a Vermont country doctor, Dr. Julius Dewey, saw heartbreaking circumstances caused by the death of the breadwinner.

A man of determination and action, like his son, Admiral Dewey, the hero of Manila Bay, Dr. Dewey did something about it. He gave up a lucrative medical practice and turned all his energies to pioneering in a vastly different field of human service—the field of life insurance. He was a familiar sight in the Vermont countryside as he traveled on horseback, curing the sick and selling family security to the well. His competent and conscientious hand guided the infant life insurance company—a company that in its very beginning saw life insurance as a national need and became the first life insurance company to designate that objective in its corporate name.

How well the doctor and his successors built is reflected in the multi-million-dollar five-story building which will be dedicated on October 11 of this year. The largest office structure in northern New England, it has space for more than 1,000 employees and, typical of native pride of product, it has a beautiful exterior of glass and stone, the stone being the world-famous light gray granite from the nearby Barre quarries.

Built atop a wooded hill overlooking Vermont's capital city, National Life's new home office gives its occupants and visitors one of the finest views in the Green Mountains. More importantly, it emphasizes the fact that no other insurance company has grown to such a size in a rural environment.

Today National Life Insurance Co. is the 9th oldest and 24th largest, in terms of assets, among 1,400 life insurance companies.

It is only natural that such a company should reflect its environment, particularly the characteristics of Vermonters—traits of prudence, self-reliance and thrift. In fact, the company's first death claim, coming a few months after it began business in 1850, tested the character of its founders. The claim arose from the death of a policyholder who had gone to California to join a gold rush—and the company officers pledged their homes and individual means to pay it promptly.

From those days to these, the company has been guided by three basic policies: Unquestioned financial soundness; mutuality and equity between policyholders; low net cost of life insurance.

Dr. Dewey would be proud of his company today. For today the company's assets total nearly $800 million, for today more than a million Americans—policyholders and beneficiaries—are protected by National Life insurance for a total volume of over $2,500 million, for today the company is licensed to do business in all 50 States and the District of Columbia, for today it has a nationwide corps of high-caliber underwriters who follow zealously in the doctor's footsteps to carry on his mission: providing financial security and protection for the American home.

The company has enjoyed its greatest expansion in the past decade or so, particularly as represented in the growth of its life insurance in force. On its 99th birthday in 1949, the company had $1 billion of insurance in force; no less than 8 years later it crossed the $2 billion mark, and now it is already sprinting toward its third billion. What gives even more luster to this accomplishment is the fact National Life sells no group or industrial insurance, only individual life insurance policies.

From its very beginning National Life has been one of the pioneers of life insurance in America. It has pioneered many improvements that are now a regular feature of policies, and it has many "firsts" in making available new types of coverage and more liberal policy provisions.

The company's slogan, "Solid as the Granite Hills," is no idle boast. The character and integrity of National Life's management are reflected in the soundness of the company's financial position. Investments are confined to the highest grades of trust-fund obligations with broad geographic and economic diversification. A major portion of its funds are invested in real estate mortgages with more than two-thirds of its present mortgage loan account insured by the Federal Housing Administration or fully guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration.

National Life was one of the first financial institutions to buy FHA and GI loans on a national basis and for many years it held in its investment portfolio the first loan made by FHA.

Other mortgage holdings also have been carefully selected and based upon conservative property values. The bond portfolio of the company consists of U.S. Government and high quality municipal, public utility and industrial bonds. The company also had a small amount of high grade preferred and common stocks of industrial and public utility companies.

Although National Life is located in one of the more rural areas of the Nation we find among the company's directorate names that carry national recognition. Making up the present board are these men:

Dr. Ernest Martin Hopkins, board chairman and former company president, who headed Dartmouth College from 1916 to 1945.

Deane C. Davis, president, who is currently president of the Life Insurance Association of America.

L. Douglas Meredith, executive vice president, who is a nationally known lecturer on economics and finance.

Ralph Edward Flanders, a director of National Life since 1935, who was in the U.S. Senate from 1946 to 1958.

Edward S. French, dean of the board, prominent for years in railroad management in New England.

Lewis Blair Williams, a distinguished banker of Cleveland, Ohio.

John R. McLane, lawyer and banker of Manchester, N.H.

Laurence F. Whittemore, one of New England's top business leaders for many years. Mr. Whittemore died 2 days ago—and in his death the New England business community sustained a severe loss.

Geoffrey S. Smith, president of Girard Trust Corn Exchange Bank of Philadelphia.

Harold D. Hodgkinson, president and general manager of Wm. Filene's Sons Co. of Boston.

Dr. Joseph G. Davidson, internationally known chemist and retired vice president of Union Carbide & Carbon Corp.

John H. Patrick, prominent Vermont businessman.

Robert S. Gillette, president of Rock of Ages Corp., Barre, Vt.

In its 110-year life, the company has lived in six home offices and it is interesting to note that the last three company buildings are now owned and used by the State of Vermont to accommodate an expanding State government.

Two years ago, when the foundation of National Life's new home office was being readied, a ceremony of significance was held.

Joseph Johnson, then Governor of Vermont, poured into the foundation soils gathered from 48 States, District of Columbia and Hawaii—a fitting symbolic gesture to the nationwide business operations of a company founded by a country doctor in the Green Mountains of Vermont.

ACCEPTANCE SPEECH OF HENRY CABOT LODGE ON HIS NOMINATION FOR VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me briefly?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues and the country the speech made by our Ambassador to the United Nations, Henry Cabot Lodge, when he accepted the nomination for Vice President at the Republican Convention in Chicago recently.

Many Senators will remember Ambassador Lodge when he was a distinguished Member of this body. Others have had occasion to work with him in his demanding duties at the United Nations.

All of us, I am sure, share an affection and respect for him which has been earned by a lifetime of service devoted to the public good.

We in Massachusetts feel a special pride in his accomplishments. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Ambassador Lodge's acceptance speech be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF AMBASSADOR HENRY CABOT LODGE, OF MASSACHUSETTS, ACCEPTING THE REPUBLICAN VICE-PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION, THURSDAY, JULY 28, 1960

You have conferred a great honor on me. With all my heart I thank you for your trust. It will impel me to expend every ounce of energy in this campaign.

Americans live in a world so full of dangers that we must counsel together about the issues with the greatest seriousness and candor. The world is dangerous because small groups of men have acquired control of enormous resources and seek to put them wholeheartedly at the service of communism—a conspiratorial cult which teaches them that they must take over the world. When it becomes obvious to them—as I believe it has—that attempts to do so by military force will bring about their own devastation, they resort to threats, hate propaganda, and midnight treachery. Thus, we could in theory lose our country in two ways: Either all at once, by all-out nuclear war, or gradually by being isolated and nibbled to death.

Of course, we are not going to lose our country. We are going to keep our country. More than that, we are going to advance, using the strengths and the talents which God gave us to build a world in which freedom will be secure; a world in which the rights of small nations will be respected; a world of open societies which practice tolerance and are truly devoted to the dignity of man.

Thus, we approach the future, not smug or self-satisfied; not claiming for ourselves any superman virtues; but thankful that we are just finishing 8 full years in which, under that great world leader and great spirit, the leadership of Dwight Eisenhower, many good things have been done in which we can take honest pride. They are 8 years in which our house has been put in order, our Nation has grown stronger, and, although the world is full of danger and mystery, peace in certain specific ways appears to be a little closer.

I point to these specifics:

The fact that Americans are not now in combat anywhere in the world—because the UN is able to take steps to avoid war.

The fact that Chairman Khrushchev, in spite of his threats, recognizes and now publicly states that a nuclear war would be a disaster for the Russians "incomparably more appalling" than World War II—which Stalin would never admit.

And the fact that in 8 years the United Nations—with our faithful and energetic backing—has had a great growth in influence.

This influence enabled the United Nations, with active American leadership, to play a decisive part in snuffing out the potential wars which menaced the world at Suez in 1956; in Lebanon in 1958; in Laos in 1959; and in the Congo within the last 2 weeks where that great American, Ralph Bunche, has given such brilliant leadership.

With all this in the background and with far-reaching changes ahead, we wish to persuade our fellow citizens to entrust us with the conduct of the U.S. Government. To that end we confidently offer them a program and a man.

Our program, expressed in our platform, makes clear that we must build a future in which the American people will need to make greater common efforts to defend their freedom and to make it flourish.

First, we shall continue and strengthen the military power—including the overwhelming economic power in back of it—which guarantees that no nation will ever dare attack us.

Then, secondly, we must constantly improve the kind of community we have here in America so that the world will know that we practice what we preach—that we care deeply—that our children be well educated; that the infirm and the aged be cared for; that our farmers have the future to which their life-giving work entitles them; that our material resources be conserved; that there be work and wages for all; that people can live their lives in our cities in health and repose; and that there are never-ending opportunities for youth.

Third, it is imperative to progress in the field of human rights so that men and women in our land be recognized on their individual merits without prejudice because of race, creed or color. This recognition is a matter of justice at home. But our interests abroad—in a world where four-fifths of human beings are not of the white race—demand that we show America as she is and should be.

Within the prudent limits of our own resources we can help other nations in the old spirit of the American pioneers—the neighbor who helps not out of selfish calculation but because he likes his fellow man. Help given in the spirit of partnership can do more than larger amounts handed out as a matter of arrogant calculation.

We must do all these things while safeguarding the purchasing power of our dollar, while relentlessly ferreting out waste, while insisting on efficient management, and while encouraging still further the high productivity of our working men and women. Thus, we shall make the most of our marvelous system.

Can we do all that? Of course we can. We can afford to do whatever we need to do. In brief, such is our program in this campaign.

But we offer more than a program; we offer a man to carry it out. We offer RICHARD NIXON. He is a remarkable human being. He is enormously energetic and vital; he is uniquely experienced in government, with particular emphasis on foreign affairs; he is immensely intelligent and talented; he reveres deeply, and expresses forcefully the strength of America and American ideals. He stands out in any group of persons gathered together for a serious purpose. He is tough minded; he does not get rattled; he is firm in the right.

He is not merely experienced in the arts of domestic politics and the pros and cons of internal questions. On his experience—on his talents—I submit that there is no man in America who could represent us in the turmoil of world politics—and I specifically include the Soviet Union and the rest of the Communist empire—as RICHARD NIXON would do.

My fellow Americans, the basic contest in the world is no old-fashioned traditional partisan rivalry between the Republicans and the Democrats. The basic contest is the life and death struggle between the Communists on the one hand and those who insist on being free on the other. This is what gives this election of 1960 its compelling, overwhelming importance to us and to the world. It imposes on us all the duty to give nothing less than our very ablest, our most experienced, our most talented to the Presidency of our country.

Lastly—and most fundamentally—we must do nothing less than our best in the spirit in which we act. Ultimately, we will win the world struggle on a spiritual basis—or victory will elude us.

We must, therefore, be true to our own ideals: First to our political heritage, our Declaration of Independence, which tells us that all men are created equal and are entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—happiness as the individual sees it and not as some government prepares for him.

Then we must strive to fulfill the purpose of our religious heritage which tells us, in the words of the great Hebrew prophet, Micah, to "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God;" or as the New Testament, that we are our brother's keeper and that we must love our neighbor as ourselves.

With these truths in our hearts we do not need to rend our garments and lament that we have no national purpose. We have the most glorious purposes of any nation in history. Purposes which, as Lincoln said, give "hope for the world for all future time." To live up to those purposes in this world of danger—to care deeply and enthusiastically for them—should be our great privilege and joy.

That is the spirit that summons RICHARD NIXON. It is a good spirit for Americans—and for free men wherever they may be.

In that spirit, we submit our program and our candidacies to the American people.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me for an observation?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield briefly to the Senator from Florida, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Several Senators have asked me what the prospects are with reference to the consideration of an amendment to the pending measure, the wage and hour matter, which I shall offer. I have tried to tell the Senators individually, but I believe it would be better to state now, where all Senators may hear, what the situation is, as I understand.

First, there is no disposition on the part of myself or anyone else to hold up a vote on the amendment. Second, we are advised by the distinguished Senators from New Hampshire that they must be in their State on Saturday because of a funeral which they feel they must attend. I understand also the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina has a wedding in his family, which he feels he must attend.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. It is a graduation, as I told the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. A graduation. I have reported these matters to the majority leader. I am sorry he is not present to make any announcement he feels he should make, and which I am sure he will be able to make later.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I have been advised by the two Senators from South Carolina that the State convention of their political party will convene in their State next Monday, and that they both expect to be there as a matter of duty and as a matter of necessity.

I know of nothing that has been called to my attention which would hold up the possibility of a vote after next Monday. I am certainly not disposed to even ask that a vote be held up longer than that time.

I can speak only for myself, and I am sorry that the majority leader is not here. I do not believe, however, in view of the interest in the proposed legislation, which affects very vitally all the Main Street merchants in our country, from one end to the other, and all the service groups, in the same way, that there will be any disposition on the part of either leader or anyone else in the Senate to try to force a vote until Senators who wish to be heard on this matter can be here and have their votes cast. So far as I know, therefore, the matter will probably be held up until Tuesday of next week.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I appreciate the consideration of my good friend from Florida for other Members of the Senate. However, I see on the floor my colleague from Pennsylvania. He will recall that there was important business before the Senate shortly before the recess, when we were called upon to attend a funeral in Pennsylvania. No consideration of any sort was given to our situation. We were told to obtain live pairs. Votes were taken in our absence. I believe that the Senate ought to go ahead with its business and not be held up by private situations of Members of the Senate, whether they be weddings, graduations, or funerals. I would regret very much if this most important business of the Senate in this short session, or what my friend from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has called this bobtailed session, were to be delayed and we were not going to be able to do anything until Tuesday because of the private convenience of a few Members of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield again briefly to me, so that I may make a reply to the Senator?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield, with the same understanding.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the first place, my amendment has not been offered. In the next place, there are several Senators who have notified me that they expect to speak, some of them for the amendment and some, I regret to say, against the amendment.

I know of two or three rather long speeches—not lengthy from the standpoint of permanently holding us up, but from the standpoint that they are 2 or 3 hours long—that Senators expect to make. I do not believe it is reasonable to anticipate that on amendments as far reaching as these are a vote could be reached before Tuesday. Under the circumstances, I felt that the Senate would want to take that into consideration, as well as the necessary absences which have been mentioned.

The reason for my announcement is, first, to disclose every fact I know of to my fellow Senators; second, if there are others who have situations confronting them, they may certainly announce them. If there are Senators who feel we should proceed rather ruthlessly, as our friend from Pennsylvania has suggested, and go ahead and vote in the absence of Senators who wish to be heard on this important matter, they can so indicate.

I hope there will be none quite so ruthless as the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania has indicated he would be under those circumstances. I am simply trying to pass on to Senators information I have, without going around and buttonholing each of them, as a matter of courtesy to all of them, including the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, who had asked me—he was one of those who had inquired of me—and whom I had told I would expect to answer in this way.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Florida is correct.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, repeated assaults have been made by the Democratic Party, Democratic Senators, and other persons, on the so-called tight-money, high-interest-rate policy of this administration. I recently pointed out that those charges are false, are not in accordance with the facts, are made to confuse the public, and are for presumed partisan political advantage. Such assaults have been made to injure the confidence of the public in the Federal Reserve Board and the Eisenhower administration.

A few days ago, in referring to this subject, I pointed out the relatively low-interest rates which obtain in the United States as compared with all the other free nations. I referred to a study made by the First National City Bank of New York. That study was discussed by the Wall Street Journal in an editorial published by that newspaper earlier this week, which I placed in the RECORD at that time.

For the information of the Senators and others who may read the RECORD—and I hope many people will read the article—I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Prime Loan Rates in the World Today," published in the First National City Bank monthly letter of August 1960.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRIME LOAN RATES IN THE WORLD TODAY

The accompanying table, which brings up to date a similar compilation published in the July 1957 issue of this letter, shows commercial bank prime loan rates in 59 countries. These are the lowest rates at which business firms of the highest credit standing can borrow from banks on an unsecured basis. Major business firms occasionally may be able to borrow at lower interest costs where an open market in "commercial paper" exists, but the volume of funds available in these markets is limited and such borrowings lack the flexibility of bank loans.

It must be borne in mind that money is frequently scarce at the banks' minimum rates. Most borrowers able to obtain funds must pay higher rates. In many countries, there are commissions and other arrangements which increase the cost of borrowing. The effective interest costs thus are generally higher than the rates shown in the table; for a number of countries the posted rates are, in fact, nominal.

Prime loan rates of 5 percent, as in the United States, prevail in very few other countries. Rates of 6 to 8 percent are quite frequent even in countries with developed money markets. Since last June, the prime rate has been at 6½ percent in the United Kingdom, following the increase in the official discount rate from 5 to 6 percent.

Here, a less restrictive Federal Reserve policy, evidenced in a half-point discount rate cut in June, created some stir of expectation that the 5-percent commercial bank prime loan rate (in effect since September 1, 1959) might be cut. However, bank resources, curtailed by deposit contraction, remained too scarce to justify general loan rate reductions.

Interest rates today seem high when contrasted with the extremes of the past three decades of cheap money. But the artificially low rates were made possible only by a continuous creation of money, which in turn brought about price and cost inflation, economic distortions, and waste, as well as seemingly unmanageable balance-of-payment strains. In the past 15 years, nation after nation has accepted the idea that there is no inherent virtue in cheap money and that interest rates should be flexible so as to bring the demand for loanable funds into a sustainable balance with supply.

Free dynamic economies continuously require vast amounts of capital, which in turn depend upon adequate savings. The price of capital—the rate of interest—therefore has an essential function to perform in a free society.

The interest rate is neither the hero nor the villain. It is the end result of manifold influences permeating our entire economic life. The cost of borrowing can be reduced, without injurious effects on the economy, only if the Nation's monetary and fiscal affairs are handled responsibly.

NOTE.—Compiled by the Economics Department of the First National City Bank of New York from information available in New York in July 1960.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from New York, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the distinguished acting majority leader. I have an inquiry to make which is a sort of follow-up to the observations made by the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

I have accepted an invitation to address the national convention of the Association of District Attorneys on Saturday evening. I am perfectly ready to cancel that obligation. However, I noted that the Senate was not kept in session last evening, in order that the majority leader's leader might go to New York and engage in a political foray. I wondered just how far we would go in this session to permit other Senators to have time off for purposes of their own.

The Senate is considering a minimum wage bill. I am prepared to stay here constantly, day and night, or whenever the leadership feels we should be in session; but I make the point that when the author of the bill is permitted to spend a minimum of time on the minimum wage bill and is permitted to leave a session of the Senate, and the whole Senate is taken out of session in order that he may do that, it seems to me no more than fair that consideration be given to some of us who have some other obligations in the evening.

I ask, entirely for my own information, what, as a matter of policy, is to happen at this session.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I may say to the distinguished Senator from New York that so far as the junior Senator from Massachusetts is concerned, he has performed his duties effectively and well. As the author of the bill, he made the introductory remarks concerning that measure. He has been in attendance as often as most of the other Members of the Senate during the discussions of the measure.

I point out that on yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] held the floor for 4½ or 5 hours. This point ought to be interesting to the Senator from New York. He mentioned that perhaps on this side of the aisle we were holding up the consideration of this important proposed legislation. However, it is my understanding that the Senator from Arizona has between 25 and 40 amendments to offer to the minimum wage bill. Until this time, no amendment has as yet been offered for the Senate to consider. Therefore, if there is any delay in the consideration of the minimum wage bill, I am afraid Senators on the other side of the aisle will have to bear a large share of the responsibility.

Furthermore, a unanimous consent agreement was proposed today which would provide for 2 hours of debate on each amendment and 8 hours for the consideration of the bill. No Senator on this side of the aisle objected. So I should say, in answer to the question of the Senator from New York, that it is up to all of us to get down to what a certain individual calls the people's business. We ought to meet on Saturdays. We ought to be here regardless of the particular situations affecting us as individual Senators.

Mr. KEATING. I entirely and wholeheartedly agree with that statement. I am prepared to remain here. I think most Senators are. However, they take exception—I am not the only one—to adjourning or recessing the Senate in order that one Senator, and one Senator only, may suit his own convenience and be away, and not have anything happen while he is away.

It strikes me that if this is to be done, the same consideration should be given to other Senators as was given to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] last evening, when the session was called off in order that he might make a political foray into the great State which I have the honor to represent, in part.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts, as the distinguished Senator from New York has noted, said various things with respect to the minimum wage bill. The junior Senator from Massachusetts said yesterday that he is not busy; that he is prepared to stay here this fall, if it should be necessary. I am glad the junior Senator from Massachusetts is willing to stay here this fall if it should be necessary. I, of course, am willing to assume that he is willing to stay on his own terms, on terms which include a limited agenda; a personally picked shopping list.

I wish the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts were willing to stay here to consider other measures as recommended by the President of the United States, and to consider a civil rights measure, which has been discussed by many Senators. However, it is reassuring to know that the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts is willing to stay here at all, and that he is willing to stay here this fall.

The very noble declaration by the junior Senator from Massachusetts, which I applaud, that he was willing to stay here all fall, apparently meant until 5:30 yesterday afternoon. Whether or not the junior Senator from Massachusetts had information from the majority leader which the rest of us did not have, I do not know. I know that I personally remained in attendance in the expectation that there might be some quorum calls or some votes. I am still in the dark as to whether there will be any quorum calls or votes today or on Monday or on any other day. I assume there are some Senators who know more than I do about that, and who will be able to make speeches of a political nature or otherwise.

The junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has said that he was not able to fulfill a speaking engagement yesterday. I happen to know that the Vice President turned down several rather important engagements he had last night because he was not, let us say, privy to the plans of the majority leader. It seems hardly fair that some persons are privy to those plans and others are not. Apparently some Senators may disappear and make speeches, while others may not.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. In just a moment. I had several opportunities to make speeches last night, tonight, and on Monday. I am not without some amount of correspondence along these lines. I deplore the difficulty which those of us have who are not in the majority leader's confidence in finding out just exactly what is going on here.

If we are not to vote until Tuesday, at least I should like to know that. I have engagements which are important to me to keep. Incidentally, my family would like to know where I am going to be, but I am unable to advise them. Various people want me to appear for meetings, but I am unable to advise them.

If one Senator is going to be advised, so that he may trip merrily off to greener political fields—assuming that there are any political fields greener than the Senate—would it not be possible for the rest of us likewise to be privy to this kind of information?

If we are not going to vote tomorrow or Monday, I hope the Senate will be so advised. If we are going to vote then, I am willing to be here. I join the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] in my entire willingness to remain here all this fall, if he does. That would improve the attendance record of both of us, and I would be delighted to proceed in accord with his wishes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. SCOTT. In just a moment. Before I yield, I should like to request the printing of two items in the RECORD. One of them is a statement on the matter about which I have just spoken. I ask that the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CANDIDATE KENNEDY CANNOT HAVE IT BOTH WAYS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCOTT

We have heard much talk in recent days about the need for bold and imaginative national leadership. Much of this agitation emanated during July from Los Angeles, and indeed, many pious statements about the necessity for vigorous leadership has emanated from the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

Unfortunately, just when the Senate might have been able to benefit from examples of this sort of guidance from the junior Senator from Massachusetts, he has been embarrassingly absent. His ability to absent himself from our deliberations just at the time when he could make a contribution to the work of the Senate, just when he could exhibit before the Nation his qualities of leadership, must give friend and foe alike cause to pause and wonder.

Of course, the absentee record of the junior Senator from Massachusetts is nothing new. As a Member of the House of Representatives, he was not recorded on 179 out of 604 votes—or 29 percent of the time. That seemed pretty bad at the time, but it pales into insignificance alongside his Senate performance.

According to my figures, the junior Senator from Massachusetts has had an awfully tough time this year making it to the floor of the Senate for votes. In fact, out of 159 rollcalls in the Senate this year, from January 7 to June 20, he missed 120. This is an astounding 75 percent.

I realize the junior Senator from Massachusetts has had other things on his mind in recent months. In pursuit of other goals it is perhaps understandable why he has found it unable to participate fully—and give us the benefit of his leadership—in Senate deliberations on such matters he may regard as trivial, such as the civil rights of our citizens, or expenditures for national defense, or the formulation of our foreign policy, or such things as legislation on housing, depressed areas, and so on endlessly.

However, I think the American people deserve to know the facts about this absentee record, because it is a legitimate part of their evaluation of the qualifications and performance of the national candidates this fall. The American people ought to know that the junior Senator from Massachusetts has one of the worst attendance records of any Senator in recent memory.

Certainly none of us would want to give a promotion to a secretary in our offices who had failed to show up 29 percent of the time for a number of years, and then in the most recent year hadn't put in an appearance 75 percent of the time. In any other line of endeavor, an absentee record like that would be solid grounds for a firing or at least a demotion—yet the junior Senator from Massachusetts dares to use this as a basis for asking the American people to promote him to the highest office in the land.

Just last night—when this special session was only 4 days old—the Senator saw fit to leave and fly up to New York for more politicking. Here we have an extraordinary session called at the behest of the partner of the junior Senator from Massachusetts and we are in the midst of a bill for which he is the floor leader—and where is the junior Senator from Massachusetts? He has certainly spent a minimum amount of time on his minimum wage bill.

The time has come for the junior Senator from Massachusetts to demonstrate he means what he says when he demands leadership. The time has come for him to pay attention to his Senate duties, rather than making national legislation take a back seat to his political aspirations. The American people will be watching and waiting to see what kind of a performance will be forthcoming from the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

LABOR SECRETARY MITCHELL'S REPORT POINTS TO NEED FOR PENSION, WELFARE AMENDMENTS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCOTT

Mr. SCOTT. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement by me on Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell's report on the first 18 months of operation of the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR SECRETARY MITCHELL'S REPORT POINTS TO NEED FOR PENSION, WELFARE AMENDMENTS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCOTT

Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell's report on the first 18 months of operation of the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act was made public yesterday.

It clearly points up the urgent need for amendments to that act. That report supports beyond a doubt President Eisenhower's misgivings as to the effectiveness of the law when he signed the bill in August 1958.

At that time the President listed five major deficiencies in the law and indicated that he was approving the act only "because it establishes a precedent of Federal responsibility in this area. It does little else." He further declared that "if the bill is to be at all effective it will require extensive amendment at the next session of the Congress."

In the first session of the 86th Congress I introduced a bill (S. 2550) to carry out the President's recommendations to give life and spirit to the law. My bill was referred to the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee as a matter within the jurisdiction of that committee's Subcommittee on Labor, chaired by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts.

That subcommittee has failed to act on this legislation. This is misleading millions of American workers into assuming that the action of Congress taken in 1958 gives them adequate protection for the billions of dollars which are annually received and disbursed by the many thousands of welfare and pension plans.

The letter of the Secretary of Labor which accompanies today's report states that "to continue the law in its present form in the belief that it assures adequate protective safeguards is a shameful illusion." The unfortunate condition in which the Secretary of Labor finds himself is best described by the following examples:

1. The number of plan descriptions (142,500) which have been filed with the Department of Labor to be made available for public disclosure is many thousands short of the number of plans believed to fall within the scope of the act.

2. Based upon information relating to the frequency of changes in employee benefit plans it is obvious that the number of plan amendments submitted to the Department of Labor under the requirements of the act is thousands short of the total number which should have been submitted and thus full and current details of these plans are not available for public disclosure.

3. The law requires that for each description of an employee welfare or pension benefit plan the plan administrator shall file an annual report covering the operations of that plan. By June 30, 1960, only 100,500 annual financial reports had been filed with the Department of Labor. Not only were some 15,000 to 20,000 reports delinquent and in violation of the law after June 30 but thousands of other submissions consolidated the financial data for several plans into a single report contrary to the explicit provisions of the act.

4. Moreover, obvious defects and omissions are clearly evident in thousands of reports which have been filed and thus patently not in compliance with the law. In many instances, after these deficiencies have been called to the attention of plan administrators, they remain uncorrected. Under the present state of the law, the Department can take no further action.

5. Finally, the overall adequacy or accuracy of seemingly complete reports filed with the Department of Labor cannot be effectively determined because of the absence of rulemaking, investigatory or enforcement authority thus leaving the Secretary of Labor for all practical purposes, powerless to uncover abuses.

The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee has not acted upon legislation which would correct the glaring deficiencies in the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

We continue to maintain the false impression, created in the minds of over 85 million working men and women of this country, that their interests in welfare and pension funds amounting to more than $30 billion are adequately protected, when they are not.

How can we keep faith with the people of America if we fail to correct their false belief which Congress fostered—that we have provided adequate protective safeguards for their present and future well-being, when we know in our hearts we have not.

In 1958 this body passed a strong welfare and pension plan bill which invested necessary authority in the Secretary of Labor to protect the interests of participants and beneficiaries in pension and welfare plans. This action subsequently was thwarted by the stand of the conferees of the House. The Senate conferees apparently were operating under a severe handicap in spite of the fact that they were cloaked with extremely strong support in favor of the Senate bill by passing that measure by an 88–0 vote.

In spite of this overwhelming vote of confidence the Senate conferees found that they had to recede and surrender to the wishes of the other body. I would like to quote from the remarks of the junior Senator from Massachusetts who was chairman of the Senate conferees (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 14, p. 17964):

"It was contrary to the sentiments of the majority of the Senate conferees to accept the conference report; but a substantial number of the Members of the House of Representatives preferred no bill at all to the bill which had been passed by the Senate. Therefore, the Senate conferees were negotiating from a point of weakness, in regard to a bill which we wanted very much to have enacted. Under the circumstances, the Senate conferees had to recede."

I wonder about the readiness to define this position as a "negotiating from a point of weakness." There is a quality of courage and fortitude that is lacking here.

If this situation arises again and the conferees find the going too rough, I should hope that our conferees would come back to this body and ask us for instructions as they were willing to do only last year when it appeared that the conference on the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 might become bogged down.

We owe a duty to millions of Americans to correct the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act. It is only just and right that these countless millions be given a sense of security that the billions of dollars annually received and disbursed by these plans are not being manipulated or embezzled. We need to assure the workingmen of America that these plans shall be honestly managed for the lawful purposes for which they were intended. I request that prompt action be taken by the Senate on my bill S. 2550.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not have the floor; but if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] will permit——

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I yield to the minority leader, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to ask the majority leader how long he plans to have the sessions today and tomorrow continue.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Vermont may yield to the minority leader, for the purpose of that inquiry, and that I may respond, not only to that inquiry, but also to the inquiries made by others of my colleagues, in order to supply whatever information I may have, without causing the Senator from Vermont to lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am agreeable to having the sessions end at 7 p.m. or 9:30 p.m. or 11 p.m. As I told the Senate the other evening, what I should like to have done, if my wishes alone were considered, would be to have the sessions begin at 9:30 in the mornings and continue until 9:30 in the evenings, or perhaps 10 o'clock, with the understanding that there would be no votes after 9:30.

I attempt to understand the problems of the minority leader and of all those we represent on both sides of the aisle. I have said to each Senator who has told me that he desires to be away that I think he should prepare to obtain a pair, for we have a difficult schedule. We have very important proposed legislation before us. No single Senator has asked me for the privilege of being away and not having a vote taken at that time; and I guess those who serve in this body understand some of the statements which have been made this morning. At least I do; once a national chairman, always a national chairman. [Laughter.]

But I talked to the minority leader about the schedule, and suggested that we convene at 9:30 a.m. and remain in session until 9:30 that evening. He said, "No; 9:30 a.m. is too soon. Why not come in later and work out a better schedule?"

Finally, I said, "Well, would you like to come in at 10 and go out at 7?"

He said, "Why 7?"

I said, "I would be glad to stay until 11, if you want to. The Members are asking whether they can go to dinner." I said, "If you want to go to dinner, you can cut off votes at 7 o'clock. If you are willing to miss your dinner"—and I have not had dinner at the Capitol any night this week, so far—"then we would not cut off votes at 7 o'clock."

Incidentally, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who is the object of all the panic and all of the frantic statements, has not made any request of me about the schedule. As a matter of fact, I have said to the aides of the Senate to inform him that I would like to have the Senate reach a vote on the minimum wage bill as soon as possible. All through this time, in connection with the meetings of the Labor Committee that were held, so far as I was informed, the Senator from Massachusetts did not make any request. But the aides told me they wanted to have a meeting of the Labor Committee this morning, and asked whether it would be possible to have the Senate meet today at noon, instead of earlier. I complied with that request, with the understanding of the minority leader.

Yesterday afternoon, about 5:30, the minority leader came to my office, and asked me when I thought we would reach a vote. I said, "Just as quickly as they are ready, but I think this bill is going to take some time, for it is an important bill. It covers millions of people and thousands of employers. I would think we could not get a vote before Saturday, anyway."

I do not think I violate any confidence—for I shall not mention any names—when I say that the minority leader said to me, "There are two Senators who cannot be here on Saturday, because of other important business."

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator can mention who they are.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No, I shall not do so.

I said, "I understand that. But cannot we work out pairs for them?"

He said, "Well, we shall explore it further. But Saturday is a bad day to vote, and I do not know that we could get a vote by Saturday."

Senators who are realists will agree, I believe, that we could not reach the final vote by Saturday.

He said, "For the votes on amendments, it does not make any difference—but not for the vote on the question of final passage."

I came in this morning, and several Senators on my side of the question communicated to me the same information that was communicated to the Senator from Illinois about Monday. They said, "Two of our Members will be away on Monday, and they do not want any votes taken on Monday."

I said, "I hope we can arrange some pairs to protect them. If two Members on one side cannot be here on Saturday, and if two Members on the other side cannot be here on Monday, perhaps we can obtain pairs for them." I would be willing to arrange a pair with any Senator who takes a position different from mine. But they do not want pairs.

I have been here long enough, and so has the Senator from Illinois, to know that if there are two or three Members who do not want the vote on the question of final passage taken on a certain day, then, notwithstanding the desires of the majority leader or the minority leader, the vote will not be taken on that day.

In dealing with a bill as important as this one, on which 1,300 pages of testimony have been taken, and to which 34 amendments have been prepared, I think it very unlikely that the Senate will vote on Saturday or on Monday. I do not want to try to "sell" Members on not voting on those days, because I want the amendments debated and voted on whenever possible. But I am not making any attempt to ram something through here without giving the Members an opportunity to digest it. And even if I made such an attempt, I am enough of a realist to know that it would fail.

There are Members who do not think that either Saturday or Monday is a good day to vote, because some Members will be out of town then. I understand that. There is no difficulty about having debate on amendments on either of these days, so far as I know. Sometimes a Senator will wish to discuss an amendment for 30 minutes or for 60 minutes, but seldom for longer. The Senator asked me about that.

The other evening the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] had the floor. I waited a while, and then, when he continued to hold the floor, I decided to return later on. Later, I was called, and was told that the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] had finished his speech, and that no other Senator who desired to speak was then present. We had previously announced that Senators who had dinner engagements could fulfill them at 7 o'clock.

So far as those who visit the galleries are concerned and so far as the country generally is concerned, I think it is very unfair to place all the burden or all the responsibility for this situation on any Senator, particularly the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], because he has not made any special request; and if he did make a special request, we would say to him what we have said to all other Senators—namely, that I would hope he would arrange for a pair.

I do not believe the Senate will vote on Saturday or on Monday, because those are bad days on which to have the Senate vote. Some Senators will be away on those days. They are willing to have amendments voted on then, but they are not willing to have the vote on the question of final passage taken then.

But I shall ask Senators to remain here and try to have the votes on the amendments taken. If I can get that done, I shall do it. If I cannot, I shall do just what I did last night—tell the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], who is on the floor, and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] to move that a recess until the next day be taken whenever the time comes that no other Senator desires to make a speech.

I am perfectly willing, if it is agreeable to the minority leader, to have the sessions begin at 9:30 a.m., for the remainder of this week, until final action on this bill is taken, and to have the daily sessions continue until 9:30 in the evenings, and to make that arrangement now, so that every Senator can know it. In that event, any Senator who desires to be away can arrange a pair. I will arrange a pair with any Senator in regard to my position on the measure, because Senator Knowland did that for years, and so did Senator Taft, and so has Senator Dirksen.

I do not think any Senator should ask that votes be held up because of his absence. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has not asked me that that be done.

I was told that a Senator who was faced with a very unusual circumstance had to be away, and hoped that the vote on the question of final passage would not be had on the day on which he had to be away. I can understand that; and two Senators on the other side of the aisle told me they would have to be away on Monday. So the matter is not a partisan one.

I usually work out these problems with the minority leader. But if other Senators wish to participate in this, it will be agreeable to me to have the Senate enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that the daily sessions begin at 9:30 a.m. and continue until 9:30 p.m. until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COTTON. My name was brought into this discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not brought the Senator's name into it.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator from Texas has not, but others have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I simply want to say that I was one of the two Senators mentioned, and I desired to attend a funeral on Saturday. I have never, either from the minority leader or the majority leader, ever requested so much as 1 day's delay because I wanted to go to a funeral or anywhere else.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. COTTON. I think, in view of the fact that, day after day, not only in this rump session, but in the regular session, those of us who faithfully stayed around here found ourselves, about 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon, hanging around Washington, when the Senate had adjourned without our knowing anything about it, what has been said is not a justified complaint. That is all right. I have never complained, but I do not think it is either a lack of privilege of a Senator or a violation of the rules to inquire as to the likelihood of a vote on a certain day. That is what I did—inquire.

I rather resent the passionate remarks of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania about running the Senate for the convenience of the two Senators from New Hampshire. I am not asking anyone for the slightest consideration for my convenience. I was merely inquiring if there was a likelihood of a vote. I do not think there is anything wrong in inquiring what the probabilities are.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There is nothing wrong in that. The Senator is eminently correct. Furthermore, there is nothing wrong with Senators being away on certain matters and saying they are willing to vote on amendments. No request has been made of me to delay action on the bill on Saturday or on Monday.

Mr. COTTON. That is all I wanted the RECORD to show.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Senators say they were not informed they could make speeches. I will say they had opportunity to be informed. The RECORD, at page 16164 for Wednesday, August 10, shows the time for coming in was set between the Senator from Illinois and myself. He asked what time I wanted the Senate to convene. I suggested 9:30. We had a little discussion about it. I said if the Senate was willing, I would suggest 9:30. I assured the Senator from Illinois his presence would not be required before 11 o'clock, because we had some speeches to be made and there would be no votes. I said I would not permit any rollcalls, or promote any, and I would certainly give him notice if we had any. Then I said if we convened at 9:30 and made good progress on the bill, I would be willing to go out at 7 o'clock. Afterward we had a little conversation that was not on the RECORD, at which time I said that, so far as I was concerned, we could come in at 9:30 and go to 11; but we finally agreed to come in at 10 and close at 7, and that was announced, and that is in the RECORD. If the Senator from Pennsylvania did not know it, it was because the minority did not tell him or he did not read it.

The Democratic Party convention is meeting today in West Virginia. The Democratic Party is assembled there. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], who is running for reelection, who was scheduled to keynote the convention would like to be there. But I have said to him, and to every other Senator who has asked me, I think we ought to be prepared, between 9:30 a.m. and 9:30 p.m. for votes, and I say that to Senators who need to be away on Saturday. The Senator from West Virginia is here at his post because he feels the importance of this bill to his people. Senators did not ask me to stop this debate. The hope was expressed to me by the minority leader that maybe we would not have a rollcall on final passage on Saturday, because that is a bad day for a vote, and not because of any personal request of any Senator. Is not that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I had not even got down to my request of the minority leader for the two Democratic Senators who hope we will not have a vote on Monday.

Mr. President, if it is agreeable, I ask unanimous consent that during further sessions hereafter we meet at 9:30 in the morning and that we have no rollcalls after 9:30 in the evening.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, there is another consideration that is involved here, and, in my judgment, it is an overriding consideration. Not only are we engaged in work on the Senate floor, but there is a file of correspondence on my desk. I never saw so many people in the Capitol. We cannot arbitrarily brush aside our folks from home, or people who are interested in legislation, and not see them. There comes a time when one must prepare himself on these new enfoldments that face us from one hour to another in the course of a day. I have had my lunch on my desk every day except one day this week, because there was not time for anything else. I think there has to be a little time for our meals, if for no other reason than that we best serve the national interest when the mind is a little more acute and a little more responsive to a body that is not fatigued by long hours.

Mr. President, I can take it, as I have been taking it for a long, long time; but I do say that when we have been in session from 9:30 in the morning until 7 o'clock at night, that ought to be enough. Then, if one has his dinner, there is a little extra time entailed in putting one's nose in the books to see "what gives" for the following day.

I make full confession that I have been on deck at 5:30 or 6 o'clock in the morning, because the days are not long enough, but I do not think I do my best work, by far, under those circumstances. That is why I respectfully suggest now that, aside from when we get here in the morning, we stop when we get to around 7 o'clock. We should stop, because it is in the national interest. It is in the country's interest. I think we do better work. I think the amendments that will be under consideration and will then go on the statute books will thereby represent a far better piece of work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I modify my request, so far as tomorrow is concerned, so all Senators can be on notice. I have no desire to proceed against the will of a majority of the Senate. I think there is some merit in what the minority leader has said. If we come in at 9:30 tomorrow, we would have no votes after 7 o'clock. I would not want that request to reflect on the Vice President, who may or may not be here. I want to ask Senators on this side not to denounce his not being here. I understand he is to be away tomorrow, in Maine. He has not asked for special consideration. I am willing to let every Member of the Senate know we will have a meeting after 7 o'clock, but we will have no votes after 7 o'clock. I hope no one will say I am doing it because of special consideration.

If that is the minority leader's wish, I modify my request and ask that when we conclude our business today, we meet tomorrow at 9:30, and that we have no rollcalls after 7 o'clock tomorrow evening. We will have rollcalls on Saturday and Monday, so that Senators may protect themselves.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have listened, not only today, but throughout 2 years, to the majority leader's explanations that the decisions he arrives at are arrived at at the suggestion of the minority——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not said that; I have said "after consultation."

Mr. SCOTT. I have stated the impression I got.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is not a correct statement. I said "after consultation."

Mr. SCOTT. Whatever is the correct statement, the majority leader several times, within the last 10 minutes, has, by deferential reference to the minority, left with me, at least, as one Senator, the impression that his actions are largely influenced by the conversations he has with the minority or the minority leader. But that is not what I rise to clarify.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is there anything wrong with that, I will ask the Senator? Should I not try to cooperate with the minority leader? Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I reserved the right to object, and I asked to be recognized for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the right to reserve an objection.

Mr. SCOTT. After I finish what I have to say, then the Senator may proceed in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I withdraw my request.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] has the floor.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as I was about to say when I was parliamentarily interrupted, I do not think it is the decision of the minority party as to what time we meet or as to what time we adjourn. I think that is the responsibility of the majority party and of the majority party's leadership.

Mr. President, I think it was the majority party which called this session. As I have indicated, I am prepared to stay here at any time and at all hours. I would simply like to know, as much as the next Senator knows, so that I shall be informed whether it is proper and safe to leave and to keep other engagements. If I cannot determine that, I shall either remain or take the risk of not remaining.

I wish to point out again, so far as I am concerned, speaking only for myself, that I do not think it should be a matter of agreement between the majority leader and the minority leader, but rather it is the responsibility of the majority leader himself as to when we come in and when we go home. I shall not quarrel with what that time is. If the majority leader wishes to renew his request, after I have had an opportunity to clarify at least my own opinion, I certainly shall not object.

I have been trying to say that I do object to an inference that it is only the Members of the minority who ought to eat dinner, or that it is only the Members of the minority who do not like to get up early in the morning. As a matter of fact, we will do whatever the requirements of this session call upon us to do, and we will be here as long as any other Members.

We will do our duty as we see it. We will not obstruct legislation. We favor bringing in all the bills we can be given an opportunity to consider which are in the national interest, including the pending bill.

I think, Mr. President, there is something which ought to be clarified, because we all love the majority leader. We recognize the peculiar and especially attractive and glamorous situation he has at this time. We wish to help him in every way we can. I rise only for that purpose.

I should like again to have it understood that it is not the Members of my party who are asking that we get out early or that we do not work, but it is up to the majority leader to lead the Senate and to decide when we come in and to decide when we go out.

I do not know why this session should be any different from any of the others. The majority leader has been telling us what to do, when to come in and when to go out, for a long time. We have been responding like the 99 well-trained Senators we are. I do not know why we should suddenly find that the 34 of us, because we might get hungrier than the majority for some reason which is surely not biological, should under those circumstances be expected to dictate the time.

I thank the Senator from Vermont for yielding.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I must add a postscript to what the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania has said. The determination to which he alludes has not always been made entirely by the majority leader. He has been cooperative. I have gone to him many times to suggest that we come in later or that we stop earlier. I shall continue to do so, if for no other reason than that considerations of health are involved, plus the fact that I firmly believe that when we do not overtax our minds with long hours of labor we work better. We always have the overhanging considerations of correspondence and people to see and other duties to discharge. I shall continue to ask that we operate on the basis of reasonable hours.

Mr. President, I am going to suggest to the majority leader now—right now—that he reinstate the request which he withdrew a little bit ago. I shall join with him in the request, because I think it is in the national interest. I think it is in the interest of the effective and expeditious discharge of the complicated business which goes across every Senator's desk every day.

Because I am in no position to make the request, I urgently urge that the Senator reinstate the request now. I fully concur in it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me, so that I may respond?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Texas, the majority leader, with the understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. President, viewing the leadership situation as I do, I can make the motion and perhaps get a majority to support it. I do not wish to be arbitrary about these matters; I have never found it necessary in the 10 years I have occupied the position of leadership in this body to assume such an attitude. I have been able to work out the time to convene and the time to adjourn every day for 10 years, I think, except for one evening. I have never had a problem with the Senator from Illinois. He is willing to adjust his schedule to suit the convenience of the majority, and frequently he has done so. I have tried to reciprocate. I believe in the doctrine of reciprocity.

Therefore, if it is agreeable with the Members of the Senate, with the understanding that we expect to get and hope to get yea-and-nay votes during the day, and with the further understanding that we shall be glad to have any speeches Senators desire to make after 7 o'clock tomorrow evening, and we could run until midnight, if Senators so desire, for some Senators come in at the last minute, without any notification to me, and I do not have any idea of their wishes, since I cannot check everybody to figure out whether any Senators desire to make long speeches after the usual day is over. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we convene at 9:30 o'clock a.m. tomorrow and that we have no yea-and-nay votes after 7:30 tomorrow evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to be heard upon this matter very briefly. I do not wish to interpose any block.

I have been one of those, along with the senior Senator from Florida on one occasion, who objected to the very excessively long hours of the Senate. I am a comparatively young man, and I can stand the gaff, but I also know that I am not representing my constituents in the way they have a right to expect if, day after day, I am putting in 16 or 18 or 20 hours on the floor of the United States Senate, as we have done this year at times.

I have looked around the Senate at times this year and have been appalled by the haggard faces and the tired faces of Senators, when we got into some of our very long debates.

I wish to say to the majority leader that I hope he will tell us what his policy is going to be with respect to the general hours of the Senate. We might, for example, be very close to a yea-and-nay vote on a particular question at 7 o'clock or at 7:30, I will say to my friend, and if we should shut off debate upon the matter by an arbitrary time limit and go over until the next day, we might have to spend 3 or 4 hours on it again. I have seen the time on the Senate floor, repeatedly this year, when men were so tired and so worn out that they spent 2 or 3 hours arguing, if we can call it that, or debating, if we can call it that, over issues which men with fresh minds would have resolved in 5 minutes.

If the majority leader would say to us, "It is my intention to run from 9:30 until 7," or whatever time is decided on, since his party is of course the majority party, and his party will support him, that would be perfectly all right with me.

If the Senator would state his intentions, I am sure we would all be very happy to abide by them. I do not think unanimous consent is necessary. I shall not object. But I wish he would state his intentions so that we can all be governed by them. If I must leave to go home, then I am sure that one of my friends on the other side will give me a pair, if he possibly can. I certainly would try to give him a pair under conditions of emergency. My only point is that in this very supercharged atmosphere, I think the people of the country have a right to expect us to be here with a fresh state of mind, and in condition to perform the work we do, which I do not think can be done if we are on the floor 12, 14, and 16 hours day after day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, although I shall not object, does the request made cover only tomorrow's session?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understood the request to be that the Senate convene at 9:30 a.m. and adjourn at 7 p.m. Perhaps I misunderstood the request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I stated that the session would be from 9:30 a.m. to 7:30 p.m. I thought those hours would not inconvenience Senators greatly, and we would hope to reach some votes. I think we have wasted much time about little today, primarily because Senators do not know what is in the RECORD. I make the request so far as tomorrow is concerned. I would not want to determine now that we should suspend at an agreed hour for the rest of the week or the rest of the session. I was willing to continue until 9:30 p.m. in the evening for the rest of the time on this bill, and I announced that request, but objection was made by the minority leader. I believe the minority leader objected and said that this subject should be considered from day to day. Now we have recommendations from his side of the aisle that we do otherwise. I am perfectly willing to make a blanket request that the Senate convene at 9:30 in the morning and remain in session until 9:30 in the evening until the pending bill is disposed of. If that will comply with the suggestion that the majority leader be definite about his request, so far as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT] is concerned, I would renew that request. But my friend from Illinois still has an objection, I assume.

Mr. DIRKSEN. To the request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have stated my conviction on the subject. I believe that when the Senate has been in session until 7 o'clock, that is long enough. That is in the interest of good legislation. I do not expect the majority leader to indicate what the situation will be next week, but at least for the remainder of this week we could state the hour of adjournment to be 7 o'clock p.m., with the understanding that the session may continue, that there may be speeches, but that there be no record votes after 7 o'clock p.m.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is pretty cruel on the employees, because they must be here before we arrive, and they must remain after we leave. We do not have to be here when we are assured there are no rollcall votes. Some Senators keep their employees here pretty late. So I hope we may dispose of the the speeches and votes.

In the light of what the minority leader has said, I renew my request that the Senate meet at 9:30 in the morning, and that there be no rollcall votes after 7:30 in the evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the request of the Senator from Texas is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is expected that the Senate will remain in session late this evening. I hope it may stay here as late as 10 o'clock in an attempt to obtain votes on the bill, because there are some who believe that Senators do not want to vote on this bill or any other bills during this session. I do not share that feeling, but I do wish to show my good faith by asking the Senate to remain in session and give Senators an opportunity at least to offer amendments and vote on them if they desire to do so. I express the hope that the Senate may remain in session as late as 10 o'clock this evening and come in in the morning and vote on any amendments that are to be voted upon. Next week, if we have not concluded consideration of the bill, we can continue with our consideration of the bill.

I thank my friend from Vermont for his courtesy and his indulgence.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I hope the RECORD will indicate that we have been observing a "Prouty mourning hour." [Laughter.]

Mr. FONG. Mr. President——

Mr. PROUTY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished friend from Hawaii, without losing my right to the floor.

RECOVERY OF 300-POUND CAPSULE FROM POLAR ORBIT

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, yesterday 330 miles from Honolulu, the United States scored an international first in the space race, recovering a 300-pound capsule intact from its polar orbit.

This historic milestone in the conquest of space is real cause for rejoicing in the United States, for it marks a tremendous leap toward successful manned space flight.

On behalf of the people of Hawaii I wish to extend heartiest congratulations to the many dedicated men who, despite six earlier unsuccessful attempts to retrieve a manmade object from space, persevered until their efforts were crowned with success.

We of Hawaii are very proud of our American scientists, our engineers, our airmen and our sailors for their ability and their teamwork which demonstrated we can recover objects sent into outer space.

Last Wednesday the capsule was lofted into orbit by the Discoverer XIII satellite, where it whirled over the poles of the earth at 18,000 miles per hour. On command from earth the capsule was ejected about 200 miles over the North Pole, spinning downward in just 7 minutes to 50,000 feet, where a parachute opened to slow its descent. It required about 10 minutes to complete the parachute journey which brought the capsule within the 200 by 60 mile recovery area in the waters of the Pacific.

To appreciate the outstanding technical achievement, we must realize the very narrow tolerances within which our scientific team had to operate. A delay of only a few seconds in the separation sequence of the capsule from the satellite could have resulted in the capsule's landing outside the target area.

This space first by the United States shows we are not taking a back seat in the technological race. It should reassure the American people and it should reassure our allies and friends all over the world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point two articles appearing in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning relating to America's history-making feat.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 12, 1960]

SPACE CAPSULE EJECTED BY SATELLITE IS RETRIEVED—PICKUP POINT IS 330 MILES FROM HONOLULU

(By Stanley Hall)

VANDENBERG AIR FORCE BASE, California, Aug. 11.—The United States retrieved a manmade object from orbit today for the first time, scoring a vital beat in the international space race.

It was the up-to-now hard-luck Discoverer series—No. 13, at that—that sent the 300-pound capsule spinning back to earth from about 200 miles over the North Pole.

The capsule fell inside the 200-by-60-mile recovery area between Hawaii and Kodiak Island, but outside the reach of waiting snare-trailing C–119 cargo planes.

ONE HUNDRED MILES FROM SHIP

It fell more than 100 miles away from the closest ship—Haiti Victory, specially equipped radar recovery vessel.

A helicopter from the Haiti Victory flew to the area where the capsule fell—marked by four circling planes—and plucked it out of the water.

Navy Frogman 3c. Robert W. Carrol, of Keene, N.H., jumped from the helicopter. He attached a line to the capsule, it was hauled up, and began a shorter but more publicized trip back to the ship. The Navy said the ship would take it back to Hawaii and it would then be flown to the mainland.

The success, coming after six failures, had perhaps its most important aspect in the prestige it would offer the United States.

But technically, it meant that scientists had a workable way to get men back from space.

Also, space-medicine researchers could now look forward to being able to place specimens in space for study almost at will.

The capsule was carried aloft Wednesday in the nose of a 19-foot-long satellite, launched from this seaside base. The Thor-Agena booster arched through a fog bank and south along the coast. The second-stage Agena became the satellite, whirling over the poles of the earth at 18,000 miles an hour for 17 passes.

SENT LOOPING TO EARTH

Then, somewhere high over the North Pole, on command from the ground, the capsule was sent looping back to earth. At the speed the satellite was traveling, a miscalculation of a second would mean the capsule would go 3 miles farther than planned.

Explosive bolts and springs loosed the capsule after the satellite had tipped its nose down toward the earth at about a 30° angle. The instrument package, free from the satellite, stayed in orbit briefly, then retrorockets broke it out of orbit and it was on its historic voyage.

Before the helicopter finally picked the capsule out of the water, however, there were some bad moments among the scientists who had babied the program through a series of disappointing failures at recovery.

At the Air Force Ballistic Missile Division in Inglewood, Calif., where the program had its inception and gets its guidance, there was a tremendous cheer when radio reports were received from Hawaii.

Two small helicopters were sent out to make the recovery, guided to the scene by the four circling C–119 cargo planes.

"During the 27 hours of orbit," said an Air Force announcement, "it performed precisely as designed. The vast ground array of men and equipment which control and track the bird functioned exactly as planned also.

"The path from outer space was almost as had been planned," the announcement said.

The capsule, in the water almost 3 hours, still was sending out radio and light signals when the helicopters arrived. The capsule—about the size of an orange crate—was not damaged.

COULD CARRY ANIMALS

Filled with instruments, but capable of carrying animals into space later, the capsule was lowered by parachute for the last 50,000 feet. That part of the trip back from space before the parachute blossomed took just 7 minutes. And it took only about 10 minutes for it to complete its parachute journey.

"Three planes saw it in the air, but didn't get a chance to make a pass at it with their snare devices," a spokesman said. He added, however, that the joy at the success was not in the least diminished because the Navy recovery teams got in on the act.

Aboard the plane that saw the capsule settle into the water was Brig. Gen. Robert Greer, who normally works out of the Pentagon as assistant chief of ballistic missiles.

In the recovery team were 20 planes, 9 of the net-trailing type, the rest radar trackers—including a U–2. The now-famous spy plane was used to track the capsule at high altitudes, before the parachute was popped open by a pressure-worked switch.

The first Discoverer—there was no recovery attempt that time—was hurled into orbit March 4, 1959. Since that time, eight of the Discoverers had achieved orbit, but none ever before achieved successful ejection and recovery.

MANNED SPACE FLIGHT CLOSER, SCHRIEVER SAYS

Lt. Gen. Bernard A. Schriever, Air Force missile chief, said last night the history-making recovery of the Discoverer satellite capsule brings us considerably closer to achieving manned space flight.

He termed the feat a significant milestone in the space age and said the Air Force was set to try a life shot possibly within a month with a chimpanzee aboard.

A Navy helicopter fished the capsule from the Pacific about 300 miles northwest of Hawaii. It was blasted into space by the Discoverer XIII satellite.

Schriever, head of the Air Force's Air Research and Development Command, told a hastily called news conference shortly after the recovery that instruments in the capsule will provide valuable data on the problem of bringing an object back to earth from a vehicle in orbit.

The capsule was the first manmade object known to have successfully survived reentry from orbit.

"The techniques of recovery plus the life specimens will bring us definitely closer to success in the man-in-space program," Schriever said.

He said the "chimp shot" in the Discoverer series probably would follow one more nonlife shot.

E. A. Miller, manager of the Discoverer program for the General Electric Co., said the capsule's instruments would provide detailed information available for the first time on rocket behavior.

Miller said the instruments monitored all of the significant events of the rocket's stages.

He said it also gathered data on temperature, pressure, and deceleration problems that must be solved to achieve a manned space flight program.

"This is all significant technical information," he said. "We expect to get quite a lot of data for the first time."

Schriever said recovery was still a real tough problem but that he felt the present success will lead to a recovery rate from now on of about half the capsules ejected from satellites.

"I think our reliability will be 50 percent and it should improve rapidly," he said.

DESCRIPTION OF THE 50 STATES OF THE UNION "CONTINENTAL"

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, an editorial appearing in the New Orleans Times Picayune of August 7, entitled "Words Fail," deals with a problem of universal concern to the American people: How to describe—in one word—the 50 States of the Union now that Alaska and Hawaii have been admitted.

In our complex, contemporary society we have found it convenient to use one-word names—preferably one-syllable words—for many things. Soap, cigarettes, magazines, books, movies, television shows—the trend is decidedly toward one-word names. It is little wonder, then, that geographers are caught up in the current stream trying to find an accurate one-word description of our 50 States.

The 13 Atlantic coast Colonies that banded together to form the United States are clearly the Original States. According to the Times Pacayune, geographers have now hit upon the word "conterminous" to describe the 48 States existing prior to admission of Alaska and Hawaii. Even with the admission of Alaska, there is little problem, for this grouping, we are informed, can correctly be called continental.

But a dilemma arises now that Hawaii must be included. I could suggest that we describe the 50 States as "America," but the mapmakers and geographers and historians and reporters would just shake their heads and say, "Sorry, that's not precise enough."

The Times Picayune comes to our rescue, however, and suggests a happy solution. Pointing out that one definition of "conterminous" is "coextensive in space, time, or range," the editorial inquires:

To quibble a little, why should not Hawaii and Alaska be considered "conterminous"? Aren't they "coextensive in space and time" with their sister States in these days when Honolulu, for example, is closer to New Orleans and to the east coast than San Francisco was a few short years ago?

In three beautifully expressed sentences, the editorial proposes that—

Indeed all 50 States might be envisaged as conterminous, contiguous and even continental. For there is no longer a self-contained continent, in that no continent is "an island to itself." In the spaceman's view the earth itself is now a continent; an "island" way station in a universe of "island continents."

Mr. President, we are all indebted to the Times Picayune for its contribution to increased knowledge, understanding, and unity of America. I want to express my appreciation to that esteemed member of the Washington press corps, Mr. Paul Wooton, for his thoughtfulness in bringing this enlightening editorial to my attention.

For the benefit of all the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORDS FAIL

To designate what might have been regarded by a latecomer as the 48 "original" States, "conterminous" is now the accepted word, the National Geographic Society observes. The term has been adopted by the State Department and other Federal agencies as being more precise than "contiguous," once in vogue. Forty-nine of the States can be rounded up simply enough with the adjective "continental," all agree.

Conterminous, according to Merriam's Webster, means "having a common boundary; having the same bounds or limits; coextensive in space, time, or range; having the same ending." This authority says contiguous signifies "in actual contact; touching; also near though not in contact; neighboring; adjoining; near in succession." Clearly there is a fluidity here which scarcely admits the claim of precision in any case.

To quibble a little, why should not Hawaii and Alaska be considered "conterminous"? Aren't they "coextensive in space and time" with their sister States in these days when Honolulu, for example, is closer to New Orleans and to the east coast than San Francisco was a few short years ago?

Indeed all 50 States might be envisaged as conterminous, contiguous, and even continental. For there is no longer a self-contained continent, in that no continent is "an island to itself," etc. In the spaceman's view the earth itself is now a continent; an "island" way station in a universe of "island continents."

KHRUSHCHEV'S CHARACTERIZATION OF NIXON

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, a United Press International dispatch appearing in this morning's Washington Post quotes Soviet Premier Khrushchev as describing Vice President NIXON as a "grocery clerk."

In Hawaii where Vice President NIXON recently paid a 2-day visit, the fact that he was once a grocery clerk endeared him to everyone there.

Romantic Hawaiians were delighted that a miner's daughter had married a grocery clerk who achieved the second highest office in the United States and who is now a nominee for the highest office, the Presidency.

The success story of Dick and Pat Nixon demonstrates anew that the American concept of equal opportunity to advance is a living verity.

As for Mr. Khrushchev's calling Mr. NIXON a "fumbler," we can only conclude that the Soviet Premier has conveniently forgotten our Vice President's magnificent performance in the famous "kitchen cabinet" debate in Moscow in 1958. Vice President NIXON did not "fumble" then, but indeed carried the ball to score a touchdown for freedom and America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the Post article to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 12, 1960]

NIXON A "GROCERY CLERK," KHRUSHCHEV TELLS CURRAN

(By Ed McCarthy)

NEW YORK, August 11.—Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev was quoted by a U.S. labor leader today as describing Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON as a "fumbler" and "grocery clerk."

The National Maritime Union's president, Joseph Curran, who just concluded a 17-day tour of the Soviet Union, said Khrushchev made the remarks at a 1-hour-and-20-minute audience at the Kremlin.

"NIXON is not a politician; he is a grocery clerk," Curran reported Khrushchev as saying. At another point in the interview the Premier referred to NIXON as a "fumbler," Curran said.

The union leader said at a news conference today that he and Khrushchev also talked of Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, the Democratic presidential nominee, President Eisenhower, the collapsed Paris summit conference, the shooting down of U.S. planes by the Soviet Union, and about trade unions.

Curran said Khrushchev displayed a great deal of interest in the presidential campaign and remarked that "KENNEDY seems to make sense."

Curran met with Khrushchev on July 15, the last day of his tour with three other NMU officials at the invitation of the Sea and River Workers Union of the U.S.S.R. They returned to the United States last Friday.

REFORMATION OF PUBLIC LAND LAWS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on several occasions during this session of Congress I have attempted to bring to the attention of my colleagues the need for reformation of our public land laws. As a westerner, I am particularly conscious of this problem; however, I believe the administration and disposal of our public lands is a subject of uniform importance across the Nation.

In order that we may have a clearer picture of the progress, or lack of progress, we are making toward solving the problem of outdated public land laws, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a résumé of congressional action on bills pertaining to this subject during the past four Congresses. I think it is important to notice the status of several measures which would meet the need for land in our expanding Western States. Secretary Seaton described H.R. 7042 and its companion bill S. 1905 as the most important public lands bills now before Congress. This measure would facilitate the disposal of public lands for urban and business purposes. Both bills are pending before the Interior Committee. Also of importance are House Joint Resolution 492 and Senate Joint Resolution 130 which would provide for a general study of public land laws by a special commission. Both of these are still awaiting committee action.

Mr. President, I call these measures to the attention of this body so that we may consider their importance in the same light as the other matters which are now before us.

There being no objection, the résumé was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH CONSERVATIVES AND STATE OWNERSHIP

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD a very interesting article from the Journal of Politics, volume 19, No. 2, of May 1957, entitled "British Conservatives and State Ownership." I think this is particularly interesting at this time when we are discussing a minimum wage bill that has in it language that I feel will allow the Federal Government to penetrate more deeply into the economic system than it now does.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH CONSERVATIVES AND STATE OWNERSHIP

In theory, the British Conservative Party opposes nationalization as a principle, as a philosophy, as a policy and as a program. Conversely, the British Labor Party has consistently supported nationalization in all four contexts, although the zeal of some of its members has dimmed in recent months. It was the nationalization party throughout its long periods in opposition, notably, and with increasing force, between 1931 and 1939, and more recently, during its 6½ years in power. Nationalization in one form or another is the essential ingredient, the fundamental technique, in the establishment of state ownership and in the fulfillment of the hallowed Socialist aspiration—public control of the means of production, distribution, and exchange. However, many of the devices and precedents for Socialist action in Great Britain in 1945–51 were created by the Conservative and Conservative-dominated governments of the interwar years, more particularly after the reversion to protection through the Import Duties Act of February 1932, and the Ottawa Agreements Act of November 1932. The restraints and restrictions of a new mercantilism were no small help to the collectivist propaganda of the interwar period—the era of the retreat from liberty.

A representative example of such thinking was Mr. Harold Macmillan, now Prime Minister, a man of integrity and high intellectual caliber, who wrote in his book, "The Middle Way," published in 1938, "The Socialist remedy should * * * be accepted * * * where it is obvious that its social usefulness or where the general welfare of the economy requires that certain basic industries need now to be conducted in the light of broader social considerations than the profit motive provides." Eleven years later, at Gainsborough, on June 18, 1949, Mr. Macmillan opined, "Socialist enterprises—nationalized industries and utilities—lose money. Profits turn into losses. Outputs fall. Costs increase." And in 1933, Prof Harold Laski, a future chairman of the Labor Party National Executive, warned the nation in his work on "Democracy in Crisis" that "a Labor government would build upon the amplitude of the National Government's precedent." So, indeed, it did. That, too, was the age in which collectivist writers vied in devising means whereby their own favored variants of state ownership could be achieved constitutionally. Sir Stafford Cripps asked: "Can socialism come by constitutional means?" He replied with an emphatic "Yes." How, if policy dictated such a course, to curtail the liberty of the subject, how to supersede the rule of law by bureaucratic ordinance, how to confer upon the executive—the government of the day—powers more properly belonging to legislature or courts, how to enable the executive to arrogate to itself a monopoly of such powers—there were the lessons. Such were the lessons involved, too, in promulgating a coherent program of socialization.

Mr. Attlee, Mr. Morrison, and their colleagues were ready learners. Returned to power in 1945, the Socialist government carried through a series of nationalization measures in nine acts of Parliament within 4½ years:

Acts of Parliament within 4½ years	Royal assent	Vesting date
1. Bank of England	Feb. 14, 1946	Mar. 1, 1946
2. Civil aviation	Aug. 1, 1946	Aug. 1, 1946
3. Coal	July 12, 1946	Jan. 1, 1947
4. Cable and wireless (entrusted to post office)	Nov. 6, 1946	Do.
5. Transport	Aug. 6, 1947	Jan. 1, 1948
6. Land development rights (Town and County Planning Act)	do	July 1, 1948
7. Electricity	Aug. 13, 1947	Apr. 1, 1948
8. Gas	July 30, 1948	May 1, 1949
9. Iron and steel	Nov. 24, 1949	Feb. 15, 1951

The route had long ago been mapped. The rapid tempo of Britain's progress toward "rationalization" and the chain of authoritative wartime and prewar Reports, the Sankey Commission Minority Report on coal mining, the Royal Commission on Transport, the McGowan and Heyworth reports on electricity and gas—had prepared a mental and psychological climate kindly to Socialists and socialism. The railways and the mines had already been entrusted to the state for the duration of two world wars. Moreover, the minority Labour government's Coal Mines Act of 1930 had meanwhile provided (despite clauses on the buying and selling of quotas) that price and output regulation should maintain the existing pattern of production. "This is the endowment and entrenchment of inefficiency," Sir Herbert (now Viscount) Samuel had said on the second reading: "This is the irrationalization of the coal mines." It could be argued, and was argued, in the case of mines and railways, that the purport of post-1945 legislation was only to accord legal validity to (more or less) accomplished facts.

Let us now consider, in detail, four or five examples of postwar state ownership in practice and the representative Conservative approach to each specific issue—the Bank of England, Civil Aviation, Coal, Transport, and Iron and Steel. The first measure, the Bank of England Act, caused, curiously enough, the least acute controversy. Its main provisions can be succinctly stated as follows. First, the entire stock of the Bank of England, hitherto possessed by some 17,000 private stockholders, of whom 10,000 owned less than £500 each, was taken over by the treasury, with powers, after consultation with the Governor, to give directions to the bank. Secondly, the Court of Governors was reduced from a Deputy Governor and 24 Directors to a Deputy Governor and 16 Directors, all of whom were appointed by the Crown—that is, in practice, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Opposition to the bill was ineffective, because a great many Conservatives, and even some Liberals, took the view that, as Mr. Hugh Dalton put it, it would bring the law "into accord with the facts of the situation as they have developed."[1] Lord Pethick-Lawrence averred: "The Bank of England is already very largely a department of the Treasury, and its nationalization will not make a pennyworth of difference to the bulk of the people in this country."[2] It must be confessed, as a matter of historical objectivity, that what opposition emerged to the Bank of England nationalization was feeble and fitful. "A Conservative government," said the party's official Industrial Charter, "will not repeal the whole of the Bank of England Act, but will examine the powers of the Bank to give directives to the commercial banks."

Socialists and Conservatives could argue that civil aviation was a very different kettle of fish—all the more so because the Socialist government's Civil Aviation Act, 1946, heralded by the White Paper of December 1945,[3] embellished the wartime Conservative-dominated coalition government's white paper, "British Air Transport."[4] The latter was, very substantially, a product of Conservative wartime thinking. The Civil Aviation Act brought all regular air transport services under national ownership and control, eliminated competition, provided Government finance for the three corporations, and authorized the Minister to tell the corporations what aircraft to use—and where. A consolidating measure, amalgamating the British Overseas Airways Corporation and the British South American Airways Corporation, was carried by the Attlee Ministry against Conservative opposition in 1949. The act of 1946 had empowered the Minister to reimburse the national corporations for losses at the rate of £10 million per year for 1946–47, and 1947–48, and £8 million per year for 1948–49, and each subsequent year till 1956—a total maximum liability of £84 million over ten years. Speaking in the House of Commons on July 6, 1950, Mr. A. T. Lennox-Boyd (Conservative, Mid-Bedfordshire), presented the official Conservative attitude to this facet of the state ownership program.

"It might interest the House to hear this brief comparison of nationalized British European Airways' operating costs with what would be the operating costs of charter companies using similar aircraft on the same routes. In 1949 * * * we are told that B.E.A. flew 15½ million miles and that its revenue was £6,400,000. This shows that the revenue per aircraft mile was 8s. 3d. The corporation flew Vikings, Dakotas and Rapides. All three types of aircraft may be hired from the charter industry for less than 8s. 3d. per mile, so it is safe to say that if the whole business had been contracted out there would have been a profit. We have not had the accounts for this year, but we have them for last year, and with the same aircraft and with the same mileage, private operators claim that they would have made a profit of £472,000—instead of a loss of £2½ millions. Therefore, the Exchequer would have had £3 millions more, quite apart from the ordinary taxes for the private operators' profits. I do not claim that a single private operator could have achieved that successful result, but a series of small manageable units of some 15 to 25 aircraft could achieve results of that kind. The taxpayers of Great Britain, sorely tried now, and to be still more sorely tried by the inescapable obligations of the British Empire throughout the world, cannot afford to reject any chance of economy, coupled, as it would be, with highly efficient management."

Marked improvement in the financial and administrative structure have been achieved during the past four years, but the principles of 1946 remain strong in civil aviation. "It would be Conservative policy," proclaimed The Right Road for Britain, "to give the fullest encouragement to the orderly expansion of air transport by private enterprise for every class of load (passenger, mail, or freight), both on regular scredules services and by individual charter. It is only in this way that British mercantile aviation can match the achievements of our Merchant Navy * * *. We shall * * * review the structure of the Corporations and of the Ministry itself, so as to eliminate unnecessary functions and restore as wide a measure of private enterprise as possible."

Likewise, on the vexed question of state ownership of coal, the same authorized program adumbrated the Conservative philosophy in terms no less robust. Push back the area of monopoly to its narrowest limits, it demanded; decentralize the hierarchical structure of the central national authority, the National Coal Board; stimulate local enthusiasm by conferring real responsibility upon individual pit management; abolish the old divisional boards; establish new area boards; restrict the functions of the National Coal Board to such matters as national wage negotiations, coordinating selling prices, raising capital, and performing common services like research. In other words, realign the Socialist mosaic of 1946. It is reasonable to assume that, confronted with the atmosphere of the times, Conservatives, had they been in power immediately after the war, would have reinforced, or, at least, maintained the wartime Coal Control of the Ministry of Fuel and Power with its twelve-section regional structure. The argument would have been that, however bleak the economic and financial case for nationalization, there was a sociological case. The miners had long ago persuaded themselves of its merits. The Socialist structure had turned the eight coal-producing regions into eight divisions, each with a divisional board appointed by the National Coal Board, with each division broken into 49 areas, each with an average of 20 collieries. Such was the pilot plant for socialization in practice. The National Coal Board members were specialists, each assuming responsibility for the functions of a department, for example, production, finance, marketing, or relations with labor. In May 1948 Sir Charles Reid, a mining engineer and production director of the highest distinction, who had represented production on the National Coal Board in London since 1946, resigned from the Board, explaining that he had no faith in the structure. Eight more important resignations followed in the same year.

The Technical Advisory Committee on Coal Mining, presided over by Sir Charles Reid, had, in March 1945, already strongly urged decentralization in a passage which commanded Conservative support: "This is not an industry which can be conducted on any stereotyped plan. It is our conviction that whatever degree of integration is decided upon, and the greater the degree the more important this becomes, scope must be provided within each unit for the fullest opportunity for and encouragement of individual initiative. Without this, the full benefits of planned production and technical improvement cannot be secured."[5] On another and all-important aspect; namely, the provision in the Coal Nationalisation Act for consumer representation, "Change Is Our Ally," a new, lively, stimulating and provocative booklet by ten Conservative M.P.'s of the "One Nation" group, rightly commented: "It is significant that, in the first six years of its operation, the Domestic Coal Consumers' Council received only 300 letters. That is partly because the work—indeed the very existence—of these Councils is inadequately publicised, but more because there is a general feeling that they are impotent to protect the interests of consumers." That is, in itself, a powerful indictment which has so far attracted too little political attention, and no political action.

The two nationalized enterprises which the Conservative Government has decentralized since the general election of 1951 furnish the fairest and most illuminating examples of the Conservative approach to state ownership. First, in transport, the Railways Act (1921), was Britain's earliest essay in "rationalisation." During the next few years, the struggle between this industry and free and ever-expanding road transport accentuated, and accelerated, propaganda for nationalization. Mr. Herbert Morrison, Minister of Transport in the Labour Government of 1929–31, willingly responded by fathering the Road Transport Act of 1930, in which Part IV forbade the provision of passenger road transport except by holders of road service licenses, which the traffic commissioners could refuse, or grant, subject to certain detailed conditions. The essential feature was the grant of semi-monopolies or protection against competition in order to achieve "co-ordination of all forms of passenger transport." The London Passenger Transport Act, initiated by the Labour Government in the spring of 1931, which became law in 1933 under the Conservative-dominated National Government, consolidated and strengthened earlier measures of voluntary amalgamation already effected between the London General Omnibus Company and the underground group. It now gave legislative sanction to a 100 percent monopoly. In the same year (1933), the Conservative-dominated National Government, in its Road and Rail Traffic Act, extended to road haulage the principle of licensed semi-monopoly, which road passenger traffic had "enjoyed" since the 1930 Act. Men and women already well set up in the road haulage business were encouraged to oppose new applicants for licenses on the ground that "suitable transport facilities * * * are, or if the application were granted, would be, in excess of requirements." The project attracted the distinguished patronage of such Conservative leaders as Mr. Oliver Stanley, who expatiated upon the theme that "unless you have some system where people who provide transport do take the rough with the smooth, you will have everyone taking the smooth and no one prepared to take the rough." The next major event was the 1947 Act. The Transport Act of 1947, passed by the post-war Labour Government, presented a solution diametrically opposed to the conclusions of the Road Haulage Report presented to Parliament in 1944 by the three-party Select Committee on National Expenditure.[6] That Report had been uncompromisingly adverse to the wartime working of Government haulage control. The framework of the new Transport Act was delineated in more meticulous detail than that of the Coal Nationalisation Act of the previous year. It created the British Transport Commission, with a chairman and four to eight members to be appointed by the Minister. The Chairman and at least four other members were required to give full-time service. It further created five "public authorities known as Executives to assist the Commission in the discharge of their functions"; Railway, Docks and Inland Waterways, Road Transport, London Transport and Hotels. The Railway Executive was conceived as a triple-tiered organization, divided into regions corresponding to the old-time railway companies. Such, then, was the new structure for state ownership of transport. It is worth recalling, in passing that as many as 1,137,000 members of the public had owned the "big four" railway companies, and that, of the total railway stocks of £1,109,000, one-third represented holdings not exceeding £200.

"The Right Road for Britain," the most important Conservative Central Office policy pamphlet of the postwar years, forthwith promised the public and the road haulers that "A Conservative Government will proceed to sell back to free enterprise those sections of the road haulage industry which have been nationalised. Operators will have to obtain 'A' or 'B' licences under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933. But new entrants will have to prove that business is available and that it cannot be as cheaply and effectively handled by existing carriers of goods whether by road or rail. The limitation of distance on private road haulers will be progressively eliminated. The present freedom of 'C' licences will remain untouched." Concerning passenger road transport, it likewise added, "A conservative government will stop any further plans for nationalising omnibus and tram undertakings and wherever possible will return those already nationalised at the time of the general election to their former owners, whether local authorities or private enterprise." And, yet again, discussing the railways, it advanced the view that " 'British Railways' should be reorganised into an appropriate number of regional railway systems, each with its own pride of identity, and coordinated as to broad policy alone by a central body. The present top-heaviness due to excessive central staff should be corrected, and each railway system should be administered by its own Board of Direction, which should include a strong part-time element of persons with varied practical experience of serving public needs."

In May, 1953, the new Conservative administration's Transport bill became the law of the land. It incorporated the fundamental principle that the alternative forms of transport should be co-ordinated by consumers' choice and that its appropriate charges should be related to the cost of the selective service. That was almost revolutionary in our time. The road haulage undertaking of the British Transport Commission was to be sold to private enterprise. As railway operator, the Commission could, however, "provide, continue or develop any services or facilities for the carriage of goods by road otherwise than as a part of the operations of the existing road haulage." The Minister was further empowered to direct the Commission to abandon any controlling interest in an omnibus company which it might have acquired since inception. It could retain minority shareholdings. The Commission must henceforth secure Transport Tribunal confirmation of maximum charges. Power was also entrusted to the Tribunal to intervene if the Commission charges place coastal carriers at an undue or unfair disadvantage in the competition or are inadequate having regard to the cost of affording the service, thereby injurying the interest of coastwise shipping to the detriment of the national interest.

The main implications of the new Act concern, however, the return to competition. Three illustrations may be cited. First, transport units for disposal were not to exceed fifty vehicles without ministerial approval, and, in assembling them, the Commission was "to have regard to the desirability of securing that persons desirous of entering or reentering the road haulage industry have a reasonable opportunity of doing so notwithstanding that their resources permit them to do so only if their operations are on a small scale." Secondly, the Act made the granting of licenses under the 1933 Act a little easier. Henceforth, instead of an applicant having to prove that new service was needed, an objector would have to prove that it was not needed, and consumer interests were given specific priority over "provider" interests in such assessments. Thirdly, with the decentralization of the Railway Executive into its component parts, the railways were emancipated from the legal restrictions imposed upon them in the old monopoly days and were duly accorded legal freedom to relate charges to costs. Fourthly, road and rail transport were to be "coordinated" through the natural interplay of economic forces—perhaps, in the mid-twentieth century, an unusually radical answer.

In this context, a constructive criticism from the ten Conservative M.P.'s of the "One Nation" group in their admirably documented manifesto, "Change is Our Ally," merits full quotation:

"The Transport Act, 1953, did not exhaust the application of the principle which it enshrines. One of the avowed purposes of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, was to protect a railway system, still handicapped commercially, against unlimited competition from road transport. Now that the commercial handicaps have been removed and coordination entrusted to the user's choice, the limitations of the 1930 and 1933 Acts, so far as they are not justified on any other grounds—for example, safety—have lost their basis. The Acts need a critical overhaul.

"The same applies to London Transport Executive. This is the London Passenger Transport Board of old, swallowed whole by the Act of 1947 and swallowed again by that of 1953. Why losses incurred by London's railways should be made good by those who use its 'buses, or vice versa—has never yet been explained. Prima facie, the continued existence in London of a monopoly embracing alternative forms of transport is inconsistent with legislation designed to eliminate or prevent this in the provinces."

This is, indeed, well said. This comment almost (but not quite) crystallizes the traditional Liberal view, and it cannot be denied that the Transport Act of 1953 represents a huge advance in the forward road to economic freedom.

Iron and steel denationalization exemplifies a similar trend in mid-twentieth-century Conservative economic thinking. The fiscal revolution of 1932, the overthrow of free trade and the revival of the pre-1846 policy of protection, stimulated, in iron and steel, as in transport, a new phase of government intervention in industrial organization. Way back in 1932, "rationalisation" was the order of the day. Under the Import Duties Act, the Import Duties Advisory Committee recommended 33⅓-percent duties on iron and steel imports, contingent, of course, upon adequate "reorganisation." In June 1932, despite opposition from both the Liberal and Socialist parties, these duties were forthwith enacted. The new economic alliance between the Import Duties Advisory Committee and the British Iron and Steel Federation (1934) fixed prices, controlled competition and development, subsidized high-cost producers, administered the cartel, and secured, by a bout of tariff-skirmishing and a heavy temporary increase in duties, the concurrence of the continental cartel that iron and steel imports from cartel members should be pegged at approximately half a million tons a year. In the amusing, but amazingly naive words of the Conservative Central Office Campaign Guide of 1950, "It is important to note that the majority of criticisms relate to things which happened a long time ago, even 20 or 30 years ago. The first is that the introduction of tariffs in 1932 and the formation of the British Iron and Steel Federation in 1934 produced a radical change in the industry. The majority of Socialist arguments, therefore, clearly have no more relevance to the problems of the industry than what may have happened after the Napoleonic Wars." The "One Nation" group of Conservative M.P.'s, be it said to their credit, has taken a different, and infinitely less complacent, view. The measures of 1932 and 1934 set the stage for the Socialist offensive of 1949.

The Iron and Steel Nationalisation Act of 1949 provided that the securities of 96 firms either working 50,000 tons or more of iron ore, or producing 20,000 tons or more of pig iron, or 20,000 tons or more of ingot steel or hot rolled steel per annum, should be transferred, together with their subsidiaries, whether steel producing or not, to a new corporation, comprising a chairman and between six and ten members appointed by the Minister of Supply. The Iron and Steel Corporation thus enjoyed the powers of a holding company over its nationalized subsidiaries. It could found, or acquire an interest in, further subsidiaries. Private enterprise company names were very sensibly retained—partly no doubt because of the gains accruing to the export drive.

Iron and steel denationalization proved a more complex and intricate "unscrambling" operation for the incoming Conservative Government than had transport denationalization. First, there is, for all practical purposes, hardly any competition with iron and steel from outside the industry. This comment applies not only to the heavy sections, but indeed to the majority of iron and steel manufactures. Secondly, whereas exceedingly efficient road haulage businesses are frequently quite tiny, the vast integrated plants, with net assets ranging from £21 million to £36 million, dominate the texture of iron and steel organization. Thirdly, overseas competition is limited by the extraordinarily high iron and steel prices prevalent outside the United Kingdom, although, more recently, the prices quoted by the European Iron and Steel Community are appreciably below current British prices.

The Churchill Government's Iron and Steel Act of 1953 is not nearly as revolutionary or as libertarian in tone as its Transport Act. True, the main purport was to revive the profit motive as the tonic to efficacy and to restore to private ownership the sections nationalized, or threatened with nationalization, by the Attlee government. But it contented itself with retaining much of the Socialist administrative machinery and with forming an independent Iron and Steel Board, charged with the primary task of fixing maximum prices. To the double appeal that internal domestic restrictions must be eschewed and that the highest costs must not determine the Board's price-fixing policy, Conservatives reply, first, that "competitive conditions" are prescribed in the very terms of the Act, and, secondly, that, in any case, there is always ultimate recourse to the Monopolies and Restrictive Practices (Enquiry and Control) Act, 1948—a fair enough argument, if limited in scope. The group of Conservative M.P.'s, to which we have referred, is disposed both to question and to deplore some of the powers of the new Board. "The further powers are by no means so easy to justify," they comment in Change is Our Ally. "For example, the Iron and Steel Board, informed by the Minister of general economic or other national considerations, is enjoined to keep the productive capacity of the industry under review; to consult with the industry to secure any development required for 'the efficient, economic, and adequate supply of iron and steel products'; and to disapprove any major development schemes which would 'seriously prejudice the efficient and economic development of production facilities.' The Government are given a residual power themselves to promote any development, required in the national interest, which the industry itself is not prepared to take on." The old-time strategic argument, coupled with the "possible fluctuations in the economy" argument, are the themes most commonly invoked to justify these excessive powers. Moreover, the Board's "general duty" to supervise the supply of raw materials to the industry formed a pretext for bringing beneath its ægis the foundries—a large number of iron and steel users, who had not hitherto been nationalized, but who consumed a quarter of the industry's materials. This, too, is a very questionable procedure and as such has been challenged by Mr. Angus Maude, Conservative M.P. for Ealing South, Mr. Enoch Powell, Conservative M.P. for Wolverhampton South-West, and their colleagues. On balance, this denationalization measure represents a limited advance towards economic freedom—an advance considerably less substantial than that accomplished by the Transport Act.

Thus the modern British Conservative approach towards state ownership is strictly empirical. It is conditioned by the times and by the political pulse of the people. As befits Conservative thinking, it rejects doctrine and dogma. It interprets state ownership, in given circumstances, as only one of several solutions—if, indeed it is proven a solution. Conservatives and Liberals forthwith announced their resolute opposition to new Labour Party proposals for the "mutualisation" of life insurance and the nationalization of certain branches of the chemical industry, sugar refining, the water supply, and the wholesale meat trade. In 1950, 1951, and 1955 the British electorate called a halt to nationalization and there is no reason yet to believe that it wants further installments. In the closing days of the Orléans Monarchy, Lamartine said that France was bored. After the ever-accelerating tempo of the nationalization measures of 1946–49, Britain likewise was tired of this fifty-year old refrain, as most 1951 and 1955 general election parliamentary candidates will testify. The Socialists soon recognized the prevailing mood of the nation and transformed their agitation into a campaign for encouraging and developing competition between state enterprise and private enterprise. The formula befitted the climate.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GOLDWATER BEFORE THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION PLATFORM COMMITTEE

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks I made before the Republican platform committee in Chicago on July 19, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GOLDWATER

In recent years, the platforms of political parties have become a catchall of ambiguous phrases, designed to please everyone and offend no one. They are loosely worded in order not to bind the party to any specific course of action.

Special interest pressure groups, combined with ambitious politicians eager to purchase votes, exert tremendous influence on platform committees—and the response is usually an attempt to placate all sides.

No successful political party, even when in possession of complete control of the House, the Senate and the administration, has ever passed or attempted to pass all the legislation suggested by platform promises.

The American people have become cynically suspicious of political platforms and I am suggesting that the Republican Party, in this year of national peril, would do well to discard discredited patterns of the past.

If you will tell me what a man believes, if you will tell me those principles to which a man swears allegiance, I can predict, with reasonable accuracy, how this man will respond to any given situation. And I suggest the American people will be far more eager to place their destiny in the hands of a man who announces his beliefs and his principles than in the hands of a man who promises and promises and promises.

I am suggesting the issue which we must decide is one of freedom or slavery. The world stands divided on this issue today.

Unfortunately, the challenge is not presented in such clearly defined and recognizable terms.

There are those among us in this Nation who cherish the false notion that by accommodating the totalitarian doctrine of communism we can continue to maintain the uneasy peace we have enjoyed since the end of World War II. There are also those among us who, when confronted with the ultimate choice, appear to prefer appeasement and piecemeal surrender of the rights and freedoms of man.

To our undying national shame, there are those among us who would prefer to crawl on their bellies to Moscow rather than to face the possibility of an atomic war.

Our enemies are capitalizing on our inability or unwillingness to recognize the true implications of the cold war. Russia is determined to destroy our ideals and our ideas. And the tragedy of freedom is that so far they have been frighteningly successful.

In foreign affairs, we have moved with timidity and indecision; we have tolerated Castro's name calling and his confiscation of American property. The blood of American soldiers bought freedom for Cuba in the first place. American economic strength has supported Cuba. And I suggest it is always the nature of man who receives unearned benefits and undeserved charity to one day turn against his benefactor with a demand for more.

I am suggesting the Republican Party must determinedly maintain the most powerful military power in the world and that we must be willing to use this military power—and our economic power—to defend the rights of American citizens and to preserve American property.

I am reminding the Republican platform committee that private property and individual liberty are inseparable.

I am suggesting to the Republican platform committee that history has recorded that when a people become more concerned with their material possessions—and their sweet little luxuries—and their uneasy peace—they have inevitably fallen prey to destructive forces.

I am suggesting to the Republican Party the first responsibility of the Federal Government is to defend freedom—with all the force and power and resources at our command. I am suggesting that Russia is determined to achieve victory—that we have not been equally determined—and if Russia's ambition for world conquest will not be satisfied short of an aggressive war, then no amount of appeasement, no action short of surrender will satisfy the Russian ambition. And I am suggesting to the American people that if we truly desire to preserve freedom, we must be prepared to fight for its preservation if that eventuality becomes our last resort.

On two occasions in this century the world has been engulfed by war. Historians insist that both World War I and World War II were produced by miscalculation. They tell us that in both instances there probably would have been no general war had England, France, and America made their position clearly known to the world.

Had these three great powers said: "We desire to keep the peace; we condemn war as a method of settling international disputes, we will attempt to understand the national aspirations of other countries. But if any nation or group of nations commits or permits to be committed certain acts, we will be forced to respond."

In our very recent experience it seems obvious there would have been no Korean war had the United States and the other members of the United Nations announced to the world in advance their intention of defending the integrity of South Korea.

What I am suggesting is, in my opinion, the most certain method by which war can be avoided. If we now declare to the rest of the world that our national conscience will not permit any invasion of the Western Hemisphere by either political or military means; if we announce to the world we will not countenance any aggression by either political or military means against any free nation; and if we back up this announcement with the superior military capacity we have and are capable of providing, then I suggest our enemy—Russian communism—will not be encouraged to make any miscalculations which might involve the world in total destruction.

In domestic matters, I am reminding the members of the Republican platform committee that there is nothing new about a welfare state. History is littered with the remains of once-proud republics who destroyed themselves by overindulgence, by national acceptance of the false and destructive idea that you can get something for nothing.

The people of this Republic have not demanded Federal assistance and Federal handouts. The programs we have and the programs now being proposed are not the outgrowth of any public clamor of any demonstrable, widespread public need.

There has been no universal demand for Federal aid to education. In fact, aside from the eloquent advocates of a small minority of school administrators, most people are opposed to Federal aid to education.

There has been no widespread public demand for Federal aid to depressed areas, or Federal medical care for the aged, or Federal support for the economy.

These programs have been seized on by ambitious politicians—after they were first advanced by various minority elements who appear determined to separate and divide the American people—to set the young against the aged, to pit the farmer against the consumer, to array the union member against the nonunion member—to make success in any area the object of envy rather than admiration.

I am also reminding the Republican platform framers that in the discharge of my responsibility as chairman of the senatorial campaign committee, I have visited with Republican leaders and Republican voters in almost every State of the Union since the 1st of January, 1959.

In this connection, I have been constantly impressed by the concern of Republicans everywhere lest the Republican Party lose its identity in a mistaken effort to adopt the tactics and practices of the spend-and-spend, elect-and-elect architects of the New Deal and the Fair Deal.

In my opinion, the preservation of two strong political parties is essential to the preservation of the Republic. I am persuaded that the leaders of both parties long to keep America strong, to keep America free, to overcome misery and poverty and disease—to the end that all of our citizens may, in the future, enjoy a better life.

The difference between us is, I suggest, a difference in the methods we would follow to achieve these objectives. Those currently in control of the Democratic Party appear to have given their allegiance to the concept of the superstate, with its perniciously paternalistic Federal interference; with its dictatorial Federal planning; committed to penalizing producers by the imposition of high taxes and distributing the benefits of the production of the energetic workers to those whose lack of initiative makes them eager recipients of governmental help.

I am suggesting it is the duty of government to help men who will help themselves—that to help and support men who will not help themselves is destructive.

I am urging the Republican Party to stand on those concepts of the functions and responsibility and limitations of the Federal Government which were established on this continent with the creation of the Republic of the United States. And I would suggest that we must work our way to a better tomorrow and to a peaceful world and that our objective can never be purchased through the sacrifice of individual freedom, accompanied by deficit financing and the stifling programs of a dictated society and a dictated economy.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I am sure that all of us are very grateful to the Senator from Vermont for facilitating a morning hour which, quite unwittingly, had not come about earlier. I know that every Senator appreciates, as I do, very warmly indeed, the graciousness of the Senator from Vermont.

When the colloquy occurred involving the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and myself I had in mind making, in the morning hour, if we had one, the following statement. It is brief, and I shall now make it.

Today, S. 3829, a bill which I introduced with 11 cosponsors Wednesday to put the Republican Party platform on civil rights into legislative form, is scheduled for a second reading prior to the normal procedure of sending it to committee. Before that occurs, I wish to repeat my firm conviction that the responsibility for providing the Senate with the opportunity to consider civil rights legislation at this short session is clearly the responsibility of the majority. The responsibility for enacting civil rights legislation once it is before us is a bipartisan one.

Bipartisanship on civil rights has been absolutely essential in the past when such legislation was enacted, and has generally characterized cosponsorship of meaningful civil rights bills. Unfortunately, it has not been very evident in the last few days and although I have invited my Democratic colleagues to join me on S. 3829, none have come forward as yet. However, as I believe there will be additional opportunity for those members of the majority who have consistently supported such legislation to come forward and join forces with their Republican colleagues before we adjourn, I remain hopeful that bipartisanship may yet be attained on the essential parts of our civil rights bill, S. 3829, which qualify as unfinished business for this short session.

The majority had an opportunity on Tuesday of this week to fulfill its responsibility for bringing civil rights legislation before us when Senator DIRKSEN introduced his bill to give consideration to the two aspects of civil rights legislation which represent at the very least the unfinished business on this great issue before the Senate. With a few notable exceptions, the majority by substantially a party-line vote decided without debate to reject this opportunity, apparently on the ground that to embrace it would block passage of other legislation the majority considers "musts"—medical care for the aged, minimum wage, aid to education, housing, and mutual security, public works, and other appropriations.

Let us understand clearly what was voted on this past Tuesday. The majority not only voted to table a civil rights bill, it voted to prevent a civil rights bill from even being placed on the calendar where it could be called up on equal terms with these other "must" measures.

We must assume, therefore, that the majority considers civil rights legislation as unfinished business not entitled to an equal opportunity for consideration with the other measures. I yield to no one in my desire to get legislation at this short session on these other measures, but I also regard them as of equal priority with the unfinished business on civil rights. This is the fundamental point.

We all know, of course, that the crackdown represented by this vote to table on Tuesday was attributable to the fear that even an effort to get minimal civil rights legislation on the calendar would precipitate a filibuster. But is not this the problem: Will the majority party sitting here with a 2 to 1 majority deliver on its own civil rights pledges by controlling the length of the debate engaged in by a group of Senators in the Democratic Party who are traditionally opposed to civil rights legislation—or will it confess it cannot do so and join in a bipartisan effort with the Republicans to do so? The real danger in Tuesday's vote was that the majority rejected Republican help while showing that by itself it could only provide us with inaction on civil rights. This is the issue before the country now.

In the final analysis the showdown here will be on cloture for that is the only way, apparently, in which the unfinished business on civil rights can be dealt with on equal terms with the other major measures before us, as it deserves to be. It is my hope that in the next few weeks public sentiment will assert itself very clearly upon this issue. The lines were drawn by the vote on Tuesday; the public has now to express itself.

The majority—again, I repeat, with some notable exceptions—has made its decision and must now live with it. We will soon see what we may expect in the way of accomplished legislation on the items dubbed "must" by the majority, even though the unfinished business on civil rights has been laid aside. Apart from the question of pertinent amendments, what my 11 colleagues and I who sponsored S. 3829 are doing, therefore, is to defer a showdown to a later time, the majority having already recorded itself before the country as refusing to take up civil rights now.

I would like to quote from a lead editorial beginning on the front page of a newspaper very favorable to the Democrats, the New York Post of August 10, 1960; it bears upon the correctness of the decision that the unfinished business in civil rights should not be ranked in importance with the "must" measures I have mentioned, which up to now is the position of the majority and it bears upon the charge of "politics" which is made in an attempt to intimidate people like myself:

> In both domestic and worldwide terms, civil rights has become the great theme of the decade. What KENNEDY did in the Senate yesterday (while Mr. NIXON sat back triumphantly) will be observed with dismay on a front far beyond Capitol Hill. Nor are we impressed by the claim that all other legislation would have been doomed if KENNEDY and JOHNSON had challenged NIXON to join them in an all-out drive for the rights proposal. The issue could have been drawn quickly and decisively.

To that I add that I hope and expect it will be.

We wish to serve notice on the majority as to our intentions. We point out that we are free to introduce a bill on civil rights at any subsequent time during this session and to move that the committee report by a day certain or that we may seek to put such a bill directly on the Senate Calendar. Also, we have the right to introduce any part of this measure as an amendment to other legislation, to move to discharge the committee from further consideration of the matter and to make any other steps which seem to us advisable in the endeavor to get the unfinished business on civil rights completed before this short session is ended.

Right now we believe the record is quite clear, and we are prepared to stand aside for a short while to see how these other "must" measures get along, and not raise any question which may be charged as being interference with those measures.

A STUDY OF POLICIES TO REDUCE THE DANGER OF ACCIDENTAL WAR IN THE 1960'S

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a competent group of scholars at Ohio State University have made a painstaking study of what policies we can adopt to reduce the possibilities of accidental war.

The possibility of accidental war in the nuclear age is serious and, of course, fantastically dangerous. Surprisingly little study has been made of just what we can do about it.

In a Mershon national security paper, this Ohio State University group of scholars have published a condensed version of a 5 month study of this problem—including recommendations as well as analysis. I ask unanimous consent that this condensed study be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACCIDENTAL WAR: SOME DANGERS IN THE 1960'S

(By David E. Cummins, Donald S. Edgecombe, Ralph B. Hoffman, Dean S. Lucal, Patricia Rosenberg, Robert F. Rowntree, Jon Mikal Townsley, V. Van Volk, John B. Phelps)

(NOTE.—This is a Mershon national security program research paper. These papers are intended to make available in a convenient form and to a variety of readers the results of research, study, or reflection carried on by persons associated with the Mershon program at the Ohio State University. Unless noted otherwise, these should be considered working papers, subject to modification, expansion, and even withdrawal, and their results are normally published elsewhere in a later and more final form. Research papers may vary widely in content and format, and responsibility for these matters rests entirely with the authors.)

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

This paper summarizes the results of a study of the problem of accidental war in the next decade. The study has involved approximately 5 months of work, under my official but very informal guidance, by the members of a research seminar in the Mershon national security program. Our complete study of about 25,000 words may be published later, but we have decided to prepare this condensed version now as a Mershon program research paper. We follow exactly the outline of our longer study but we are obliged in this paper to present our main points with a minimum of supporting detail.

It is hard to think of a scholarly task with greater inherent difficulties than the one we have undertaken here. We are conscious of the limitations of our study. Yet we know of no effort to systematically examine and bring into the range of public discussion the problem of accidental war, in relation to the likely political and military-technological outlook of the next 10 years. We believe that accidental war is a serious problem and that it is a manageable if very difficult problem for concentrated study. We believe that particular attention paid to it now will bring out some major dangers which have gone relatively unnoticed in our traditional approach to national security and may suggest some surprisingly practical means of enhancing security for us and the rest of the world. We hope that this study may contribute in some small degree to a clearer recognition of the dangers of accidental war and the need to do something about them.

JOHN B. PHELPS.

1. INTRODUCTION

Our aim in this paper is to consider the possibility that a major accidental war may occur at some time in the next 10 years, "accidental war" as we use it here is equivalent to "war by miscalculation," and "unintentional war." A formal definition is not required; the question of transcendent practical interest is the likelihood that a large-scale nuclear war between East and West may, through some combination of circumstances, come about without the intention of either side to launch such a war. We limit our consideration to the next 10 years because this now seems to be the critical time period and because predictions further into the future become too speculative.

Many wars in history have been more or less accidental. But the destructive power of modern weapons and the extraordinary compression of military time that goes with them bring to the question of accidental war a new and potentially terrifying significance.

There seems to be a widespread but seldom clearly articulated belief that any large-scale nuclear war in the next decade will be really accidental. The reasoning is that each side would prefer to develop economically without launching a war at great risk and for uncertain gains, and that some form of coexistence is mutually desired. But in the absence of effective arms controls, world leaders seem to regard nuclear weapons as the arbiter of an uneasy peace.

The likelihood of an accidental war depends on the level of international tension and on the strategic posture of each side. In recent months there has been increasingly sophisticated discussion of the requirements of stable deterence. Relatively invulnerable forces are militarily desirable. A retaliatory deterrent must be credible, i.e., the enemy must know it not only could but would be used against him if he attacked. The notion of a "preemptive strike," to prevent destruction of one's own vulnerable forces, has received some attention in military writing and congressional testimony. But, almost without exception, the analyses of deterrence take for granted good military intelligence and rational (if cold-blooded) decisionmaking on each side. The only kind of accident ordinarily mentioned—and then not very conspicuously—is a preemptive strike resulting from faulty intelligence warnings. There is no allowance for international tensions, collective anxieties and frustrations, and the predispositions of individual leaders. Accidents—the unforeseen and unpredictable, the irrational—do not lend themselves to precise analyses, but we believe that they must be taken much more seriously and explicitly into account in our planning for military security.

In our study we approach the problem of accidental war in three ways:

1. through history, to see what insights and lessons may be applied to the special problems of the 1960's.

2. through prevailing (if unpublished) thinking on the subject, as reflected in the views of presumably knowledgeable persons.

3. through an effort to analyze in some detail various possible types of accidents which might occur in the 1960's and the manner in which they could precipitate an accidental war.

In our judgment the third approach is by far the most productive, and this makes up the larger part of our study.

The next two sections, following this introduction, outline some observations from history and summarize our survey of informed opinion. We then proceed to review several kinds of accidents which could lead to war. Our breakdown of types of accidents is arbitrary, but, we believe, a reasonable means of analyzing the dangers of the next decade. In the last two sections of this paper we discuss the influence of international tension and readiness for war in relation to the various possible kinds of accidents, and we present some conclusions.

2. ACCIDENTAL WAR IN HISTORY

Most wars in history were in some degree accidental; just how accidental they were is a question upon which historians disagree. It is particularly difficult to distinguish accidents, as we are concerned with them here, from the manifold mistakes of military and political judgment which seem so clear in the hindsight of history. Nevertheless, there are some insights from the past which are useful in our study of the 1960's.

Tension which existed before the start of hostilities played an essential part in igniting most wars. This tension provided the momentum for war once an accident or incident occurred, as in World War I and the Franco-Prussian War. The importance of tension is revealed in situations where the avowed casus belli was removed before hostilities began, yet pressures for war made it inevitable. This was the case when Serbia gave a seemingly satisfactory and conciliatory reply to Austria's ultimatum, but World War I still broke out. Similarly, in 1898 Spain finally acceded to American demands regarding Cuba, yet the pressure for war in this country, raised to fever pitch by the sinking of the Maine, was irresistible.

There are also cases in which provocation for war existed and yet war was avoided because tension was relatively low or the national temper less belligerent. Thus the Japanese bombed the gunboat Panay and strafed its survivors in 1937. The sinking of the Lusitania failed to bring the United States into World War I. And there are numerous examples of treaty violation and overt aggression—Hitler's occupation of the Rhineland and Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia, for instance—which failed to bring war because nations were conspicuously unready for war and determined to pursue peace.

Many wars in the past have resulted from military and diplomatic miscalculations. But it is difficult to find parallels for the kinds of military systems accidents which we discuss in section 4A below. The disastrous charge of the famed British light brigade in the Crimean War resulted from a misinterpreted order. The sinking of the Maine in Havana Harbor may have been a genuine accident.

Human aberrations, too, have played their part in history. Hitler is a notable example from recent history. Napoleon's apparent belief in the invincibility of his armies certainly contributed to their ultimate defeat. And in a few cases misguided patriotism on the part of enthusiastic junior officers has led to military disasters.

It is clear that nuclear weapons and their delivery systems bring a new and frightening cause of accidental war into the realm of possibility. For this particular danger history gives us little guidance. The principal lessons of history seem to be (1) that human aberrations do occur in critical positions, and (2) that accidents lead to wars when international tensions are high enough or when either side needs only an excuse for war.

3. PREVAILING OPINION ON ACCIDENTAL WAR

In an effort to survey the opinions of presumably knowledgeable persons on the dangers of accidental war in the 1960's, we sent letters of inquiry to members of the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees, the House Foreign Affairs and Armed Services Committees, the "Gaither Panel," the "military Rockefeller Panel"; and a small number of other selected persons. We asked for general comments on accidental war and on the relative seriousness and likelihood of the five types of accident we discuss in the next section.

The replies we received showed great diversity in approach to the problem of accidental war, as well as in their ranking of the seriousness of the five categories. Some indicated great concern with the probability of accidental war occurring if higher and higher levels of armament are pursued by both the Communist and the Western nations. Others expressed a belief that no general nuclear war is possible so long as the United States maintains a strong deterrent force. Several felt that the danger of each of the five types of accident is of equal importance, either because all five are very great dangers or because all are possibilities.

Of those who did rank the accidents in order of seriousness, the majority ranked the spread of limited war as the most serious danger. Several replies considered this cause as by far the most important, with the others either related to it or so improbable as not to merit ranking. Diplomatic miscalculation ran a close second. Several ranked this first, one or two by a wide margin. Others felt that this category and limited war are intimately related in that any limited war would probably be caused by a miscalculation. One senior military analyst rated the joint probability of war from these two at 50 percent in the next 10 years. This emphasis on the danger of the spread of limited war contrasts with several other replies which indicated a feeling that no general war was possible and that small wars only would take place in the next 10 years, but did not consider the possibility of their spreading unintentionally. Catalytic war was ranked by the majority as the least likely to occur, and several felt that it does not merit serious consideration. Some respondents felt that it is unlikely except as a consequence of limited war. Systems accidents and human aberrations were considered, on the whole, as less serious than the spread of limited war or diplomatic miscalculation.

An educator expressed the view that, while the spread of limited war is the greatest risk, it is also the area in which "resourceful, determined statesmanship could be most effective in preventing the risk from arising." One person did not attempt to rank the five categories but guessed that it would be almost impossible to contain limited wars. A Congressman felt that, although the spread of limited wars is now the most dangerous potential cause, if there is a further dispersal of nuclear weapons the danger will be shifted to the multiplied number of possible defense systems accidents. It was implicit in some replies, particularly many from Congressmen, that the danger of accident was conceived of as lying with Soviet error, miscalculation, or aberration, and that such danger was not present on this side of the fence. Others seemed to regard the danger as existing in both power blocs.

4. SOME SPECIFIC DANGERS IN THE 1960'S

Speculation on the various kinds of accidents which could conceivably lead to a nuclear war in the 1960's yields an enormous range of possibilities. In our attempt to analyze these possibilities in a systematic way we distinguish five broad accident categories and try to examine each individually. Our categories are necessarily somewhat arbitrary, but we manage to include almost all of the types of accidents which occurred or were suggested to us. Our five categories, which we discuss in this section, are:

1. Defense systems accidents: False radar signals, accidental nuclear explosions, misunderstood or miscommunicated military orders, faulty intelligence warnings leading to preemptive attack, etc.

2. Human aberrations: The aberrant bomber or missile commander (e.g., Khrushchev's famous madman), willfully irresponsible or deranged leadership, possible forms of sabotage by friendly personnel, etc.

3. Unintended spread of limited wars.

4. Catalytic war: Involving a plot by one or more nations, perhaps with nuclear weapons, to precipitate a war between other nations, each of which might have poised retaliatory forces.

5. Diplomatic and military miscalculations: Mistakes in "brinkmanship," failure to foresee the consequences of military actions, etc.

Our first category includes mainly technical mishaps and ordinary human mistakes. We discuss accidental nuclear explosions separately, since these have been a question of special popular concern. Our categories 3 and 5 overlap more than the others. In 3 we analyze the circumstances in which limited wars might or might not spread; in 5, rather than speculate on the enormous variety of possible miscalculations, we examine several postwar crises with an eye to their possible recurrence and seriousness in the future.

A. Defense systems accidents

Accidents of this type are almost entirely a consequence of modern weapons and their associated technology. Our concern is with the possibility that at some time in the 1960's a large nuclear attack might be launched as a result of a technical mishap or a simple human mistake. The asymmetry of information compels us to focus our attention on U.S. and Western forces and apply a kind of correction factor to allow for the Communist nations.

Accidents may occur at any point in the processes of (1) information gathering, (2) information evaluation and decisionmaking, and (3) the launching or near-launching of weapons carriers. Warning of an attack in progress will come from radar systems and, as developments progress in the 1960's, from the ballistic missile early warning system (BMEWS) and the Midas early warning satellite. Warning of an impending attack will come largely through intelligence activities. In principle, and as far as possible in practice, the ultimate responsibility for information evaluation and decisionmaking rests with the President. A great deal of auxiliary machinery exists to advise him and in some cases to save time in implementing decisions he may reach. Some timesaving, more or less precautionary steps, such as the launching of bombers under positive control, may be taken on the authority of lesser commanders. Retaliatory forces in the 1960's will almost certainly consist of manned bombers with a rapidly growing proportion of first and then second and third generation missiles.

It is of interest to consider some of the incidents which have occurred in the U.S. strategic machinery to date and some kinds of possible accidents which might be hypothesized. Unclassified information is of course limited, but we have tried to survey published materials, and congressional hearings are a notably useful source. Precautionary measures have been taken in SAC as a result of ambiguous warnings on many occasions. Nuclear weapons have been involved in about 10 major accidents (see below) but there have been no nuclear explosions. One operational ICBM blew up on its launching pad. Antiaircraft missiles have misfired several times and have been accidentally launched at least twice. False radar warnings, including an apparent flight of bombers moving over the Atlantic at 2,000 miles per hour, have occurred frequently. There have been many test alerts of U.S. retaliatory machinery. On the Communist side of the fence very little is known, but Premier Khrushchev is reliably reported to have told Vice President NIXON about an erratic Soviet missile which was destroyed by a signal from the ground as it headed toward Alaska.

Many kinds of possible systems accidents have been suggested, sometimes, we believe, without much technical basis in fact. Neither a flock of geese nor a shower of meteors is likely now to trigger U.S. retaliation with manned bombers.

Similar dangers are certainly increased, however, as we move more firmly into the missile age and warning times become shorter, particularly if our retaliatory forces are vulnerable. The technical development of our overall machinery of retaliation in the next decade presents some major problems with respect to safety and the avoidance of potentially dangerous accidents. More sensitive radars are more likely to give spurious signals. Faster reaction times will require less human decisionmaking and a greater dependence on automation. Computers may be required to discriminate reliably between missiles and meteors in a few minutes at most. Increasingly reliable unjammable and rapid means of communication must be built. It is clear that the President has already been obliged to delegate, in fact if not in principle, some of his ultimate authority to order the use of nuclear weapons, first for defensive purposes, and second for retaliation. He will be forced to delegate more. The present positive control of airborne SAC bombers has no parallel in ballistic missiles. Operational missile warheads are not armed until ready for firing, but the missiles do not have effective "destruct" systems which would allow them to be destroyed in flight.

Communist and Western defense systems may be expected to follow the same very general course of development, although technical, emphases and operational systems will differ. There is strong evidence, from air safety records for instance, to suggest that Communist systems will be somewhat less sophisticated insofar as technical safeguards against accidents are concerned. There is also a question about how much responsibility is delegated to Communist commanders. Thus Premier Khrushchev recently implied that Marshal Malinovsky or others could order an attack on U–2 bases.

B. Accidental nuclear explosions

In examining the question of accidental nuclear explosions we are particularly handicapped by the lack of unclassified information. But some insights may be gained by (1) collecting data on nuclear accidents (although no weapons accidents have resulted in a yield of nuclear energy), and by (2) attempting some order-of-magnitude calculations on the probability of an accidental nuclear explosion. A nuclear explosion involves bringing together, under exactly the right physical conditions and in a time period measured in millionths of a second, a minimum quantity of fissionable material such as uranium 235 or plutonium.

Data are available on accidents in the nuclear energy industry. Two or three major reactor accidents have occurred which involved a temporarily uncontrolled but nonexplosive release of nuclear energy. About half a dozen persons, here and abroad, have received lethal radiation doses and a larger number have received sublethal doses. Two of these deaths occurred in the process of weapons-oriented experimentation. But except for the common basic physics involved, nuclear industrial accidents bear little relation to the problem of the accidental explosion of a nuclear weapon.

Approximately a dozen major incidents or accidents involving U.S. nuclear weapons are known or reliably believed to have occurred, mostly in plane crashes. Two of these "broken arrows," to use the unclassified Air Force code word for an accident involving a nuclear weapon, were overseas, one in England and the other in North Africa. On two occasions, one confirmed by the Air Force, nuclear weapons or parts of them are believed to have been jettisoned in emergencies over water by planes in flight. On one occasion, in North Carolina, a nuclear weapon was accidentally dropped by a B–47 in flight with a chemical explosion on impact. Four other "broken arrows" have occurred in plane crashes in Texas, Louisiana, New Mexico, and Kentucky. A nuclear-armed B–47 exploded on the ground at a Louisiana base. Most recently, a Bomarc antiaircraft missile with a nuclear warhead burned at a New Jersey base. In many of these incidents a localized radiation hazard has existed briefly and measures have been taken to seal off and decontaminate the area affected. Many lesser accidents involved in the maintenance, transportation, modernization, etc., of actual nuclear weapons are known to have occurred. One informed estimate places the number of these at about 50, for U.S. weapons since World War II.

The fact that, in a sizable number of accidents, no nuclear explosions have resulted indicates that, to date, U.S. nuclear weapons have effective built-in safety features. Some of these features have been proved in Nevada weapons tests. A consideration of the physical conditions which must exist for a nuclear explosion to occur suggests a variety of electrical and mechanical safeguards, and many of these are presumably incorporated into U.S. nuclear weapons. SAC crews are thoroughly trained in handling their weapons and in the sequence of steps in the arming process. For weapons carried in bombers and manually armed in flight, a maximum number of safeguards is possible. But for weapons inaccessible in flight, in missiles such as Atlas or Minuteman or externally carried by aircraft (such as Hound Dog), arming must be accomplished automatically or electrically, and more difficult safety problems are clearly presented.

Some semiofficial estimates place the probability of explosion of a single weapon under stress, as in a crash or maintenance mishap, in the 1 in 1 million to 1 in 1 billion range. Our own order of magnitude judgment suggests that 1 in 100,000 would be a more realistic average value for different kinds of weapons. Making some reasonable assumptions about the number of weapons (10,000, for the United States), the miles traveled by the average weapons in 10 years, the crash rate of weapons carriers, the frequency of significant maintenance operations, etc., we are led to the conclusion that the chances are of the order of 1 in 100 that a U.S. nuclear weapon will explode at some time in the next 10 years. This extremely approximate estimate is for essentially mechanical malfunctions only; we make no attempt to quantify the various possibilities of human error. Nor do we have any basis for quantitative speculation on the likelihood of explosion of the nuclear weapons of other countries. Probably the Communist nations, including China, are and will be less safety-conscious than the United States, and the spread of nuclear weapons to more countries in the next decade certainly compounds the problem.

There will probably be, in all the nuclear countries, great pressure for the development of lighter, smaller and more novel weapon designs. Provision must be made for arming weapons by remote control. Various technical compromises between military reliability and safety will have to be made. For these reasons, experience with manned bomber-carried weapons to date is not an infallible guide to the future. Considering all these factors, we are led to the very general conclusion that the accidental explosion of one or more nuclear weapons in the next 10 years is not improbable.

Would an accidental nuclear explosion start a war? Possibly, but probably not, unless it occurred in a time of extreme tension as discussed in section 5 below. Or unless it happened to destroy an important city or military target or there were reasons to believe that it was really an enemy weapon. An accidental explosion probably would not result in the full design energy yield of the weapon and it might therefore be relatively less destructive. Several accidental explosions in a short time period could have serious consequences, but the probability of these happening coincidentally is infinitesimal. In sum, it appears that accidental nuclear explosions are among the least likely direct causes of accidental war.

C. Human aberrations

The carefully planned and elaborate safety devices built into U.S. weapons systems are designed to minimize the probability of serious accidents resulting from human error or inadvertence. What about the possibility that a person, in some position of responsibility in a man-machine system and suffering from some form of mental aberration, could intentionally bring about a significant act of war? Our concern here includes not only persons with formal responsibility, such as missile or aircraft commanders, but also persons of any rank or status who might be capable of causing serious mischief.

History furnishes numerous examples of failures and incompetence among military commanders—there are a few clear cases of military misadventures undertaken without authorization. But because mental illness has only very recently been recognized as a distinct medical problem, the historical data are of limited value. And modern weapons have enormously multiplied the capacity for mischief that may rest, at least temporarily, with an individual.

Although the dividing line is not sharp, human breakdowns can usefully be analyzed into those occurring at (1) the command level, and (2) the operational level of our defense systems. In World War II a number of U.S. general officers were relieved of their responsibilities for cause although the exact numbers are hard to establish. At the highest command level stands the tragic example of Adolf Hitler, who manifested increasingly obvious signs of mental illness as the war progressed. At low levels, promotion neurosis was a recognized psychiatric phenomenon in which, for instance, a competent sergeant suddenly commissioned a lieutenant would develop partially incapacitating anxieties. Whether an aberrant commander can compel his subordinates to carry out a suspect order seems to depend on various circumstances, but a great deal of evidence suggests that in many cases he can.

Modern weapons have brought a great downward diffusion of effective, if not theoretical, responsibility for great destructive power to thousands of persons. Some World War II data on the general incidence of mental breakdown in the military services are pertinent, if not conclusive, for the circumstances of particular concern in the 1960's. In the U.S. forces 43 percent of all medical discharges were for neuropsychiatric causes. A large proportion of these discharges—40 percent in a similar Royal Air Force study—occurred before operational or combat experience. In the RAF there was no evidence of predisposition to mental breakdown in 32 percent of all cases.

Of 12 psychiatrists with military experience whose opinions we sought, 10 believed that the problem of human aberrations in relation to modern weapons systems was serious enough to warrant extensive consideration. There was general agreement that no existing tests will reliably screen out individuals susceptible to mental breakdowns. The range of potentially serious psychological problems is extremely wide. The possibly harmful effects of great responsibility, maintained over long time periods in an essentially passive peacetime (or cold wartime) role, are nearly impossible to predict. The limited official information we were able to obtain indicates that the main qualifications of, say, SAC bomber and missile crews are high performance ratings and, although these ratings certainly involve a number of psychological factors, essentially no specific psychological screening is now used.

On a statistical basis and over a period of years, the probability of a few breakdowns in positions of great responsibility is high. Some efforts have been made to build safeguards against human aberration into weapons systems. Thus Air Force regulations require that the signal to an airborne bomber to proceed to its target must be verified by the officer members of the crew. A further measure of control is exercised over the refueling plane if one is required and, in extreme cases, an errant bomber can be destroyed by other planes in its flight if this is possible. It is also known, for instance, that present plans for the Polaris weapons system provide for verification of the command to launch missiles by several members of the crew. Undoubtedly other safeguards in U.S. weapons systems exist but have not been made public. There inevitably remain, however, situations in which individuals, such as the pilot of a nuclear armed fighter-bomber, are largely free of safeguards. There are a few people in very special positions—Francis Powers is an example—who are subject to a minimum of restraints. It should be noted that the possibilities for trouble-making by an aberrant individual are by no means limited to the delivery of nuclear weapons. Thus a U–2 ground crewman, for instance, would have been in a position to sabotage Powers' flight.

Essentially no data are available on human breakdowns and safeguards to minimize their consequences in the Communist armed forces. There are probably fewer specific allowances made for mental illnesses than in the Western nations. The distribution and regulation of critical responsibilities among individuals may be similar in practice although quite different in principle. Reports from defectors to the West indicate that Communist pilots, for instance, are under relatively strict orders to shoot down their errant comrades.

The dangers of accidental war resulting from some form of human aberration in the next 10 years are nearly impossible to quantify. But the range of possibilities is very large and, at least in comparison with technical accidents, safeguards are harder to devise.

D. Unintended spread of limited wars

The unintended spread of less-than-general, limited war into a general war including a massive nuclear exchange is viewed by many observers as the most likely origin of an accidental war in the next decade. The reason for this belief doubtless arises from the near certainty of the occurrence of military conflicts between the two opposing world power blocs, and thus, to a greater or lesser extent, between the major nuclear powers.

One of the prominent uncertainties in an analysis of possible future wars is the role of nuclear weapons. These weapons are probably historically unique in that, while they are completely untried (except as destroyers of cities) in warfare, the professional military planners, apparently somewhat more on the American side than on the Russian, are becoming more and more dependent on them in future strategies for limited as well as general war.

This is particularly important in Europe where NATO is essentially committed to meeting any kind of attack with U.S. nuclear weapons. This fact, together with the Russians' apparent lack of acceptance of the idea of a nuclear limited war and the destruction such a war would cause throughout Europe, makes very unlikely a limited war in Europe without a simultaneous U.S.-U.S.S.R. nuclear exchange. Indeed, any kind of armed conflict on a major scale in Europe which is not rapidly brought under control would probably trigger a general nuclear war.

In Asia and the Middle East, however, limited wars are more likely to stay limited as they have in the recent past. In these areas wars are more likely to be fought by proxies rather than by the great powers themselves. We will probably continue to see struggles between satellites and client states of the two power blocs, revolutions involving strong support of the rebels by a neighboring state, and violent internal rebellions. In most of these cases the major nuclear powers will only be involved to the extent of providing the material means to maintain the conflict and, possibly, specialized manpower such as pilots and submarines. Occasionally a major power may be involved directly on one side or the other as the United States was in Korea, but the conflict would probably remain limited if the other major power stayed out. In general, the use of proxies will assist in keeping a conflict limited, since they will not usually possess the means, particularly nuclear weapons, of spreading the conflict. But this argument may be less valid in the later sixties.

We can pick out several factors which will help to determine whether a limited conflict will spread. It is essential that communications be kept open between the combatants, or at least between their great power supporters, so that no action by one side will be interpreted by the other as requiring an expansion of the conflict. The costs of the struggle must not be allowed to get so high for either side—in terms of geography, military losses, physical destruction, political and economic factors, etc.—that it would be impossible to negotiate some kind of settlement rather than face an expansion of the war. This will require some changes in the traditional goals or end points of wars—"unconditional surrender," "punishment of the aggressor," etc.—as well as some modification of the traditional military doctrine of attempting primarily to destroy the enemy military forces. It will also be helpful to end or at least stabilize, in terms of geography and force, the military portions of the struggle as soon as possible (preferably before they begin).

It is well to note carefully the difficulties the use of nuclear weapons adds to keeping a conflict limited. The distinction between the use and nonuse of such arms is qualitatively clearer and surer than that between various weapon yields and/or targets—the main criterion of limitation sometimes postulated by proponents of a nuclear limited war strategy. In addition, their great destructiveness and the lack of knowledge of their overall effects in war adds to the uncertainties attached to any use of nuclear weapons. Finally, the use of nuclear weapons by one side in a limited war would doubtless require the other side to do likewise. This would, in turn, probably bring the two major nuclear powers more actively into the struggle, with the consequent increased likelihood of the war spreading.

If one of the major nuclear powers does become involved in a limited war, it may or may not have the means for fighting the war with conventional forces. A starving of conventional capabilities may thus tend to force the use of nuclear weapons, with all their hazards, in a limited war.

Our discussion has tacitly assumed the current distribution of nuclear weapons among nations. As these weapons become more widely diffused the problems of limitation of war become correspondingly great, since more nations will have the means of spreading the conflict and/or bringing in the major powers. This problem is especially disturbing with respect to Communist China, since the Chinese rulers are on record as believing that a general nuclear war would be less disastrous for China than for its enemies.

E. Catalytic war

The danger of catalytic war results very largely from the spread of nuclear weapons to a larger number of countries. It is possible that a small nuclear power could, in the right circumstances, launch a successful, unidentified, sneak attack on one or more of the major powers and thus precipitate a massive nuclear exchange between them. Viewed in the context of the historical behavior of nations, the likelihood that a nation would be strongly motivated to undertake such an attack seems small. Concealment of the source of the attack would be, at least in many cases, difficult.

A kind of general war catalyst which could become significant as more countries acquire nuclear weapons is that in which one of the small power participants in a limited war deliberately undertakes to cause a spreading of the conflict, by either an initial use of nuclear weapons or by their use in a deliberately provocative way. Red China seems to represent a particular danger.

F. Diplomatic and military miscalculations

East-West tensions have fluctuated in the years since World War II, but there has been a trend for periods of tension to occur more frequently during the last 5 to 10 years. In a time of tension in the next decade, nuclear war could result from intelligence blunders or miscalculated high-level decisions. It may not be practical to try to predict situations or mishaps which might occur, but it is at least instructive to review some crises of the past and to see to what extent the dangers which existed might have led, through some form of miscalculation, to disaster.

In 1953, the Korean war may have come near to being expanded when the United States threatened to bomb air fields across the Yalu River and use tactical nuclear weapons if the war continued. While truce negotiations were going on, South Korean troops broke into prisoner-of-war compounds and released North Korean prisoners. The Chinese did not choose to resume hostilities over this incident, probably partly because they knew they could not win an expanded war.

In April of 1954, when the United States made known its offer of aerial support for the embattled French troops in Indochina, Britain was not in favor of the proposal and the planes were not sent. Such an offer of assistance to an ally fighting a colonial war is more unlikely today, but, should it take place, it might be even more at the risk of direct Russian or Chinese intervention, possibly with "volunteers" and nuclear weapons. The Suez crisis in November of 1956 was a particularly dangerous situation. The Israeli-Egyptian fighting on the Sinai Peninsula; the British-French invasion of the Suez area with the Russian ultimatum to withdraw or face strategic rocket attacks; and the Hungarian Revolution combined to increase world tension to a dangerous level. When intelligence reports of Soviet troop movements and unusual air activity over Turkey were received in Washington, the President was called back from Gettysburg and a special meeting of top security advisers was called. Fortunately, it was soon learned that the Soviet movements were not direct threats in the Middle Eastern situation, and U.S. forces were only partially alerted. But if the unusual activity had not been identified and U.S. forces had been fully alerted, a Russian alert would probably have followed, further increasing the danger of the situation.

Again in the Middle East in 1958, when American marines landed in Lebanon, British paratroopers landed in Jordan, U.S. Army troops with nuclear weapons were sent to Turkish air bases, and other U.S. Armed Forces, including SAC, were alerted, the U.S.S.R. made another, though milder, threat to the Western nations. Soviet forces began maneuvers at key points along the Soviet borders adjoining Turkey and Iran. United States and British diplomats and military leaders felt that Russian reprisal was unlikely, but, with several countries' forces poised within fighting distance and alerted for an emergency, any accident or miscalculation could have triggered war with Russia.

Taiwan and West Berlin have been scenes of crisis in the past and are likely to be in the future. If the United States came to the Nationalists' aid again in defense of the offshore islands, chances of war would probably be greater than they were in 1954 and 1958, as China grows stronger and especially when she develops her own nuclear weapons. Defense of the islands, and even of Formosa, will become militarily difficult against even short-range missiles with nuclear warheads. Similarly in Germany, if control of the access routes to West Berlin are turned over to East Germany as Russia threatens, some form of limited war could well result, and with the West committed to the use of nuclear weapons the situation would be dangerous. Attack on a Western airlift into Berlin might also mean expanded war. Because leaders on both sides of the Iron Curtain seem to recognize the danger of any war in Europe and because Russia does and will continue to have control over East Germany, the danger here will probably be less than that in the Taiwan Straits when China develops her own weapons.

The recent U–2 incident shows how a state of tension can arise suddenly during a period of relative calm. Soviet threats of retaliation against U–2 bases if further flights are attempted and U.S. slowness in announcing that the flights had been stopped set up an atmosphere of threat and counterthreat.

In each of these postwar crisis situations either the United States or the U.S.S.R. threatened some kind of forceful action and each took some kind of measures to carry out, or react against, the threat. In each crisis forces were more or less poised for action, and a miscalculation or accident could have touched off a war.

5. INTERNATIONAL TENSION AND READINESS FOR WAR

In the preceding section we have briefly discussed several types of accidents which could lead to war in the next 10 years. Whether any of these accidents, by themselves or in combination, would lead to war depends very much on the state of tension or readiness for war which exists when the accident happens. This is one of the principal conclusions from our historical survey of the causes of war. And it is a conclusion which, because of the nature of modern weapons and strategic balances, seems likely to apply during most of the 1960's.

There is at least one important difference between the historical situations and the 1960's: It is less likely that a modern nation can be propelled directly into a nuclear war by the temper of its people. American bellicosity toward Spain in 1898 would not have led to war if both sides had had nuclear weapons. Public opinion may stimulate a government to action, but it may also effectively preclude certain actions if the likely consequences of those actions are too serious. (Red China is a possible, troublesome exception to this generalization because public opinion is probably fairly manipulable and its restraining influence may be minimal.) Internal pressures, of the sort that Premier Khrushchev hinted may have resulted from the U–2 incident in Russia, may lead to tougher policies, but it is very doubtful that either popular or official outrage would lead to a real demand for nuclear war. It is possible, however, that public demands for firmness or action might greatly increase the danger of war in times of tension.

In the 1960's the level of tension at any critical time can have a decisive role in the unique kind of guessing game which military leaders, particularly those with vulnerable retaliatory forces, may consider themselves obliged to play. The combination of vulnerable forces, such as bombers at their bases and "soft" liquid-fueled missiles, and the very short radar warning times associated with a ballistic missile attack could place upon national leaders in times of extreme tension a burden of decision unprecedented in history. So long as intelligence is less than perfect—and it always is—the temptation to launch a preemptive attack to insure one's survival must always be present. Relatively little has been written or said publicly about this problem. But it may be significant that, quite recently and for almost the first time in our history, the traditional strike-second policy of the United States has been openly questioned. In principal the danger of an accidental war resulting from a misguided preemptive attack is always present, but as a practical matter the danger is probably greatest in periods of peak tension.

In the middle and late sixties, both the United States and the U.S.S.R. should have less vulnerable retaliatory forces. Populations may, in effect, be held as hostages subject to destruction, but the temptation to attack preemptively should be somewhat reduced and a greater measure of stability should exist in the bilateral strategic balance. Although one danger of accidental war is perhaps lessened, another danger—harder to predict—may be growing. This is the diffusion of nuclear power. The United States and the U.S.S.R. will not be the only nations involved in the global strategic equilibrium. Red China seems, again, a cause for special concern. We shall not attempt to speculate in detail upon the situations and dangers which may develop. But it is conceivable that in the 1965–70 period the central problem of national security may become not so much how to deter the enemy with the threat of force, which has been the main concern so far, but how, in an atmosphere of tension, to guard against a variety of possible accidents that could lead to mutual destruction.

If the chances of war by accident rise sharply in periods of tension, it is worth while to ask how frequently these periods of tension occur. Our listing of some of the postwar crises in the preceding section shows that, on the average, peaks of tension occurred a little less often than once a year. Statistics may be of limited value, but the postwar experience gives at least some indication of what we may expect in the next 10 years without some major changes in the cold war. It can be argued that the Communist nations are fairly well contained at the present and have fewer opportunities for crisis-generating mischief. But the Berlin question is conspicuously unsettled, the timing of the U–2 incident could hardly have been predicted, and the rise of Red China presents a troublesome prospect. It seems prudent to assume that there will be, in the 1960's as in the last 15 years, occasional peaks of tension. At these times accidents, of whatever nature, are most likely to lead to war.

The greatest danger, in a time of tension, is that normally insignificant events or accidents may set in motion on both sides a series of events leading to disaster. We might have a kind of self-generating accidental war. Predictions tend to be conjectures. But in a time of moderate tension, let us say, a small war occurs—there have been many of these in the postwar years. A major power which considers its interest threatened decides to intervene on a limited scale and does so. Its intervention is met by warnings and threats from the other side. One side, and probably then the other, places its forces on some level of alert. Intelligence-gathering processes are under great strain. National leaders are watching events with anxiety. One side places its forces in a higher state of readiness and the other, predictably, follows suit. The danger at this point is enormously heightened by any pressure to launch a preemptive attack. The situation is tense and conspicuously unstable. Any spark—a false radar warning, an accidental overflight, a failure in communications—could trigger an accidental war.

The critical point in this cycle of events is reached not when one side becomes convinced that the other side is about to attack, but when either side concludes that the situation has deteriorated to a state where war is inevitable. This kind of critical point is even harder to specify or to determine in advance; clearly the side which perceives the inevitability of war first has the advantage. All this offers the possibility of shortening drastically and tragically the time period over which the strategic guessing game is played.

Occasional attempts have been made to discuss the U.S. strategic deterrent in relation to a retaliatory threshold: a level of provocation below which strategic retaliation would not be launched. Certainly, both the Western and the Communist nations, in evident recognition of the dangers, tolerate incidents which might in former times have led to war. Overflights, accidental or deliberate, occur; planes are occasionally shot down; radio broadcasts are jammed; abductions occur; insults and threats are traded; and so on. Some lesser overt acts of war would probably also be tolerated, depending on the circumstances. But because of the extremely wide variety of possible provocations the significance of an unambiguously defined retaliatory threshold is doubtful. Moreover, a threshold, if it were to reduce the danger of accidental war, would have to be known to the enemy, and this contradicts the longstanding military principle that it is desirable to keep the enemy guessing.

6. CONCLUSIONS

Several major conclusions emerge from our study:

1. Taking together all the dangers, there is a significant chance that a major accidental war may occur at some time in the 1960's. The problem of accidental war has received too little public recognition and discussion and, very probably, too little explicit attention in our security planning.

2. The danger of accidental war rises sharply in periods of international tension. At such times normally insignificant accidents may set in motion a kind of chain reaction of events leading to war. What is predictably improbable in normal times becomes unpredictably probable in abnormal times.

3. The danger of accidental war depends on the nature and balance of nuclear forces and the states of readiness in which they are held. Vulnerable strategic forces, such as manned bombers and some liquid-fueled ballistic missiles, tend to be dangerous. Next in importance, the danger depends in an unpredictable manner on a variety of human factors, including the predispositions of national leaders for taking or avoiding action.

4. An accidental war is most likely to come about through the spread of a small war or through major high-level miscalculation. It is relatively unlikely to result from purely technical mishaps except when complicating circumstances, such as might exist in times of tension, are present.

5. The danger of accidental war increases when a nation's policies and intentions are ambiguously stated and poorly communicated to a potential enemy. In the present period of poised nuclear forces and very short reaction times, it is important to be able to distinguish between real policies and propaganda and between idle threats and genuine dangers.

6. The danger of accidental war increases with the spread of nuclear weapons and their means of delivery. Red China is a cause for special concern in the 1960's.

We believe that a number of steps to reduce the danger of accidental war are feasible at the present time. Some of these steps will require formal or informal agreement among nations. Others, which have apparently received little serious consideration, can be taken unilaterally by the United States with no significant loss of military security. Unilateral steps include:

(a) Official recognition of the danger of accidental war and a publicly declared intention to seek ways to reduce the danger.

(b) Recognition, in practice, that the traditional military principle which aims at keeping the enemy guessing at one's intentions may be dangerously out of date in the nuclear-missile age.

(c) In the military sphere, still greater emphasis on relatively invulnerable strategic forces and a flexible nonnuclear capability.

(d) Communication to possible enemies of the manifestly nonaggressive character of U.S. military plans and preparations. More information on weapons system safety measures can be released without compromising security. Military training operations, including practice alerts and SAC flights, can be conducted in a conspicuously nonaggressive manner. U.S. strategic doctrine can be made to stress exclusively, in word and deed, a second-strike capability. Imaginative study of this communication problem might reveal many helpful measures. Reciprocation of some of these unilateral measures by a potential enemy could yield very significant gains in the stability of the deterrent balance.

Multilateral measures on which U.S. initiative is needed include:

(a) Clearer recognition and study of the accidental war problem as an important area of arms control negotiations. A variety of small but collectively very significant safeguards against accidental war might be more susceptible of negotiation at this time than, say, a nuclear test ban.

(b) Special study of the possibility of providing very fast and reliable communication between top national leaders on each side to help head off any crisis before it leads to disaster. A number of ingenious safeguards against deception could be built into this assurance system.

NUCLEAR SCIENTISTS PLEAD FOR ARMS CONTROL AGREEMENT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, one of the most tragic dilemmas in human history is that of the brilliant atomic scientists in this great and peaceful country—men of peace themselves—who are the architects and builders of the atomic and hydrogen bombs—the most terrifying destructive weapons man has ever conceived.

In the Federation of American Scientists many of these men have combined to plead for the establishment of international methods to control and limit this potential Frankenstein they have created.

On the occasion of the 15th anniversary of the first atomic bomb explosion last month they issued a moving and wise and informed statement pleading for this Nation to do its utmost toward seeking arms control.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the release carrying this statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY FEDERATION OF AMERICAN SCIENTISTS ON THE OCCASION OF THE 15TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE EXPLOSION OF THE FIRST NUCLEAR WEAPON AT ALAMAGORDO, N. MEX., JULY 16, 1945

In the 15 years since the first nuclear weapon was exploded at Alamagordo, no agreement on arms control has been concluded. It appears unlikely that the world will avoid a nuclear holocaust if another 15 years pass without arms control agreements.

A nation may propose arms control to prevent or minimize the horror of war, to strengthen its relative military position, or to gain a propaganda victory. Unless both sides seek arms control agreements for the first purpose no very useful agreement is possible. Although it has been U.S. policy to seek arms control as a method of preventing war, we have not supported that policy with the necessary conviction and devotion. We must make more creative and intensive efforts to get arms control agreements.

It is clear that our best efforts toward arms control will be unavailing if the Soviet Union is intransigent. But the only way in which we can determine whether they share our goal is by negotiating with them. The goal of such negotiations is an arms control plan—perhaps the first of a series—which will increase our chances of survival and avoid significantly unequal effects on the military strength of East and West. If we make a complete effort to this end and fail, we will know that Russia is seeking arms control agreements only to improve her relative military position or to gain propaganda victories. If we do not make a complete effort, we will have failed to do that which it is in our power to do and which a minimum regard for our safety and our responsibility to mankind requires.

This goal will not be easily attained. The federation appreciates, perhaps more clearly than many, that workable arms control agreements are difficult to create, propose, and negotiate, even when all parties recognize that such agreements are essential to survival. The scientific and technical problems, as well as the military, diplomatic, and administrative problems, of negotiating an arms control agreement are exceedingly demanding. Solution of the problems requires, at the very least, conviction throughout our Government of the importance of the goal, thorough investigation and evaluation of proposals, and creative thinking to develop all possible routes to agreement.

Even before the first atomic explosion in 1945, American scientists at the supersecret Manhattan project warned their Government of the terrifying consequences of an atomic arms race. After the war, atomic scientists established the Federation of American Scientists to inform the public of the promise, and of the threat, of atomic energy. In trying to dispel the easy confidence that the secrecy of our marvelous weapon would protect us for the foreseeable future, the federation, in 1946, cautioned:

"There is no secret of nature which scientists in other countries cannot learn as readily as we. There is no magic defense against the A-bomb. We must have world control of atomic energy."

In 1946–47, while the United States still held its nuclear monopoly, we proposed and negotiated on the Baruch plan, a plan that might be called the "whole hog" of nuclear weapons control. Unfortunately the conclusion at that time was that the Soviet Union was unwilling to agree to an adequate plan for preventing the use of nuclear weapons. That major effort to achieve effective control of nuclear weapons failed because the Soviet Union was intransigent. But that was 13 years ago. A different regime ruled Russia then, and the ICBM and the H-bomb had not yet been born.

Nor have recent efforts to achieve arms limitation agreements succeeded. But this time we do not know that our efforts have failed because of Soviet intransigence. Our efforts have not been complete enough for us to be confident that we would have found a basis for agreement if such existed. Our Government has not undertaken on a sufficient scale the hard work and intensive research that are necessary for an informed political judgment on specific arms control proposals. Our country is unquestionably in favor of disarmament in principle. But we seem to fear specific steps because we do not know what risk or gain each step may imply. In short, we have failed to organize the basic information and critical and creative thought necessary to the formulation of arms control proposals based on clear recognition of facts. Furthermore, we are unable to anticipate or analyze adequately such counterproposals as the Russians have offered or may yet offer.

It seems at least probable that the Soviet leaders now share our belief in the value and importance to both our nations—as well as to the rest of the world—of achieving some arms limitation. If this is true our failure to do all that can be done toward seeking such agreements may be a tragic failure indeed.

On this 15th anniversary of the nuclear arms race, let us recognize that while time is short, time still remains. We must no longer fail to do our utmost toward seeking arms control. The tragedy of ultimate failure is so great that we must make survival the first order of business and devote generously to the study of disarmament whatever talent and resources may be usefully employed.

EXTENDED HOSPITALIZATION IMPOVERISHES 81-YEAR-OLD MOTHER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, many Wisconsin citizens have worked hard all their lives building up savings for a comfortable retirement. Then, unexpected medical bills develop. The net result: The long-sought-after security is pulled right out from under them.

One of the saddest problems develops when these people are not covered by any social security at all. Then the entire burden of medical cost falls on them or their relatives.

I have in my hand a letter which illustrates this very problem. I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: I am enclosing a hospital bill for my 81-year-old mother. She has no hospital or surgical insurance, as it was difficult to get coverage and the premiums were exorbitant at her age, and she is not under social security as my father passed away 1 year before social security went into effect, at the age of 61.

I am not complaining of the prices charged by the hospital. However, the bill made me realize that an aged person who remained a month or 6 weeks, or reentered the hospital periodically during his life, wouldn't have many savings or material possessions left in a short while, and no doubt the individual would be subject to charity in many cases.

Fortunately, my mother was able to pay the bill and walk out without losing her pride or being humiliated.

Still, this firsthand experience sure can jolt a person into thinking about the real seriousness of the problem, and as life expectancy increases, the problem becomes greater.

WHO VOTED FOR THE NEEDY?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, during the colloquy which occurred earlier today regarding civil rights measures, the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] made the statement, if I understood him correctly, that he had a better record with regard to assisting the needy and aged and underprivileged and those who have the least of all in this land than any one of the so-called entrenched advocates of States rights who have resisted some of his civil rights proposals.

I am certain the Senator from New York has a good record. According to his own conscience, he does everything in his power to advance the cause of those who are in need of some kind of assistance.

The junior Senator from Louisiana has a somewhat different point of view. He has been fighting, for the last 2 years, in an attempt to help the 5,800,000 people who are classified as needy and who receive meager assistance under some State welfare programs and some Federal assistance. On three yea-and-nay votes this year, the junior Senator from Louisiana has made an effort to get Congress to vote for Federal assistance for the aged, the blind, the totally and permanently disabled, and orphans. He regrets that he has not been able to secure the vote of the senior Senator from New York in a single one of these instances. On every one of those yea-and-nay votes—and there have been three of them in this Congress—the junior Senator from Louisiana has not been able to find any proposal to aid the needy which would meet with the approval of the distinguished senior Senator from New York.

Quite the contrary, the so-called arch-entrenched States righters or foes of civil rights, as the Senator from New York might care to describe us, have consistently—and the yea-and-nay votes so show—and almost unanimously supported measures which would provide more adequately for the needy under all State plans and in all States of the Union.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD three statements from our policy committee explaining what those amendments were, together with the yea-and-nay votes which occurred in connection with them at the time the matters came before the Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INEQUITIES IN MILITARY RETIREMENT PAY URGENTLY NEED CORRECTION

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, in accordance with the understandable desire to complete the work of the 86th Congress at the earliest practicable moment, I can see the reasons behind the decision to limit to the most urgent category the legislation upon which this body

Explanation of absenteeism:
[1] Official business.
[2] Necessarily absent.
[3] Illness.

attempts to act before sine die adjournment.

Such a determination should not, in my view, lead us to shrug aside worthy measures, especially when the House already has acted, which are worthy and commendable. I wish to direct attention to one bill in particular which might be deemed of rather limited importance but which is essential to correct a grievous injustice and to erase a painful inequity committed by an action of the previous Congress.

During the brief period remaining, I very much hope that the Senate Armed Services Committee will speedily consider and will favorably report and that the Senate then will pass legislation treating alike in the matter of retired pay and retainer pay all members of the several uniformed services of the United States. This is an inescapable obligation in the interest of equality for somewhere near 120,000 persons who faithfully served their country in the armed services, the Coast Guard, the Public Health Service, the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Such a measure is one type of what might be called antidiscrimination legislation meriting wide bipartisan support.

During recent weeks, I have received numerous appeals from former Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force personnel imploring the Senate to concur with the House in carrying out a recommendation of President Eisenhower that the traditional relationship be restored between retired and active duty pay rates. I wish to recall that in his budget message last January the President directed attention to the unfortunate consequences of of the provision of the 1958 Military Pay Act which imposed a cutoff date for figuring the amounts to which certain former uniformed service personnel were entitled.

The House has recognized the unfortunate and unjust effect of limiting to 6 percent the increase for those who left the active service before June 1, 1958. I very much regret that the Senate Committee on Armed Services has not seen fit to take up such legislation, including one bill of which I am honored to be a cosponsor. These measures have been pigeonholed, although having the active support of the Department of Defense and other agencies of the executive branch and are unqualifiedly urged by numerous State legislatures and organizations including the American Legion, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

This bill would render simple justice and promote the welfare of a respected group of citizens. That objective is one of the reasons this Congress decided to return and resume the present session following the national political conventions. It is my conviction that extending equity to some 120,000 persons receiving retirement pay after having devoted much or all of their lives to the service of their country is just as much of a duty upon this Congress as endeavoring to extend medical care to our aged or to provide the benefits of an improved minimum wage law to those in private employment.

Such legislation was not, it is true, on the list of urgent items President Eisenhower earlier this week said should be disposed of if this Congress is to fulfill its obligations. Nevertheless, I am confident that, because of his concern as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, he would welcome an opportunity to sign this bill. I have no doubt that a piece of legislation for this purpose would receive his approval. I implore the Senate Armed Services Committee to take the short time which consideration of such a measure would require and give this Senate a chance to rectify a painful and unjust error committed more than 2 years ago.

DEVASTATING FIRE DAMAGE IN CALIFORNIA WILL BE REDEEMED BY FOREST SERVICE

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the State of California, this year has sustained frightful damage through forest fires to the extent of more than 82,000 acres. I must add that some of the other Western States also have sustained tragic damage in their own forests, among them the States of Montana, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington.

I pay a word of tribute to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, through its Forest Service, which this morning, in the Senate Committee on Appropriations, urged, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, the appropriation by Congress of emergency funds with which to repair much of the damage which has taken place, and to take steps which would effectively prevent the flood damage which would surely follow in my State when winter rains follow after a forest fire has denuded large sections of the uplands, the hills and the surrounding mountains.

Many communities in southern California are nestled fairly close to the hills and mountains. Several weeks ago, I flew over a part of that area and saw a blazing inferno in a widespread section of the forest.

I have no doubt that the Committee on Appropriations will approve the funds which the Department of Agriculture, by virtue of this emergency, has recommended. I have no doubt that the Senate, and the House as well, will thereafter concur in the recommendations of the administration in this field.

In this connection, I may say, as was urged by some of my colleagues this morning, that, in the next session of Congress, provision ought to be made for some type of special fund to be available to the Department, so that in the event there was no legislative session to deal with an emergency caused by widespread forest fires, the Department nevertheless would have available the moneys necessary to assist in protecting people and their properties from being damaged or destroyed by resultant flood and rolling debris.

Mr. President, a statement prepared by the Department of Agriculture in connection with emergency watershed research is, I think, of sufficient importance to me to ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSED LANGUAGE

For an additional amount for "forest protection and utilization," as follows: "Forest land management," $800,000, and "Forest research," $500,000.

EXPLANATION OF LANGUAGE

This language is recommended to provide a proposed supplemental appropriation of $800,000 for rehabilitation of burns and $500,000 for emergency research on the burned-over San Dimas experimental forest.

PURPOSE AND NEED FOR SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDS

The purpose of this estimate is to initiate emergency research on the watershed contained within the 17,000-acre San Dimas experimental forest in southern California which on July 20, 1960, was destroyed by a lightning fire and for rehabilitation of burns resulting from devastating forest fires during July 1960. The proposed research program would provide measurements of erosion rates and sediment production from denuded watersheds where prior performance is known; in addition would include evaluation of different emergency erosion control methods, and finally would be a study on measured watersheds of a management system designed to manipulate the regrowing vegetation in such a manner as to reduce future fire control problems and to increase water yields. Under the rehabilitation of burns program it is proposed to restore cover on land areas burned over in July 1960 which have high watershed values, are potential flood damage threats to life and improved property, or which need prompt reseeding or other treatment in order to minimize erosion and to lessen downstream damage and sedimentation.

The need results from a series of devastating forest fires in the western national forests during severe burning conditions in July 1960. These fires burned some 200,000 acres of valuable timberlands, rangelands, and lands having particularly high watershed values. Because the land cover has been destroyed some areas are potential flood damage threats to life and improved property. Others are potential sources of sediment which causes damage to channels and reservoirs. Some burned area is particularly susceptible to erosion and consequent site deterioration because of steepness of slope or soil types.

Justification for supplemental estimate, fiscal year 1961, for "Forest protection and utilization, Forest Service"

	Appropriation, 1961	Supplemental estimate, 1961	Revised estimate, 1961
Forest protection and utilization:
Forest land management:
National forest protection and management	$80,014,900	$800,000	$80,814,900
Fighting forest fires	5,000,000		5,000,000
Insect and disease control	7,044,800		7,044,800
Acquisition of lands	100,000		100,000
Subtotal, forest land management	92,159,700	800,000	92,959,700
Forest research	17,332,000	500,000	17,832,000
State and private forestry cooperation	12,334,800		12,334,800
Total	121,826,500	1,300,000	123,126,500

1. Rehabilitation of burns

Approximately 222,000 acres burned in forest fires in western national forests during July 1960. Of this acreage approximately 178,000 is national forest land. Fires occurred in many of the national forests but there was particular concentration of large fires in southern California, eastern Oregon, central Idaho and in Montana. Included in the burns are timberlands, rangelands, and lands having particularly high watershed values. Some burned areas are potential flood damage threats to life and improved property. Some are potential sources of sediment which can seriously damage channels and reservoirs. Some burned acreage is particularly susceptible to erosion and consequent site deterioration because of steepness of slope or unstable soil type.

In southern California, excluding the San Dimas Experimental Forest burn which is treated as a separate item, approximately 65,000 acres of national forest land has been burned. Most of this area will require seeding promptly with quick-growing grasses and other plants to reduce the movement of sediment into urban and agricultural areas or into flood control and water supply reservoirs. About 51,500 acres of this erosion control work at an estimated cost of $136,000 will be financed through the use of available flood prevention funds. It is proposed that emergency treatment of the remaining 13,500 acres at an estimated cost of $36,500 be financed under this item. The major burn to be treated includes 11,000 acres of national forest land situated in the Santa Clara River Basin above the recently built San Felicia Reservoir.

In addition to emergency watershed treatment which is needed particularly in southern California to minimize the flood damage threat to high downstream values, there is an additional burned acreage elsewhere which should be given prompt treatment by reseeding and supplementary contour trenching and gully control to minimize erosion and lessen downstream channel damage and sedimentation. This work is needed promptly to reduce soil erosion and consequent on-site damage which follows the destruction of natural vegetation. Some denuded slopes, such as those in the canyon of the Snake River, are so steep that the soil must be anchored by vegetation if it is to be held in place. Soil eroded from these slopes will quickly reach the river. Other burned areas, as in the Boise National Forest, are on granitic soils which have a very high erosion potential, regardless of slope. Rapid reestablishment of cover on denuded granitic soils is essential to avoid severe erosion problems. In addition to on-site benefits, this work will reduce the amount of sediment which will move from the burned areas into streams and reservoirs. About 38,775 acres are involved. The estimated cost of treating this acreage is $413,500 including grass seeding and related contour furrowing and gully stabilization.

In addition to the reseeding work outlined above, tree planting on 3,500 acres on three burns in Idaho above the Lucky Peak flood control reservoir of the Corps of Engineers is recommended. Reseeding to grass of suitable sites above this reservoir is included in the projects outlined above. Part of the burned area is excellent timberland which should be replanted promptly. Planting the burns is a high priority both for watershed protection and reforestation purposes. The planting will involve contour furrowing in the summer and fall of 1960 to prepare the ground and help assure maximum tree survival. This is an essential part of the planting but in addition it will provide immediate erosion control benefits and reduce the amount of sediment from the burns which will reach the reservoir. Planting will be done in the spring of 1961. The estimated cost of planting including contour furrowing is $350,000.

The total cost of watershed rehabilitation work under this item is $800,000 and is summarized in the following table:

Type of rehabilitation measure

[2] Included in tree planting.

The projects proposed in this estimate are directed toward immediate urgent needs for stabilizing and rehabilitating burned national forest watersheds by established methods which can be quickly placed into effect. In addition, some of the fires have created a large reforestation job which is not included in this proposal because the required planting is not considered of an emergency nature. However, it is estimated that there are more than 10,000 acres of burned-over area for which later consideration must be given to determine reforestation needs for rehabilitation and erosion prevention. Since the fire season in the West is still in the early stages additional forest acreage will be burned before the season is closed.

2. Emergency watershed research

The 17,000-acre San Dimas experimental forest is located in southern California in an area typical of much of the brush-covered lands of the Southwestern United States. This experimental area, consisting of 19 watersheds of different sizes, has been equipped with facilities for measurement and study of the various factors affecting water yield and soil erosion. For many years measurements have been obtained under natural conditions of vegetative cover. The entire area was denuded by wild fire July 20–22, 1960, and many of the research installations and facilities were destroyed or damaged. Although this event constitutes a serious loss to a valuable research program, there now exists a unique opportunity to obtain much-needed information in a relatively short time—an opportunity that may not occur again in this century.

The brush-covered lands of the Southwest are characterized by steep, unstable slopes, highly inflammable vegetative cover, and precipitation that often occurs in high-intensity rain storms interspersed with long periods of drought. In a number of locations these lands are adjacent to areas of concentrated population and industrial development.

Because of these characteristics, management of such lands is particularly difficult and must be primarily aimed at prevention and control of wild fire, reduction of excessive flood flows and debris movement following denudation by fire, and establishment and maintenance of conditions that promote the maximum well-regulated yield of good quality water with a minimum of sediment.

The total losses, as represented by initial cost, to install research installations and facilities are estimated to be $437,000. The estimated cost of minimum rehabilitation, replacement, and repair to reestablish the experimental forest in operating condition is $282,700. To carry out the proposed emergency research program it will not be necessary to restore all the instruments and facilities destroyed by the fire. The $282,700 represents only costs for fiscal year 1961. However, other rehabilitation and restoration will be necessary in the future as additional steps in this emergency research program are undertaken.

The emergency research proposed is divided into three parts. The first is concerned with emergency revegetation following fire, permanent reduction in future fire hazard, and increases in water yield. Its cost for establishment and operation during fiscal year 1961 is about $620,180. The largest single cost item of this research work is to measure and clean out debris basins after subsequent storms. Information is needed as to the relationship of size and intensity of storm to the amount of resulting erosion, how alternative emergency reseeding methods reduce erosion potential, what pattern of vegetative cover best reduces fire hazards, and increases water yields. The second emergency research project is aimed at evaluating the effectiveness of surface treatments of burned watersheds. Here the aim is to spray the soil surface with emulsion which will reduce erosion until vegetation can become effective in holding water flow. This study will cost $25,000 during fiscal year 1961. The third emergency research project deals with structural stabilization which will confine all debris within the watershed where it is produced, and incidentally to protect a major flood protection reservoir. This project is estimated to cost about $500,000.

The summary of estimated costs to restore research capacity of this experimental area and to start emergency research which should be under way before winter rains shows an overall total of $1,427,880.

The Forest Service research program in California has always had cooperative help from other Federal, State, and local flood control, fire control, and water resource management agencies. It is expected that these and other interested agencies will contribute materially toward the proposed program. At least $485,000 is expected to be received from these sources.

The remainder of the $1,427,880 is proposed to be met in part by reprograming of funds in the amount of about $442,880. This leaves $500,000 that is being requested in this estimate.

The need is of urgent nature because installations must be in place and operating, and treatments must be applied before the first rains of the coming winter or the opportunity for obtaining complete measurements following fire will be lost. Also, proper provision for measurement and maintenance during the winter season must be made.

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I feel certain that Senators across the aisle will permit me to say that after more than 100 years of existence of the Republican Party, during which the State of California was the residence of the first candidate for President on the Republican ticket, in 1856, and of the candidate in 1928, today a native-born Californian is the nominee for President of my party.

I felt honored to participate in the deliberations of the recent Republican National Convention in Chicago. I am bound to say that, in my judgment, the platform of the party to which I have the honor to belong is a forward looking document, upon which Republicans, Independents, and Democrats may be pleased to unite. I am proud, too, of the nominees of my party for President and for Vice President.

I believe Vice President NIXON, of California, and Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts—and I know the distinguished Presiding Officer (Mr. HART in the chair) will agree with me—are two able, honorable, dedicated, and experienced Americans who will conduct an able, honorable, and vigorous campaign with our two able colleagues from the other side of the aisle.

I returned to California after the convention. The enthusiasm with which the Vice President was received by a great throng as he came into the Los Angeles International Airport indicates, in my opinion, a growing feeling of approval by the people of my State with respect to his candidacy.

I attended, that evening, a homecoming for the Vice President in his home city of Whittier, and there joined a crowd far exceeding the number of people who ever gathered together in that area in days gone by. They were of all parties and political faiths and they came to honor—and to support—Mr. NIXON.

Subsequently I participated in the State convention of my party in Sacramento. I think I can say that in this campaign the American people are intensely interested in the candidates. They are also intensely interested in the issues. I thought there was more vigorous interest in our State convention, held in Sacramento, than I had seen in many a year. I simply want the RECORD of this day's proceedings in the Senate to indicate my view that the Republican Party is united, and that we intend, between now and November, to conduct our campaign with vigor, day in and day out. That is the path we chart toward victory. And we will be joined by thousands of Democrats and Independents who not only will vote for NIXON and Lodge but will work actively in their behalf.

The Vice President certainly received a unique and heart-warming welcome when he returned to his homeland. So far as I have been able to perceive, California, with its traditional history of not being partisan minded, will respond to the vigor of campaigning and to the clarification of the issues and to the positions which our two parties and their candidates take on the issues.

In my judgment, the chances for my party to succeed in California have been greatly enhanced. We will supply the vigor necessary to complete the job prior to the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

Mr. President, I thank my friend, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator from California is very welcome.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, although now hungry, footsore, and weary, I hope to complete at this time the speech I attempted to begin about an hour ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, in each of the past 7 years President Eisenhower has recommended that minimum wage protection be extended to several million workers. Yet, in not one of those 7 years has a bill to extend coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act ever come to a vote in either House of Congress.

There are those who will say with respect to additional minimum-wage coverage "Let the States do it." But, Mr. President, the Fair Labor Standards Act has been on the statute books for 22 years, and the States have fallen far short of expectations in their actions to implement it.

A study of State minimum-wage-law provisions spotlights the fact that State legislatures have failed to protect millions of workers who are excluded from the coverage of the Federal statute.

About one-half of the States have no minimum-wage safeguards for workmen in nonmanufacturing industries. In two States the minimum hourly rate required is the ridiculously low level of 25 cents an hour.

The members of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee realize that in the bill reported we are covering only a small percentage of the 20 million workers who still have no Federal minimum wage protection. By and large, our discussions in executive session were devoted to the problem of limiting the extension of coverage to the truly big retail and service enterprises. Surprisingly enough, a Department of Labor survey which was brought to the committee's attention, showed that the large chainstores, those with 11 or more outlets, pay a bigger proportion of their workers less than $1 an hour than do the small, single unit stores. Simply on the basis of this fact alone, we could argue that the committee bill will help the small merchant encounter the competition of the chains.

Basically, retailing is a local business, subject to local conditions. But we cannot ignore the fact that in the retail trade and service industry there are economic giants which have a great influence on our economy. The 12 largest distributors of general merchandise account for probably over $7 billion in sales. In 1954, one chain alone reported sales of nearly $3 billion. It would be very difficult to contend that chains of this magnitude cannot afford to pay a minimum wage.

The declared policy of the Fair Labor Standards Act is to eliminate as rapidly as practicable, without substantially curtailing employment, substandard labor conditions in industries engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. Coverage under the present act is too limited to meet this objective. Twenty-four million workers are now protected by the act's $1 minimum wage. However, 20 million other wage and salary workers are not protected by the Federal law. A substantial proportion of these workers, many of whom are paid low wages, could appropriately be brought under the act.

About half of the 20 million workers are employed in the retail and service trades. Millions of these workers are employed by enterprises which are engaged to a substantial extent in interstate activities. Extension of protection to these workers would greatly improve the effectiveness of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Large numbers of the workers in the retail and service trades are paid substandard wages. This was disclosed by a survey of wages in retail trade which was conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in October 1956. This survey indicated that one-fourth of the workers in retail trade were paid less than $1.00 and one-tenth were paid less than 75 cents. These proportions relate to the Nation as a whole. In the South, nearly one-fourth of the workers were paid less than 75 cents an hour.

Low wages are especially prevalent outside of the large cities. The survey showed that in nonmetropolitan areas of the North Central States, one-third of the workers in retail trade were paid less than $1. In nonmetropolitan areas of the South, about one-third were paid less than 75 cents, and more than half were paid less than $1.

While there may have been some improvements in the earnings position of these workers since the time of the survey, the proportion paid low wages has probably not changed substantially. This is suggested by wage surveys which were conducted by the Department of Labor in 1959 in six small localities. In these localities, five of which are located in the South and one in the Northeast, more than two-fifths of all workers in retail trade were paid less than $1 an hour. These locality surveys also indicate that wage levels in the service industries are also very low.

If the minimum wage protection is not provided for these employees, their earnings will continue to lag behind the earnings of workers who are now protected by the act. Many of these workers are employed in areas which are characterized by an oversupply of labor, and wages are held down as a result of competition for jobs.

The real earnings of most American workers have increased tremendously in recent decades. This has been made possible by the increased productivity of the economy. But employees in the retail and service trades, especially those outside of the large cities, have not shared equitably in the benefits of increased productivity. Although their contribution to the economy is just as great as is that of other workers, their wages will continue to lag unless their employers are required by law to raise them.

The bulk of the employees in these industries are now paid in excess of $1 an hour. In many situations, the employers of these higher paid workers are in competition with employers who pay substandard wages. One of the objectives of the Fair Labor Standards Act is the elimination of unfair competition based on the payment of substandard wages.

Other fairminded employers cannot raise wages above the levels paid by their competitors and remain in business. These are highly competitive industries with low profit margins, and individual employers can remain in business only by keeping costs, including wage costs, to a minimum.

It is recognized that many of these employees are employed by small local businesses which cannot appropriately be brought under the Federal law. However, many are employed by interstate chains and by large department stores, hotels, and other businesses which are engaged to a very substantial extent in interstate activities. Wage levels in these large enterprises tend to be lower than wages in the small, local enterprises; and the large enterprises have greater financial resources, and are in a favorable position to adjust to a rigid minimum-wage requirement.

Extension of coverage to employees of the large enterprises engaged to a substantial extent in interstate activities would be of great benefit to their employees. Of equal importance, if a substantial proportion of the employees of these industries are brought directly under the protection of the minimum wage, labor market forces will tend to push up the wages of other workers of these industries. Thus, an extension of the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to several million of the employees of the retail and service industries can be expected to result in greatly improving the earnings position of many other workers who are now paid less than $1 an hour.

Secretary Mitchell described accurately the threefold task which Congress faces at the present session:

> First, to determine to which of the excluded workers the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act should and can be extended; second, to determine the level of the minimum rate appropriate for the newly covered workers and what provisions if any, should be made for maximum hours protection for them; and third, to determine what is the appropriate level of the minimum wage for workers already protected by the act.

With respect to the last category, I think that the committee acted wisely in altering the Kennedy bill so that rather than bring the presently covered workers immediately to $1.25, they will be brought up to this level on a graduated scale which will minimize the possibility of increasing unemployment and minimize the impact upon employers and the economy.

In regard to the next task of the committee, that of determining which of the excluded workers should be given the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act, I think the committee, with certain exceptions, acted judiciously.

The basic weakness of the bill lies in the fact that the level of the minimum rate and the nature of the overtime provisions applying to newly covered workers, are such that they may create real problems.

Secretary Mitchell put his finger on one of the outstanding difficulties when he said:

> Many of the firms, including thousands of small businesses, which would be brought under the act for the first time would be required to adjust to increases in wage costs of 50 percent and more.

We must take great precautions to make certain that any action we may take will not result in extensive curtailment of employment and economic dislocation.

In 1955, when the minimum wage was increased from 75 cents to $1 with no extension of coverage, 2.1 million workers, or 8.4 percent of all of the then covered workers, were paid less than $1 and received wage increases.

In contrast, the bills now under consideration would both extend coverage and increase the minimum wage. With relation to the 24 million workers now covered by the act, the bills would require wage increases in the first year for 2,420,000 workers, or 10.2 percent. A year later the wages of these 2,420,000 workers and of an additional 583,000 workers paid between $1.15 and $1.20 would be increased to $1.20. At the end of 2 years the wages of these 3,003,000 workers would be raised to $1.25, as would the wages of an additional 597,000 workers paid between $1.20 and $1.25. The total number—3,600,000—whose wages would be raised represent 15.2 percent of all workers now under the act.

Department of Labor reports, submitted to the Congress in accordance with the requirements of section 4(d) of the act, show that it took over 3 years to make a reasonably complete adjustment to the increase in the minimum wage from 75 cents to $1. Even after 3 years, the extent of concentration of workers at the $1 level was much greater than it had been when that rate was enacted, although only 8.4 percent of the covered workers had been affected. Obviously, in enacting an increase affecting over 15 percent of the workers, nearly twice the percentage affected by the 1956 increase, we run the risk of some economic dislocation, causing unemployment.

In acting on a bill which will bring millions of new workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act, we must take every precaution to make certain that no real enduring hardships fall upon either employers or workers.

We cannot gainsay the fact that the reported bill will have a significant impact upon the economy. For example, of the 3,040,000 workers in retail trade who would be brought under the act by the bill, 610,000 or 20 percent would receive increases to $1. The wages of these 610,000 workers and of an additional 65,000 would be raised to $1.05 a year later. After 2 years these 675,000 workers and an additional 270,000 would be raised to $1.15. At the end of the 3 years a total of 1,365,000 workers in retail trade would receive increases to $1.25.

It is obvious that Congress should now set the minimum rate for the newly covered at a level which is at present economically feasible—and rely on the procedures contemplated under section 4(d) of the act to achieve further increases.

The 84th Congress also wrestled with the problem of providing for periodic increases in the minimum wage. A 1955 staff report to the Senate Subcommittee on Labor proposed that "serious attention be given to various possible methods allowing more frequent but smaller adjustments in the statutory minimum wage, and that the Secretary of Labor be directed to make specific recommendations to Congress in regard to future necessary increases."

This proposal resulted in the present section 4(d) of the act. In the report accompanying the bill which amended section 4(d) and raised the minimum to $1, the following explanation was made:

> In making his annual report, required by section 4(d) of the present law, the Secretary of Labor would be required to recommend to the Congress any changes in the amount of the minimum wage which he deems desirable. In making this evaluation the Secretary must take into consideration changes which may have occurred in the cost of living and in productivity and the level of wages in manufacturing, the ability of industries to absorb wage increases, and other factors which the Secretary deems to be pertinent. This provision is designed to give assurance that in the future the minimum wage will be periodically reviewed by the Secretary of Labor and the Congress so that it may be kept in realistic relationship to current levels of economic activity in the light of the purposes set forth in the act which it is designed to serve.

Section 4(d) provides an effective method of adjusting minimum wage rates as economic conditions warrant. It could be argued that the escalator provisions tend to negate the basic intent of the Congress in adopting section 4(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act because these escalator provisions become effective at a predetermined time and through their adoption we would be attempting to foresee future economic conditions, future changes in wage levels, in the cost of living and in the ability of employers to adjust to higher minimum wages in the years ahead.

So, Mr. President, making statutory provision for mandatory increases to take effect far into the future is a somewhat hazardous undertaking.

While in most instances small retail firms are not covered by the pending legislation, if these small firms are competing for labor in the same market, they may, in many cases, be forced to adjust wages upward to compete with larger operations covered by the Federal statutory standards.

We must recognize also that if we set the statutory minimum too high for newly covered workers, there will be measurable employment effects. For instance, a lower demand for workers in some low-wage retail and service firms may result if employers reduce unit labor costs by releasing less productive workers, or if price increases reduce demand.

Although the 1956 rise in minimum wages did not carry with it an extension of fair labor standards coverage, it is well to take note of what happened in the industries affected by the 1956 rise.

The Department of Labor studies demonstrate that employers affected by the increased wage costs used a variety of actions to adjust to the new labor expense. This is what a Library of Congress report has to say about the matter:

> The Department studied the actions of 1,105 plants in the low-wage industries. It found that 45 percent of the plants increased expenditures for machinery and equipment; almost one out of four plants attempted to increase productivity through changes in work procedures * * * about one out of seven firms reported reduction in labor force.

If the committee bill is enacted as written, business concerns may put on a larger number of employees working shorter hours to reduce costs—or get rid of workers who for one reason or another are less productive—so that the take-home pay of the worker who remains on the job will be actually less than he is receiving now. My purpose throughout my committee work has been to work toward developing a proposal which would permit absorption of the required increases in wage costs without substantial curtailment of employment or a significant adverse impact on the economy. If Congress does not make the right decision in framing a fair labor standards bill, it will find itself helping some workers in need of minimum wage protection and taking away the jobs of other large numbers of low-paid workers.

In this connection, I would point out to the Senate that according to the best information I have been able to obtain from the Department of Commerce, in the retail trade profits on sales before taxes average about 2.52 percent of sales, and, in the retail trade profits after taxes amount to only 1.18 percent of sales.

Profit figures for the service trades are somewhat higher, but not immense by any standard. The averages for the service trade show a profit before taxes of 4.46 percent and a profit after taxes of 1.76 percent.

It is clearly evident from these figures that in broadening the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act and in setting rates for the newly covered workers, we must be careful not to go to any extremes. Manufacturing workers have been under the wage and hour law for some time, and the manufacturing profit picture is considerably better than the retail and service profit situation. According to the latest figures I have, manufacturing profits run about 7.95 percent before taxes and 4.1 percent after taxes.

To set a proper economic background for the discussions now taking place, I think it would be well to mention a little bit about national income. National income is, of course, the cost involved in producing the sale or service. Figures which I have from the Department of Commerce show that in the retail trade, labor costs amount to 67.6 percent of the total cost of developing the sale of merchandise. This may be compared with a labor cost of 56.2 percent in the service trade and a labor cost of 77.1 percent in the hotel and lodging trade.

It has often been my experience to note that statisticians or economists can start with one set of figures or one set of facts and upon analysis of these figures and facts reach entirely different conclusions. This happened during the course of the lengthy hearings on the pending legislation, and the committee had labor groups contending, in effect, that an increase in the minimum wage and extension of the coverage would have no severe economic impact and business groups arguing that the impact would be nothing short of tremendous.

Quite likely the claims of both groups have been exaggerated and quite likely also there can be found a middle ground which would be fair and equitable to all concerned.

The Labor and Public Welfare Committee had before it many bills which would extend coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act and hike the minimum wage rate. The varying character of these bills only serves to emphasize the difficulties in determining what workers should be covered and how much they should receive as a minimum wage.

It may come as a surprise to some Senators, but I think I should disclose that at one point in the committee's proceedings, members gave thought to extending coverage to 11 million workers. This was the nature of the bill reported by the Labor Subcommittee to the full committee. After studying all the facts, it soon became apparent that a realistic attitude compelled the initiation of changes to narrow the scope of the bill. I shall not attempt here to asperse the motives of any Senators, but I have heard it said informally that like the trader who sets a price higher than he expects to get, some proponents of the pending legislation want a broad bill so that they will have something to bargain with in conference. I am sure that no Senator is under any illusion that a bill approved by this body will be accepted 100 percent by the House. Changes and modifications will undoubtedly be made in conference and we can hope that these changes will be grounded in wisdom and in the public interest.

Because of the facts and statistics which I have brought forth in detail today, I have given some thought to offering an amendment which would alter the minimum wage and overtime rates applicable to newly covered workers. I had in mind a proposal which would give these newly covered workers more than they are now scheduled to get under the bill's provisions affecting the first 2-year period, but my proposal contemplated deferring any step-ups in rates for the third and fourth years and thereafter until full reports on the 2-year period had been received from the Department of Labor.

I do not believe in hurting one person to help another if such a situation can be avoided, and this has been the theme and spirit which has guided me during deliberations on minimum wage legislation.

I am happy to say that there are many significant provisions in the pending legislation, but none more important than the text which would provide more effective procedures for enforcing the Fair Labor Standards Act. The need for more effective enforcement procedures is brought sharply to focus by the fact that over the years only about half of the unpaid wages disclosed by investigation has been paid to employees. The administration has repeatedly asked that enforcement loopholes be closed and I am pleased that my amendment to close up these loopholes was adopted by the committee.

One of the most difficult problems which faced the Labor and Public Welfare Committee was the task of bringing under the Fair Labor Standards Act large retail and service chain operations without extending coverage to the small neighborhood restaurant or store simply because it has some business arrangement with big corporations.

At my request, the committee adopted a proviso qualifying the definition of the word "enterprise" so that the Department of Labor, in enforcing the new amendments, will be required to go into all the facts and draw careful distinctions between the store which is part of a chain and the store which simply leases property or buys merchandise from a large company.

In closing may I say that I believe the Fair Labor Standards Act has been a helpful device to improve the welfare of American workers. As early as his first Economic Report, issued in January 1954, President Eisenhower said:

An effective minimum wage program should cover millions of low paid workers now exempted.

Much is being made of the fact that in terms of coverage, the committee bill is broader than the administration bill. I would caution those who reap partisan joy from this fact with the reminder that had the carefully drawn program of the President been enacted when it was first advocated 7 years ago, hundreds of thousands of workers would have had dollars in their pockets to help maintain the standards of decency we all want American workers to enjoy.

I hope, Mr. President, that the interest in minimum wage legislation will be truly genuine in contrast to the apathy which was manifested in civil rights only a few days ago. As the country wants laws not issues in the civil rights field, so, too, does it want laws not issues in the minimum wage field. Any legislative attempt which has only the veneer of sincerity will be labeled for what it is by the results of the November elections.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN RELATIONSHIP

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, one of the outstanding newspapers in the Dominion of Canada is the Calgary Herald, of which Mr. Basil Dean is the vice president and publisher. Mr. Dean has been a visitor to Washington on occasions, and he is one of the real friends of better American-Canadian relations. Mr. Dean was the guest editor for a day for the Great Falls Tribune, and an editorial by him appeared in that outstanding Montana publication under date of Sunday, July 3, 1960, entitled "United States and Canada Are Allied Come Hell or High Water."

Mr. Dean states in the course of his editorial:

The most important fact in the world today is the solidarity of the Western Alliance. On it depends not only the survival of freedom, but the survival of civilization—indeed, quite conceivably, the survival of the human race.

He states further in the editorial some of the reasons why the relationship between the United States and Canada is so close and so enduring, and will remain so for many years to come.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES AND CANADA ARE ALLIED COME HELL OR HIGH WATER

(By Basil Dean, vice president and publisher, the Calgary Herald)

The most important fact in the world today is the solidarity of the Western Alliance. On it depends not only the survival of freedom, but the survival of civilization—indeed, quite conceivably, the survival of the human race.

Within this context, it is now possible to take another look at the U–2 affair; and to an outside observer it seems that the United States can take great comfort from the end result.

For the truth is that the Russians might have made a good many yards on this play—if they had known what to do with the ball. Instead, they were thrown for a loss.

No harm whatever has been done to the relations between the United States and its friends. Britain and France stood unflinchingly alongside the United States bfore and during the Security Council debate. The Prime Minister of Canada made it immediately and abundantly clear that no attempt by Mr. Khrushchev to use the U–2 incident as a wedge to separate Canada from her intimate defense arrangements with the United States could possibly succeed. Of the 11 members of the Council, only servile Poland, to nobody's surprise, supported the Russian resolution.

In short, the whole affair demonstrated that shocks of this kind cannot shake the Alliance; and the knowledge of this is perhaps the most important thing that Washington is likely to learn in 1960.

The Alliance (which should be construed as including NATO, NORAD and all the other agreements between the United States and her friends) is of vital consequence to all the other nations in it, for the simple reason that without it they probably would not have survived thus far: only American power has kept them free.

What is perhaps less obvious, and what an observer outside the United States may be forgiven for pointing out, is the importance of the Alliance to the United States itself. The American defense posture today would be ominously less effective without the vast complex of bases in other friendly nations—northern Canada included—to say nothing of the actual forces which these nations have contributed to the military apparatus of the Alliance as a whole.

Both sides of this coin are familiar to all thinking Canadians. We think you are better off because you have us on your side—come hell or high water. On the other hand, we know quite well that if we didn't have you on our side we would be lucky to be here at all. There has been some idle chatter in Canada recently about "neutralism," but the talk represents no significant body of opinion in the Dominion outside of a few professional intellectuals on the fringes of Ottawa.

Canada and the United States will continue to have their private differences of opinion, but they are differences which occur in any average—and affectionate—family. You know very well what happens if an outsider presumes to interfere in an argument between two brothers: both of them unite to beat the outsider over the head.

CANADA AND SOUTH AMERICA RELATIONSHIP

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the Calgary Herald, of which Mr. Basil Dean is the vice president and publisher, there appears in the August 1 issue an editorial entitled "Canada Looks at South America."

I think this is especially pertinent in view of the fact that on next Tuesday the Foreign Ministers of the 21 American States will meet in Costa Rica to consider matters of pertinent interest to the hemisphere, and that on September 5 the Economic Ministers of the 21 American States, are to meet in Bogotá, Colombia, for the purpose of discussing economic conditions throughout the hemisphere. Many of us on numerous occasions, and especially the distinguished senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], have expressed the possibility of Canada becoming a member of the Organization of American States.

Since the organization was founded there has been a vacant chair marked "Canada," which has as yet not been occupied by our neighbor to the north. I am pleased to note that in the Calgary Herald under date of August 1, 1960, there appeared an article entitled "Canada Looks at South America." In the article appears the following statement:

Canada's decision to send an observer to the forthcoming conference of the Organization of American States has been hailed with delight in South America and it could well herald a new relationship between this Nation and the Latin American countries.

Further in the editorial the article states:

It has been pointed out, too, that a certain similarity in outlook already exists between Canada's millions of French Canadians and Latin Americans.

The influential newspaper La Prensa of Buenos Aires stated editorially: "If Canada's entry becomes a fact * * * the Organization of American States will be enriched by the moral strength of a people who are lovers of peace and justice and determined at all times to carry out their obligations."

These are, in truth, flattering words, but it may be that Canada can adopt another vital middleman role here. Just as she has traditionally been the middleman between Great Britain and the United States, she may now be able to play in part a similar role between the United States and South America.

Certainly there is much to be gained by sending an observer to the conference.

Mr. President, I express the hope again, and I know that I express the sentiment of all Senators in this respect, that Canada will not only send observers to these meetings of the Organization of American States, but in time will become a full-fledged member of that organization. The last two Ministers for External Affairs have displayed a great interest in Latin-American affairs. The Premier, Mr. Diefenbaker, has expressed a similar interest, and I look forward to the not too distant day when Canada will occupy the chair set aside for it in that organization.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial to which I referred be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Calgary Herald, Aug. 1, 1960]

CANADA LOOKS AT SOUTH AMERICA

Canada's decision to send an observer to the forthcoming conference of the Organization of American States has been hailed with delight in South America and it could well herald a new relationship between this Nation and the Latin-American countries.

Canada, however, is not committing herself to joining the organization by simply sending an observer.

It must be remembered that during the Second World War many South American countries were hotbeds of fascism and, indeed, there is some reason to think these beliefs still hold sway in some of these nations.

Again, some of these countries are unstable, to say the least, and it could well be that some of them are dabbling in communism.

On the other hand, South America is becoming more and more important as she plays an ever-growing role in world affairs. Thus it ill behooves Canada to ignore, or at best exchange polite diplomatic niceties, with this area. It has been suggested strongly that Canada will be most welcome in the organization. A majority of the participating nations apparently feel that they are dominated by the United States, as indeed they are to a large extent, and this country's presence at the conference table would be of immeasurable help both to the United States and South America. Exponents of the plan hold that Canada can play a major role here; that the South American countries know she has "no fish to fry" with them and that as one of the major smaller countries in the Western world will view their problems with sympathy and understanding.

It has been pointed out, too, that a certain similarity in outlook already exists between Canada's millions of French-Canadians and Latin Americans.

The influential newspaper La Prensa of Buenos Aires stated editorially: "If Canada's entry becomes a fact * * * the Organization of American States will be enriched by the moral strength of a people who are lovers of peace and justice and determined at all times to carry out their obligations."

These are, in truth, flattering words, but it may be that Canada can adopt another vital middleman role here. Just as she has traditionally been the middleman between Great Britain and the United States, she may now be able to play in part a similar role between the United States and South America.

Certainly there is much to be gained by sending an observer to the conference.

LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on August 10 I received a letter from Miss Pamela Ellen Procuniar, of Silver Spring, Md. She has some very pertinent matters to discuss relative to the amount of attention given in our North American high schools to various historical subjects, such as Latin America, Africa, and other important areas. Her letter shows a sound perspective and an intelligent outlook on questions which are of great importance to us and to the future of our country.

The young woman starts her letter by saying:

After waiting in line for 3 hours to get into the Senate gallery, I was happy to have the opportunity of hearing you speak on Latin American policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. I recommend it be read by the membership of this body.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SILVER SPRING, MD., August 9, 1960.

Senator MIKE MANSFIELD,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: After waiting in line for 3 hours to get into the Senate gallery, I was very happy to have the opportunity of hearing you speak on Latin American policy. Your approach does strike me as an excellent one.

I would like to bring to your attention a matter that you did not mention. I realize that the National Government does not determine the course of study for the many States, counties, cities, towns, and villages of this very large country, but I would like to see the Government do something to encourage the teaching of pan-American history on a high school and college level.

As a Montgomery County High School senior this past year at Wheaton High School, I was fortunate enough to be able to take a year's course devoted to Latin American Affairs and Asian History—each subject for a semester. Although of course this is not adequate, even this amount of study in these two important areas is offered at only three county high schools.

It seems to me that Americans (United States of America Americans) cannot begin to deal with people or governments in Latin America until the majority of the people begin to understand the area. The Government does give grants to language students. Perhaps it could set up some program for extensive grants to colleges and students interested in setting up programs on vital areas of the world.

I have already noticed that visitors from Canada and Latin America are insulted and shocked by the general lack of knowledge in this country. Students from the rest of the world can do a pretty good job of commenting on the history of the United States. Our students can rarely comment on the history of any other country because many never even take European or world history. Foreign students often make joking remarks about the Americans who consider their Nation so important that they study only their own language and history. They suggest that such tactics may cause us to lose our importance. The foreign students whom I have met or corresponded with are hurt by the American attitude toward the rest of the world—one of paternal superiority. (Your proposal for pan-American operation tries to put our Nation on an equal footing with other cooperating nations. That's what I like about the proposal.)

Incidentally, African history is another course which does not seem to exist in American high schools or even colleges. I spent 12 weeks of European history on a special project on Africa and have begun to realize that there is also a lot to learn about Africa. The continent has history and traditions which help one to understand present economic and political problems.

I am hopeful that the Government can also make some contribution to providing the general public with information about Latin America. The newspapers fail to publish very much about any of the nations in the area unless there is definite trouble. Revolts are announced, but they are not explained. I think that we cooperate in the publishing of booklets by the Pan American Union. Is there some way to encourage the use of the educational facilities now in existence? Since much of the Pan American material has a natural procountry bias, it would be helpful if the U.S. Government printed other material. There seems to be a shameful lack of material in public libraries on the Latin American nations. Too often everyone assumes that a travel book on the whole region is sufficient to explain each individual country. Perhaps the Federal Government could do more to encourage the translation of Spanish books into English; so more books would be available. Too often our Government spends all its money on the education of people in other countries. Some had better be spent on teaching our own citizens to understand other nations. This might have better results than always forcing our culture down the throats of people with very interesting cultures of their own.

Since exchanges of students and professional people between nations are limited by the great expense, it is necessary for the Federal Government to do more about educational programs right in the country. I wonder how many people graduate from college with any real knowledge of Latin America or for that matter any real knowledge of Asia or Africa. Scholarships and fellowships might encourage more people to major in such areas.

I would like to know when hearings are held by the foreign policy committee on your proposals about Latin America, because I would really like to hear discussions of the needs of this area. I will be a political science major at the University of Chicago this fall; so I am really quite concerned with what the Government is going to do about foreign policy.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

PAMELA ELLEN PROCUNIAR.

DUMPING OF RADIOACTIVE WASTE IN THE GULF OF MEXICO SHOULD BE DELAYED

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, over a period of many months I have urged the Atomic Energy Commission to defer any plans to dump radioactive waste materials in the Gulf of Mexico waters off the Texas coast.

Hundreds of thousands of residents along the gulf coast share my view that dumping radioactive waste materials would run the risk, the very serious risk, of contaminating fish and perhaps even waters.

I wish to point out that the Gulf Stream enters the southern part of the Gulf of Mexico and flows out between Cuba and Florida, and then up the Atlantic coast, over the Grand Banks at Newfoundland. The great fish supply from the Grand Banks of Newfoundland which come to the United States and to Canada come to a great extent from waters which have been through the Gulf of Mexico and have flowed up the Gulf Stream to the Grand Banks.

We have taken the position throughout that any such dumping should be delayed, because not enough is known about what the result might be. There are too many reports about radioactive contamination occurring and though there is a conflict in them, we have insisted, and we still insist, that the AEC should abandon any atomic waste dumping plans for the Gulf of Mexico until it completes additional vital studies and knows beyond the shadow of a doubt that the plan is safe.

My belief that we should complete more studies before dumping radioactive waste in the Gulf of Mexico has been strengthened by an article in the August 1960 issue of National Geographic magazine. The article is marine explorer Jacques Piccard's own report of "Man's Deepest Dive," when he descended nearly 7 miles to the floor of the western Pacific Ocean in the U.S. Navy's bathyscaph Trieste.

Of this historic dive to the ocean depths, Mr. Piccard wrote:

> We were not, however, the first messengers from the surface. The creatures we had seen verified the long-assumed existence of undersea currents bringing oxygen down to the very bottom of the sea.
> As yet we do not know the exact speed or size of these currents, but apparently there must be massive exchanges of water between the surface and the great depths. Thus we have one more reason for prudence in the much-discussed disposal of radioactive waste.

Some Senators may recall that when we first opposed the dumping of radioactive waste in the Gulf of Mexico, representatives of the Atomic Energy Commission scoffed at the idea that there was any danger.

However, more and more scientists have said that such dumping is dangerous. Mr. Piccard, after his descent into the depth of the Pacific, after going down 7 miles, said the greatest thrill he and his associate had was when they were at the bottom of the depth and saw a fish swim past their window. He was asked why that was a great thrill to him. He said that indicated there was life there, that there was oxygen down at that depth of the ocean, and that it also showed that there were currents at that depth which had come from the surface waters; therefore we should proceed carefully before we contaminated any part of the ocean.

Mr. Piccard's entire report is extremely interesting and I believe those Senators who have not already seen it will find it well forth their time to read it.

Mr. President, the latest report I have received is that the AEC has delayed radioactive waste dumping until additional studies can be made. I want to commend those officials who arrived at this decision and to assure them that if and when we have clear and proven answers on safe disposal of radioactive wastes that I and most Texans will cooperate fully on this matter.

I wished to make this additional statement on the subject because of the supplemental order which was issued on the 3d of August by the Atomic Energy Commission.

CUBAN NATIONALIZATION OF U.S. BUSINESS PROPERTY

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, more than a year ago, on July 8, 1959, to be exact, I introduced an amendment to the Mutual Security Act empowering the President to suspend economic and other forms of aid to any country illegally seizing American property without just compensation. This body supported me by voting 59 to 32 to adopt this amendment.

Since that time the Castro Communist regime has seized American property in Cuba, estimated to be close to a billion dollars in value. According to a news item in the August 11 Chicago Tribune, President Dorticos of Cuba has now suggested to other Latin American countries that they follow Castro's example and grab whatever American property there may be in their respective countries.

I doubt that any responsible Latin American state will pay any attention to this incitement to international larceny. Nevertheless, the old maxim "Nothing succeeds like success" will still exert a powerful lure on the covetous, the anti-American, and the radical elements in many South American countries. They in turn can be expected to stir up their own populations into following Cuba's example. "Castro got away with it—the United States did nothing—why can't we do the same?" is bound to prove a highly attractive slogan in some Latin American countries.

I warned last March that doing nothing and "waiting for the dust to settle" in Cuba would surely serve to encourage other anti-American elements into emulating Castro and overthrowing their own governments. My warning, I am afraid, is now coming true.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks the article from the Chicago Tribune.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Aug. 11, 1960]

CUBAN LEADER SAYS SEIZURES SET EXAMPLE—HAILS GRABS AS MODEL FOR LATIN AMERICA

HAVANA, CUBA, August 10.—Cuban nationalization of U.S. business property sets a singular example for all the peoples of Latin America, President Osvaldo Dorticos told cheering crowds Wednesday in the Workers Palace.

He reminded the gathering that there still are American-owned properties left that can be seized.

Expressing thanks for Russian aid to Cuba, Dorticos said:

"We accept and are grateful for * * * the decision of a power that offers us its nuclear arms for the defense of our territory."

WILL CHOOSE FRIENDS

This was a reference to a recent implied Russian threat to attack the United States with missiles if there is U.S. armed intervention in Cuba.

He said Cuba will continue to choose whatever friends it wants to, "although this produces insomnia for the gentlemen of the State Department."

Cubans were to throw 26 coffins, representing American companies seized by the Castro government, into the sea Wednesday night during a labor rally. Labor unions have proclaimed this a "week of popular jubilation" in celebration of the nationalization.

It did not appear likely that ailing Premier Fidel Castro would speak. His whereabouts have been unknown since his Saturday night talk.

OPENS ATTACK ON OAS

Dorticos launched a bitter attack on the Organization of American States [OAS] meeting called for August 16 in Costa Rica. He said the meeting was "a perfidious international maneuver * * * to attack our fatherland and our revolution."

If OAS and North American forces were to invade Cuba, there would be two alternatives, said Dorticos—"either the defeat of the invasion and the final triumph of the revolution or the death of 6 million Cubans."

Dorticos said that Fidel Castro's regime will continue respecting all religious cults despite so-called provocations.

CLOSING THREATENED

The President made no specific mention of the Roman Catholic hierarchy's pastoral letter last Sunday warning of the advance of communism in Cuba.

Nor did he refer to the threat Tuesday by the archbishop coadjutor of Havana to close all Catholic churches on the island and suspend church services unless the government calls off pro-Castro demonstrators harassing anti-Communist churchgoers.

But in an apparent reference to the pastoral letter, Dorticos said: "Those imputations will fall into a void and they will be applauded only by those who have interests that demand that applause."

The President accused counterrevolutionaries and proimperialists of wielding religious sentiments against the Cuban revolution.

"They are useless maneuvers and will destroy themselves," Dorticos asserted. "All this will have to be defeated * * * our energies must be reserved for greater battles."

PROSPECTIVE VISIT BY PREMIER KHRUSHCHEV TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, David Lawrence, in his column entitled "Khrushchev Should Stay Home," which appeared in the August 11, 1960, issue of the Washington Evening Star, has with great accuracy analyzed Khrushchev's present position. If only the Russian people could have the benefit of Mr. Lawrence's analysis there would be a new premier in Russia in short order.

Although it has long been apparent that discussion with the Communists avails little, new hopes were raised in the new approach of cordiality rising from Khrushchev's visit here, the proposed visit of President Eisenhower to the Soviet Union, and the projected summit conference. But those hopes were rudely dashed by the sabotaging of the summit conference on the slender excuse of the U–2 incident and the subsequent withdrawal of the invitation to our President to visit Russia. Mr. Khrushchev has destroyed for himself whatever position for conferring he may have had and no further attempts for a summit conference can be entertained as long as he is in a position to be a spokesman for his country. His shabby propaganda trick of coming to this country again in the guise of attending the United Nations General Assembly will, as Mr. Lawrence predicts, only backfire. He will, of course, not be visiting this country officially, but will only be here because this happens to be the meeting place of the United Nations.

Mr. Lawrence's article is so deserving of thoughtful consideration that I am asking unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KHRUSHCHEV SHOULD STAY HOME—RED DICTATOR BELIEVED DUE FOR SURPRISES IF HE COMES TO U.N. IN NEW YORK

(By David Lawrence)

President Eisenhower has been told he cannot visit the Soviet Union, but Nikita Khrushchev has virtually announced that he may come next month to the United States.

This anomaly arises from the fact that the Soviet Premier implies that he is planning to attend the meeting of the U.N. General Assembly in New York. Theoretically, he wouldn't be coming officially to the United States at all. For he hasn't been invited.

The manuever is plainly propaganda. But it could turn out to be of benefit to the free world. The opportunity could arise for demonstrations by the American people that would tell the people of Soviet Russia they need a new ruler. They could learn that their present Premier has lost whatever influence he might have had for the cause of peace by his boorish and insulting tactics at the summit conference in Paris in May. As a practical matter, no American President, Republican or Democratic, will venture in the future to sit down with Nikita Khrushchev. He has insulted not only the President of the United States but the man who happens to have led the Allied forces which saved the Russian people from Nazi conquest in World War II.

Today Mr. Khrushchev stands out as the enemy of his own people—a destructive influence in world affairs which can only mean increasing hardships for the Soviet people. They have to give more and more of their labor to armament for war, thus losing the benefits of a higher standard of living. They are deprived of their freedoms because of the Khrushchev dictatorship, which has attempted to justify such restrictions on the ground that an international emergency requires austerity and the giving up of everything, including freedom of the individual.

Mr. Khrushchev's big blunder was his miscalculation in the field of diplomacy. He came to America in the autumn of 1959 and gave the world the impression that the critical issues between the East and West could be settled or at least be kept from involving the world in a nuclear war. He placed emphasis on personal conference and consultations. Even many skeptics inside the United States were compelled for the moment to adopt a wait-and-see attitude and to go along with the President's policy of trying to work out agreements at a summit conference or at the sessions at Geneva of such groups as the disarmament commission.

But this whole trend was suddenly reversed by Nikita Khrushchev, who used the U–2 incident as an excuse. The record shows that Russia has since shot down an American plane over international waters. If there had been no U–2 incident, what would Moscow have said if the President had refused to continue to meet with Nikita Khrushchev now because of the latest plane episode?

The fact is that, if the heads of government really desire to make settlements on any outstanding issues, disputes over the flights of reconnaissance planes need not be an obstacle.

But the Soviet Premier, by his attitude toward President Eisenhower, has made further conferences out of the question. Nor can Vice President NIXON or Senator KENNEDY fraternize with Mr. Khrushchev. The American people not only would strongly disapprove of it, but they wouldn't put any faith in Mr. Khrushchev's signature or his spoken word.

So, for all practical purposes, there can be no entente or basis for agreement between the East and West so long as Nikita Khrushchev is head of the Soviet Government. The sooner the Russian people come to understand that they need a new ambassador at large to replace the Soviet Premier, the faster will the world be able to come to some agreement on limitation of arms and measures to prevent a nuclear war.

For today one man—Nikita Khrushchev—threatens the peace of the world, and the innocent victims inevitably would include the people of the Soviet Union. They have the power by concerted action to force Mr. Khrushchev out of office and to choose a ruler in whom the West will have confidence.

If Mr. Khrushchev comes here in September—in the midst of our presidential campaign—he is due for some surprises. He may think he will be embarrassing both party candidates. Actually, they would not hesitate to denounce the reckless disregard of human rights by the Communist dictatorship, not only in the Soviet Union but in the captive states. There are references in both platforms to the tragic plight of the satellite countries. Mr. Khrushchev will be better advised to stay home.

ALIENATING FRIENDS OVER KATANGA

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, Constantine Brown in his column entitled "Alienating Friends Over Katanga," which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of August 11, 1960, has made a most penetrating analysis in regard to some of the current situations in the African Congo and the United Nations reactions to them. In particular, he is properly critical of this country's vote in the United Nations to send United Nations troops into the Katanga Province over the protest of the local government. As Mr. Brown suggests, we could have at least abstained from voting, as France and Italy did, thus preserving Western solidarity and not giving offense to the Belgian Government from which there have already been repercussions.

There is no question but what the Congo is in a period of great crisis and the way in which the difficulties there are solved will have impact on the whole world. More wise and sober thinking, like Mr. Brown's, should be brought to bear on the matters needing solution in order that stability may be brought to this area as soon as possible.

Mr. President, for the benefit of all those who may read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I ask unanimous consent at this point to have printed in the body of the RECORD the full text of Mr. Brown's column.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALIENATING FRIENDS OVER KATANGA—U.S. ABSTENTION ON SENDING U.N. TROOPS HELD PREFERABLE TO STAND WE TOOK

(By Constantine Brown)

This week's developments at the United Nations have shown once more that we have a knack of alienating friends, the showing having been made when we voted in favor of sending U.N. troops into Katanga.

From the technical point of view, it would not have made much difference if we had abstained, as France and Italy did. But from the practical point of view of demonstrating the solidarity of the Western alliance, it might have been helpful to follow the example of those two NATO allies.

Belgian public opinion is deeply hurt at our action. To show its discontent, the Belgian Government has ordered the reduction of its contributions to NATO. These are not great—two small divisions. But Belgium is a small country and has never been expected to do more.

There was no real objection in Brussels against sending U.N. forces into the Congo when the situation had become chaotic immediately after its declaration of independence. This was in keeping with the charter to which Belgium, with all other members, had subscribed in 1945. But sending U.N. troops into Katanga was the result of a policy of fright caused by the Soviet Union's saber rattlings. Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold spelled this out when he stated that there is a real danger of war, and "I don't mean only local war."

The U.N. is supposed to represent a moral superpower to which all its members must bow. Moscow decided long ago that this does not apply to the Soviet Union and its satellites. Katanga had a right to break away from the part of the Congo which was under the rule of Patrice Lumumba, an evident Moscow stooge. There was no trouble in Katanga. Its inhabitants and the white settlers live peacefully together. Law and order prevail. Nothing but the threatening shadow of Moscow justified the decision of the Security Council to send troops into a territory where a handful of Belgian troops was kept at the request of the Katanga government. That government had never asked for the U.N. protection. It actually opposed it. Yet, the U.N. forces are being forced down those people's throats. And we have become a party to that.

What we actually did by not abstaining was to facilitate the establishment of the Iron Curtain in another segment of the world. We have had information for at least 2 years that the Soviet Union intended to use Africa as part of her long-planned air communication from Moscow to the Antarctic via Cairo and Khartoum. This plan, to be performed through peaceful penetration, did not work out with sufficient speed and satisfaction. Hence, the adoption of the plan to help the newly created central African Republics get rid of the white colonialists by violent revolutionary methods. The unusually easy-going Congolese people, headed by the ex-convict, Lumumba, who has fallen into the Red trap as much as Fidel Castro has in Cuba, were worked into a frenzy and perpetrated outrages, not only against the whites but also against their own people.

The establishment of the Soviet influence supported by Chinese teams of "technical advisers" is not confined to the Congolese. It merely set the example there to other African leaders that it is "profitable" to be on the side of international communism. Other newly independent African Republics have received special attention from the Kremlin. The Soviet ambassador in Guinea, where President Sekou Toure used to be a card-carrying Communist, was President Nasser's adviser in the Suez crisis. He is directing the show in Guinea more than Mr. Toure himself.

Moscow's violent intervention in the present African crisis is intended to influence and intimidate other African leaders into following the Kremlin. By this grandstand attitude, Mr. Khrushchev expects to demonstrate graphically to other still uncommitted nations that there is no point in seeking the West's friendship and cooperation (except for American dollar support without strings).

The present developments have proved that the Soviet Union can get away with what it wants. Unless there is a change of heart on our part, it eventually will dominate Africa.

COMPETITION FOR CULTURE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the vital role of American cultural expression in the fight against communism not only for the new nations of Africa and Asia but also for Latin America is underestimated and underrated too often in our own country. It is easy to concentrate on the more absolute results of scientific development and to lose sight of the influence and value of music and the other arts as expressions of our culture and democratic civilization. We cannot allow this to happen; in this respect our exchange activities with other countries demand our best.

I believe that a U.S. Arts Foundation created along the lines of legislation which I have introduced can help substantially in the promotion and wider dissemination of all our cultural expressions. We are only beginning to show our theater and music abroad while the Soviet Union has been doing it for years. Inadequate appropriations plus the lack of a national arts policy limit our own opportunities.

An example of the difficulties we meet in this connection is provided by the experience of the New York Philharmonic and its conductor, Leonard Bernstein, during their Latin American tour. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the column describing this and other events, by Michael O'Neill entitled "Capital Circus" which appeared in the New York Daily News, August 2.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPITAL CIRCUS

(By Michael O'Neill)

WASHINGTON, August 1.—A discouraging tale of U.S. bungling in South America, relayed to us by a reliable informant, illustrates how urgently our foreign policy operations require overhauling to meet the challenge so eloquently described by Vice President NIXON and Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY.

What has happened in South America is repeated, with variations, all over the world. It not only reflects islands of incompetence here and there, but more importantly, symbolizes a system and an attitude which frustrate competence and virtually insure that our oversea performance will fall short of our needs.

Although South America is not a hotspot at the moment, it is very much an active cold war battleground. A country like Chile, for example, would have fallen under leftist control in the last elections if it hadn't been for a local political campaign by a Catholic priest who drained off 40,000 votes. The whole continent could fall if the United States doesn't give the Communists more and smarter competition.

Consider a seemingly unimportant matter like music, which Latins happen to take much more seriously than we do. In one country, when the director of the national symphony was invited to Russia this spring, he begged off with the excuse that he was already committed to a U.S. tour.

There was only one hitch. The invitation that he had or thought he had from the U.S. Government never panned out. In return for snubbing the Russians, he received only rebuff and embarrassment. Many of his fellow citizens shared his bitterness.

The Latin American tour of Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic revealed another defect in U.S. operations. Tickets to a performance in one country were pegged at $5 each, well beyond the limit of any but the wealthy and socially elite. At a later public concert, the prices were shaved to between 40 and 80 cents, but even then they were undercut by the Communists.

A Russian ballet troupe priced its performances at 25 cents and often gave neighborhood benefits for nothing. Chinese Communist acrobats traveled extensively, giving free performances in parks and factories—everywhere they might reach the masses. They weren't interested in impressing diplomats or aristocrats.

THE CHURCHES OF AMERICA FIGHT THE OBSCENITY RACKET

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, Senate passage on June 30 of this year of S. 3736, the so-called Mundt-Scott bill, jointly introduced by my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and myself, and on which many of our colleagues joined as cosponsors, can be marked as a great victory for the churches of America.

I am prompted to make this statement after reading another excellent article on this problem in one of our leading church publications, and believe it should be pointed out as to where a great deal of the credit should be given.

I am convinced that if it had not been for the churches of all denominations throughout the country—including my home State—the support for this legislation would not have been developed to the point where it resulted in successful Senate action.

I can speak from the personal experience of reading hundreds of letters from my own constituents in South Dakota who urged that prompt action be taken on this distressing problem of obscene and noxious materials flooding the mails and reaching the impressionable minds of youth in other manner and form.

Time after time these letters would refer to a sermon that had been given by their local minister, or a bulletin issued by their parish priest, or meetings of local ministerial councils in which this problem was given a thorough airing, and I can only conclude that the passage of this legislation is due in great part to the aroused anger of the public against this vicious blight upon the nation's morals.

Church groups have adopted resolutions calling for approval of this legislation. Ministers have written me asking that something be done to stop this terrible racket. As a result, we have achieved partial victory in moving this legislation toward the final achievement of becoming written law, establishing a special commission of private citizens and public officials to develop a coordinated program of action to combat this traffic in filth. The Mundt-Scott bill has passed the Senate.

The remaining task rests with the House, and I am hopeful that the members of the other body will likewise—as did the Senate—heed the cry for constructive steps and adopt this important measure.

Mr. President, earlier in my remarks I mentioned the work of the churches in taking steps to stop this nefarious activity. I wish now to call to the attention of my colleagues one example of the fine, constructive efforts being carried on.

I have here an article which appeared in the July 26, 1960, issue of the Lutheran Witness, a biweekly publication of the Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod, published by the Concordia Publishing House, 3558 South Jefferson Avenue, St. Louis, Mo.

This article is written by Oscar E. Feucht and is an example of the many articles and editorials which have appeared in church publications as well as other organizational magazines.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOU CAN DO SOMETHING ABOUT OBSCENITY

(By Oscar E. Feucht)

A worried father recently sent our Family Life Committee a magazine filled with lewd pictures and offcolor jokes. He had purchased it at a neighborhood store where young people of the community gather and page through the latest magazines and comic books. What the father found in this particular magazine horrified him. With the issue came a short note containing this plea: "Can't our church do something about this?"

There are many such worried parents who feel helpless before the menace of pornographic literature. They recognize in it a growing threat to American morals which can damage beyond repair the minds of some young people.

TO COUNTERACT THE MENACE

The church cannot sit idly by while such forces of immorality are tearing down what the Christian home and church are trying to build up. Synod has asked the Family Life Committee to help congregations take judicious and effective countermeasures. Delegates to the 1959 convention of the National Lutheran Parent-Teacher League likewise voiced deep concern. They called on parents' groups everywhere to promote decent literature and to take measures to curb the nefarious trade in obscenity.

To give leadership for counteracting this menace, the Family Life Committee has selected a subcommittee on offensive literature. Heading the group is Dr. Leonard J. Dierker, superintendent of education of the western district and member of the St. Louis Mayor's Committee for Juvenile Readers. He will be assisted by Mrs. Gladys Colba, a Lutheran schoolteacher, and Emil Benz, president of the National Lutheran Parent-Teacher League.

GUIDE FOR STUDY AND ACTION

A 16-page pamphlet, "The Church Looks at Immorality in Print and on the Screen," prepared by the Board of Christian Social Action of the American Lutheran Church, has been reissued by Synod's Board of Parish Education. It is being used to point up the problem and to arouse concerted church and community action. All delegates to conventions of the 32 North American districts are receiving sample copies.

This pamphlet calls attention to the intensity of the problem, which is seen by decent-minded Americans as an attack on moral, spiritual, and religious values and as a threat to community health and well-being. It outlines avenues of individual and community action, long-range programs of education, and the church's role in dealing with the problem.

Congregations, parents' groups, and men's and women's groups are urged to use this pamphlet as a guide for study and effective action. At the low cost of $4 per hundred copies (5 cents single copy), it should receive the widest distribution. Order directly from the Board of Parish Education, 210 North Broadway, St. Louis, Mo.

WHAT IS OBSCENE?

Not all literature, plays, or movies which treat sex are to be labeled offensive. Purely biological treatments, such as are found in books on sex education, serve a useful purpose. Even the Bible sometimes refers to sexual incidents, yet never in a way that makes immorality attractive.

Sex literature that is chiefly historical and sociological also has its place. Sex belongs to God's order of creation and is to be used according to God's plan for the good of mankind. Obscene literature, however, flagrantly disregards God's intention for the use of sex and corrupts public morals.

The Supreme Court of the United States gives a definition of obscenity that is clear and forceful: "A thing is obscene if, considered as a whole, its predominant appeal is to prurient interests, i.e., a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex, or excretion, and if it goes substantially beyond customary limits of candor in description or representation of such matters."

Pornography presents a caricature and perversion of sex. Its whole tone and spirit is salacious; it parades illicit sex in story and picture and glamorizes immorality. Because obscene literature disregards divine law and the accepted social code, it undermines the moral and social health of the community. It mars the wholesome regard for persons of the other sex and the Christian approach to love and marriage.

Caution should be exercised, however, lest we condemn all books or art dealing with sex with a pseudobiblical puritanism on the one hand, or become callous and insensitive to the obscene and offensive on the other. Injudicious action can lead to hysteria campaigns which frequently do more harm than good.

ALERT TO THE DANGER

Many parents are unaware that the danger exists. Agents of such literature carry on their work furtively. They use every trick and subterfuge to get it into the hands of children and youth. They prey on the normal desire of young people for sex knowledge, on their morbid curiosity and sensual lust.

Children will also keep such material under cover. Sensitive parents hesitate to talk about it. When they discover that their children have been "taken in" by peddlers of smut, many parents are so emotionally upset that they hardly know what to say or do. For this reason adults must be well informed.

To expose this underground in filth and, at the same time, to help clean it up, get copies of "The Church Looks at Immorality in Print and on the Screen." Pass it on to neighbors and other parents. Inform yourself through articles that have appeared in the Lutheran Witness, American Lutheran, Christian Parent, This Day, Reader's Digest, etc.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

The first line of action against offensive printed materials starts with you. Here is what you can do:

1. If such literature comes to your home through the mails, take it at once, together with the envelope in which it came, to your local postmaster, or mail it to him with your complaint.

2. If you have seen such obscene literature for sale in your town, talk to the dealer. Ask him if he knows the nature of it and what damage it can do to the youth of the community. If the objectionable material is not removed in due time, write a letter to your newspaper. If the dealer does remove the obscene items, a letter to the paper commending the dealer will help the cause.

3. Associate yourself with a decent-literature council in your community—or help establish one. Many responsible citizens will be interested—newspaper editors and columnists, teachers, church leaders, parents, officers of the PTA, leaders of boys' and girls' clubs, and other public-spirited persons. This group can appear before the city council or the mayor to lodge a protest and offer constructive help.

4. Read and study the ordinances of your State concerning obscene literature. Support local and State legislation. Get legal advice and help. Judges report that the offenders go to considerable expense to hire legal help while often the righteous citizenry is not even represented at hearings or trials.

5. As a member of a church group, parent-teacher league, couples' club, women's or men's society, you can bring this matter to the attention of fellow members. Elect a committee to work with others in the congregation under the leadership of the pastor in combating this menace.

6. See to it that your home and your church inculcate a Christian sense of values in the children and youth of the congregation with a planned program of Christian family life education. A new tract, "A Christian View of Sex," by Prof. Harry G. Coiner, chairman of the Family Life Committee, should be read by every father, mother, and teenager. In cooperation with other parents you can encourage your congregation's board for parish education to introduce a program of Christian sex education for the upper grades and confirmation classes.

ARE YOU CONCERNED?

Those experienced in dealing with this problem warn against giving pornographic literature undue publicity, which invariably attracts more attention to it. They suggest working quietly but effectively with those who are distributing and selling the material by following accepted legal procedures and sound judgment.

Don't say, "This is not my business," or "Christians should have nothing to do with this filth." True, we cannot legislate morality or build the kingdom of Christ with blue laws against indecent literature. But we can and must help keep wholesome the community in which our children and youth are reared.

Here, too, Luther's words about lustful thoughts have their application: "You can't keep the birds from flying over your head, but you can keep them from building nests in your hair."

The church cannot be silent. The church acts when its people act. When the individual Christian is concerned, when he becomes informed, when he speaks out firmly and clearly, he is bearing positive witness not only to the sixth commandment and to God who gave it, but also to the new life which is his in Christ.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, the bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act, now before the Senate, is our latest effort to strengthen one of the most basic laws that serve as a foundation of the American economy. This proposal, to increase the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour and to extend wage and hour protection to about 5 million additional workers, is the latest in a long series of improvements over the years.

In some respects the bill now before us falls short of what is needed to protect many workers who still will have no basic protection from starvation wages or exploitation of their labor.

However, I think it is a tribute to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] who, as chairman of the Labor Subcommittee, fought long and hard to prevent the bill's emasculation. Senator KENNEDY's leadership of this bill in committee, and now before the full Senate, demonstrates his concern that every American must have a better opportunity to enjoy this Nation's wealth and productivity.

As a member of the subcommittee which has produced this bill, I know full well of the tremendous pressures that come to play when we seek to improve the protective features of the wage and hour law. I have received thousands of letters and talked with countless people about the merits of the bill. Most of this exchange has been good and motivated by a sincere desire to point out legitimate problems that would confront people who are covered by the bill. I have enjoyed these discussions.

But some of the pressure which has been exerted has been motivated by less noble factors. There are still, unfortunately, a number of citizens in this land who wish no progress at all if it will, in any way, cut down their own enjoyment of the status quo. It was clear that the only bill acceptable to these groups was no bill at all.

I think it is important that the Senate realize that the bill before it already contains many compromises. We have come a long way since this bill was first introduced, and during that journey many of the original passengers were allowed to get off. For many of the other travelers we cut the fare to the point where they now will enjoy almost a "free ride."

Nevertheless, I certainly am not ashamed of this measure. It will provide a start toward a decent life for millions of people who have traditionally been excluded from America's economic growth. It will help create a national prosperity, not one in which pockets of poverty force us to describe our economic health in sectional terms.

This bill is, as Senator KENNEDY stated, legislation that the national conscience and good business demands.

In the months ahead, months already under the shadow of disturbing economic indicators, these improvements in the wage and hour law can serve as a permanent support to the economy.

We have heard, and we will again, many cries of the alleged "ruinous" effect of the minimum wage law on employers. Experience has proven conclusively, however, that such fearful warnings bear little relation to reality.

The Senate is now engaged in some of its most important work—and our Nation will be the stronger for our efforts.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, my view is that liberalization and expansion of the minimum wage law is needed. I support the pending legislative proposal.

I shall, of course, listen to arguments on amendments as they are offered, and shall vote in accord with my conscience for or against such amendments.

I stand foursquare in support of the platform pledge of the Democratic Party to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour; to extend coverage to several millions of workers not now protected; to provide further improvements in the wage, hour, and coverage standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act; to extend its benefits to all workers employed in industries engaged in or affecting interstate commerce; and to raise its standards to keep up with our general economic progress and needs.

Mr. President, 22 years ago, following the great depression, Congress enacted the Fair Labor Standards Act, declaring it would be national policy to achieve, as rapidly as possible, minimum wage levels necessary for the maintenance of the health, efficiency, and well-being of American workers.

This is one of the many imprints which that great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, left upon the pages of the history of this country. Those who opposed his policies said he was regimenting the American people. But as we know, Mr. President, his first administration began in March 1933, following a Republican administration which had regimented the greatest army of unemployed the world had ever seen. President Roosevelt called this beneficent legislation the keystone of the labor policy of his administration.

Mr. President, it was far more than that. For the first time an America which told every man that he could rise to whatever heights his ability would take him became an America which held forth the promise of a decent standard of living to the poorest of its citizens. It became a part of our national policy to help give a lift to the fellow at the bottom of the economic ladder.

Since that time, Congress has twice acted to boost the minimum wage. In 1949 it was increased to 75 cents and 5 years ago, to a dollar an hour. Whatever fears existed that a higher minimum wage would adversely affect marginal employers have long disappeared.

Mr. President, the accusations that this legislation is going to result in the closing down of certain businesses or in unemployment or in State socialism, and the rest of the tired old charges, have been proven false time and time again.

Those with vested interests and those with little imagination made the same charges in 1938 when the first minimum wage law was passed; in 1949 and again in 1955. Each time, they were proven wrong.

If the Congress had listened to these prophets of doom in the past, we would not have a social security law. Incidentally, the 25th anniversary of the social security law will be celebrated on August 14 of this year. We would not have a Fair Labor Standards Act. We would not have any of the beneficent legislation passed during the administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman.

Although the Republican Party came into power in 1952 with the election of Dwight D. Eisenhower and with a majority in both branches of Congress, not one of the commonly termed "New Deal laws" was repealed. This year, if any candidate of the Grand Old Party, of which I am not a member, were to advocate the repeal of even one of those great measures, such as Social Security, or the Fair Labor Standards Act, both of which were opposed by members of the Republican Party at the time of their enactment, the candidate advocating such would not carry even one State in the Union.

Extensive studies by the Department of Labor, and by private research organizations, have shown that the minimum wage law has had no appreciable impact either upon prices or on unemployment in the low-paying industries.

The time has long passed for an overhauling of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It is universally recognized that American industry can easily support at least a $1.15 per hour minimum wage and that this can be raised to $1.25 within 2 years.

Mr. President, we are the richest nation in the world. We have the longest tail fins on our cars, many of which are manufactured in that great city of Detroit, where the present Presiding Officer of the Senate, the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], lives. We have the greatest material resources a nation has ever known. In the midst of this abundance, almost one-fourth of our people are living at or near the poverty level, unable to afford good health care, good housing, proper food, and proper clothing.

They are employed, but no matter how long or how hard they may work, they cannot earn enough to meet the basic needs of daily living. Behind the facade of prosperity, there is the cold fact that one out of seven households had incomes of less than $2,000 last year.

Even $1.25 an hour will bring this figure to only $2,600 a year. This is low enough. The Department of Labor estimates that a worker needs more than $2 an hour to support a family of four with a minimum decent standard of living. For a single woman living alone, various State agencies have computed that $2,500 a year is the minimum required for a decent budget.

At the present time, business establishments which pay less than $1 an hour are, in reality, being subsidized by the taxpayers. People earning less than that amount in many cases have to depend upon welfare agencies supported by public funds. We must not continue this practice of subjecting productive workers to poverty and degradation.

These workers form a distinct class in our society. They are a class condemned to poverty without the progress and the power of other American workers. This poverty is then translated into slums, delinquency, and disease. In order to combat these evils, taxpayers are called upon to pay higher taxes at all levels of Government.

It would be impossible to equate these evils in terms of dollars and cents. It can truly be said, however, that our failure to provide all our workers with a realistic minimum wage is costing and will continue to cost taxpayers billions of dollars each year.

It will cost not only money, but also the loss of spirit, the loss of vitality, and the decline in the well-being of millions of our fellow Americans.

Mr. President, some 20 million wage earners are currently not protected by the Fair Labor Standards Act. Equally urgent with raising the minimum wage is broadening the coverage of the law to include millions of workers not now protected.

Originally this act applied to certain workers in the fields of manufacturing, mining, wholesale trade, finance, insurance, and transportation.

In the expanding America of the 1960's, coverage should be extended to millions of workers who are not now protected. Not to do so would be to make a travesty of our boasts of great prosperity for all our citizens.

The time to extend the act to employees in retail and service establishments is long overdue. For the time being, I would favor that such action be limited to large businesses doing a volume of $1 million and more a year.

There persists the myth that retail trade is a local enterprise. This belief is as outmoded as the horse and buggy, the mustache cups and the tallow dips of our forefathers.

Recently, the First National City Bank of New York published a report on the net income of leading corporations in 1959. According to this report, the assets of the 246 largest retail and mail-order chain stores were in excess of $8 billion and their net income amounted to $945 million—an increase of 15 percent above the previous year. There is nothing local about these billion dollar corporations with outlets in hundreds, and even thousands, of areas.

Similarly, there is nothing local about multi-million dollar plush hotels employing thousands of people, with facilities in many cities throughout the country. To me, it appears somewhat immoral that centers of luxury should fail to pay even $1 an hour to their employees.

The fact is, however, that over a million workers in large retail stores and hotels throughout the Nation receive less than this.

We must bring these workers under the coverage of the minimum wage law for the first time, at $1 an hour, at the least. Provision must be made that it be increased every year until, after 4 years, they achieve a $1.25 minimum.

Otherwise, Mr. President, we face the creation within our society, of a depressed class—people condemned to a way of life that will continue to fall behind the standards enjoyed by Americans as a whole.

Mr. President, the goods and services of employers who pay adequate wages must compete with those produced by the unscrupulous who pay substandard wages. A realistic minimum wage will bring added prosperity to our businessmen, as well as to their employees. It will protect and develop their markets.

People will have more money to spend, and will spend it on necessities. The fair-minded employer will no longer be at a disadvantage with those who would depress wages to their lowest point.

Mr. President, America can no longer tolerate having millions of its citizens condemned to a caste which virtually prevents their bettering their lives and those of their families.

Mr. President, we must raise the minimum wage and extend its coverage to additional millions of Americans. This we must do in the name of sound economy and good conscience; and in the cause of democracy and for the welfare of our country.

Mr. KEATING obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield briefly to me, with the understanding that in doing so he will not lose the floor?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, yesterday I spoke at some length, and indicated support for a 3-year increase in the minimum wage to $1.25, as proposed in the pending bill. I spoke at some length regarding my own feelings on the justification for, and the importance of, having the Federal Government set a living wage for all Americans.

Mr. President, I concede that I did not speak with the eloquence of some of my colleagues. Furthermore, I spoke without a great deal of preparation. My remarks were made then under a request that I speak at that particular time, although I had not quite finished reviewing the pending bill.

This morning, the newspapers and the airwaves report the debate which occurred on yesterday on the floor of the Senate, and highlight the fact that a number of my Republican colleagues oppose the pending bill.

I wish to make it perfectly clear, Mr. President, that many Senators on this side of the aisle, like myself, are basically very sympathetic to, and support, amendments to the minimum wage law. Not only are there Republican Senators who are agreed on this proposed legislation, and favor it, but the administration has long favored improving and extending our Fair Labor Standards Act.

It was a part of the program presented to us by the President earlier this year and a part of the program which he reiterated, when this special session opened, as needing action at this time.

I desire to quote briefly from a statement which Secretary Mitchell made in February 1957, in testifying before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Subcommittee. He said:

> This administration is vitally interested in bringing the protection of the act to many additional workers who do not now have it but who could properly and practicably be brought within the act's protection.
> Within the area in which Federal action in establishing and maintaining minimum wage standards is clearly appropriate, we believe action should be taken promptly.

I wish to make it abundantly clear, Mr. President, that the improvement of our Fair Labor Standards Act is not something to which Republicans as a party are opposed. Indeed, exactly the contrary, because the Republican platform adopted at Chicago, which has the wholehearted backing of the Republican candidates for President and Vice President, pledges—and I quote—"upward revision in amount and extended coverage of the minimum wage to several million more workers."

Let us not forget, Mr. President, that our colleagues on the other side of the aisle are not completely unified in support of the bill which is before the Senate. We heard yesterday from a number of prominent Members on the other side expressing their strong opposition to the concept of the minimum wage and to the bill before us now. And yet, to read the papers and to listen to the air waves this morning, it would appear that all the opposition to this bill comes from Republicans. I think the record should be clearly set forth on that subject.

I discussed yesterday, Mr. President, New York's minimum wage legislation. New York has always had some legislation in this vital area. The New York minimum wage bill was passed a year before the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted.

Under the leadership of Governor Rockefeller, amendments were passed this year to raise New York State's minimum wage rate to $1 and to extend coverage to 700,000 additional workers.

My purpose in rising at this moment was to remind the Senate that the issue before us on this measure is not a partisan one. It is by no means a question of one party being for and the other party being against. Both parties have in their platforms in varying language, included pledges to enact minimum wage amendments. I hope the American people realize this; and I would be very much distressed if differences in degree were being presented to our Nation as differences in basic philosophy. I hope that is not the case.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I heard the distinguished Senator refer to the Wage-Hour Act of New York State. Some time ago I was familiar with the act then prevailing in his State, but I have not had a chance to study the details of the recently enacted law. Will the Senator, as briefly as he may, state those details at this time, or at some time that is convenient to him during his comments?

Mr. KEATING. It is my intention to include at the conclusion of my remarks on this subject a summary of the main outlines of the provisions of the new act, prepared by Mr. Abraham E. Klein, associate economist with the New York State Department of Labor. I shall be very happy to go into them in some detail now, but I think the complete answer to the Senator's question will appear in the RECORD, if that is time enough for him. If he prefers, I shall be glad to go into the details now.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator. I think to have them in the RECORD would be generally satisfactory if I might ask one additional question.

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the new act preserve the differential or distinction in minimum wage between the larger cities and the smaller cities and towns?

Mr. KEATING. So far as I am aware, from this summary—and the Senator will realize that I was so seriously involved in the Federal Legislature that I was not able too closely to attend to what the State legislature did—there was no change in the law on that subject.

Mr. HOLLAND. And the present act, as the Senator now believes, does retain a distinction in wage and hour provision between the larger cities and the smaller cities and towns?

Mr. KEATING. Subject to correction if I am wrong, my impression is that there are provisions which might have this effect and which pertain to allowances for living expenses and meals. These are still in the basic law of New York. I do not have that law before me. I do not want to make an inaccurate statement, but I believe as far as these provisions are concerned, the Senator's observation is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator for his observation.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD there be inserted the summary prepared by Mr. Klein to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK'S $1 MINIMUM WAGE LAW—SUMMARY OUTLINES MAIN PROVISIONS OF NEW ACT

(By Abraham E. Klein)

The new State minimum wage law provides that on and after October 1, 1960, a wage of at least $1 an hour must be paid to all employees in the State, with certain specified exceptions.

Allowance from this statutory $1 minimum for tips received by employees, and for meals, lodging, apparel and other such items supplied by the employer may be permitted to the extent determined by the industrial commissioner.

Higher minimums may be established after October 1, 1960, through an industry-by-industry wage board procedure.

The former law is repealed and a new minimum wage law enacted (art. 19 of the New York labor law). The main provisions of the new enactment follow:

GENERAL COVERAGE AND EXEMPTIONS

Formerly, a State minimum wage applied only to industries covered by a specific minimum wage order. The 10 industries covered by a minimum wage order are: retail trade, restaurant, hotel, building service, amusement and recreation, laundry, dry cleaning, beauty service, confectionery, and counsellors in children's camps.

The new law extends minimum wage protection to all employees in the State with certain exceptions. Exempted from the statutory minimum of $1 an hour and from any minimum wage order are the following:

(a) Domestic service in the home of the employer.

(b) Individuals working in labor on a farm.

(c) Executives, administrators, and professionals.

(d) Outside salesmen and taxicab drivers.

(e) Members of religious orders and ministers.

(f) Governmental employees.

(g) Employees to whom the Federal minimum wage provisions are applicable. (The Federal minimum is $1 an hour and applies to employees engaged in interstate commerce, or in the production of goods in interstate commerce.)

(h) Work for a nonprofit institution which is exclusively religious, charitable, or educational by: volunteers; persons whose work is incidental to or in return for charitable aid received from a religious or charitable institution; learners and apprentices; students at the nonprofit institution where they work; and persons whose earning capacity is impaired by age, physical or mental deficiency or injury.

It should be noted that students, learners, apprentices, and handicapped persons working for profitmaking firms are not exempted from the law. A student working part time in a retail store, for example, is covered by the law and must receive at least $1 an hour. The industrial commissioner, however, may provide for rates lower than the minimum for learners, apprentices, and handicapped persons in profitmaking firms and for students in resort hotels and camps open not more than 6 months a year if necessary to prevent curtailment of employment opportunities, as described below.

The law states that the exemptions shall be as defined by regulations of the industrial commissioner.

NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Nonprofit organizations are specifically covered by the law, and their nonexempt employees will be governed by the provisions of the applicable order that will be issued by the commissioner, effective October 1, 1960. As in the case of other newly covered industries, the order may permit allowances from the $1 minimum for tips, and for meals, lodging, apparel and other such items supplied by the employer, in an amount determined by the commissioner. Also, the applicable order may contain regulations that the commissioner deems necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of the law and to safeguard the $1 minimum.

As indicated, work for nonprofit religious, charitable, or educational institutions by learners and apprentices, students at the institutions where they work, persons whose earning capacity is impaired by age, physical or mental deficiency or injury, volunteers, and recipients of charitable aid is exempted from the law and will not be covered by the applicable minimum wage order.

However, a nonprofit institution exclusively religious, charitable, or educational may elect to be exempt from any minimum wage order by filing with the commissioner a certificate under oath that it will pay on October 1, 1960, and will continue to pay, a cash wage of at least $1 an hour to all of its nonexempt employees. No allowances for tips, or for meals, lodging, apparel or other such items supplied by the employer are permitted from this cash wage of $1. A nonprofit institution desiring to make such election, will have to file the certificate on or before September 1, 1960.

If the commissioner finds that a nonprofit institution has failed to pay a $1 cash wage he may revoke the election, and the provisions of the applicable minimum wage order will govern the employees of the institution. A nonprofit institution may terminate voluntarily its election and be bound by the applicable wage order 60 days after notice to the commissioner. Nonprofit institutions organized after October 1, 1960, may avail themselves of the election by filing the certificate within 6 months of their organization.

Detailed regulations for the filing of exemption certificates will be issued during the coming weeks.

INDUSTRIES COVERED BY EXISTING WAGE ORDERS

The 10 existing minimum wage orders will remain in effect, except that any hourly rate in the orders of less than $1 an hour will be raised to $1 on October 1, 1960. As to nonhourly rates (unit rates, piece rates, weekly rates), the law states that such rates shall be modified by the commissioner, as he deems necessary or appropriate, to carry out the purposes of the law and to safeguard the $1 minimum.

The commissioner also is authorized to determine allowances for tips, and for meals, lodging, apparel, and other such items supplied by the employer; make necessary changes in the existing regulations in the orders; and issue such regulations as he deems necessary to prevent curtailment of employment opportunities for: learners and apprentices; persons whose earning capacity is impaired by age, physical or mental deficiency or injury; and for students in resort hotels and camps open not more than 6 months a year. The allowances and regulations will be issued after public hearings by the commissioner or a wage board.

INDUSTRIES NOT COVERED BY EXISTING WAGE ORDERS

All employees not exempted from the law and not subject to an existing minimum wage order will be covered by an order or orders of the commissioner, effective October 1, 1960, establishing a $1 an hour minimum. Allowances from the minimum in an amount determined by the commissioner may be permitted for tips, and for meals, lodging, apparel, and other such items supplied by the employer. The commissioner may issue such regulations as he deems necessary to prevent curtailment of employment opportunities for learners and apprentices, and for persons whose earning capacity is impaired by age, physical, or mental deficiency or injury. In addition, the commissioner is authorized to issue necessary or appropriate regulations to carry out the purposes of the law and to safeguard the $1 minimum. The allowances and regulations will be issued after public hearings by the commissioner or a wage board.

HIGHER MINIMUMS THROUGH WAGE BOARD PROCEDURE

After October 1, 1960, higher minimums for any industry may be established by wage board procedure.

The Commissioner may appoint a wage board to recommend minimum wages and regulations for employees in an occupation or occupations whose wages are insufficient to provide adequate maintenance and to protect health. A wage board will consist of an equal number (not more than three) of representatives of employers, employees, and the public. The board may delegate its functions to a tripartite panel of members, but the report and recommendations submitted to the commissioner must be approved by a majority of the whole board. The board must hold public hearings before submitting its report, and the report must be submitted within a maximum period of 90 days.

In recommending a minimum wage, the board must consider the cost of adequate maintenance, and also the value of the work performed and the wages paid for comparable work. The recommended wage cannot be more than the cost of adequate maintenance or less than $1 an hour. Lower rates may be recommended to prevent curtailment of employment opportunities for: learners and apprentices; persons whose earning capacity is impaired by age, physical or mental deficiency or injury; and for students in resort hotels and camps open not more than 6 months a year.

In addition to recommending wage rates, the board may recommend regulations to carry out the purposes of the law and to safeguard minimum wages. These regulations may include allowances from the minimum for tips, and for meals, lodging, apparel and other such items supplied by the employer; piece rates; overtime or part-time rates; waiting time and call-in pay rates; and provisions governing split shift, excessive spread of hours, and weekly guarantees.

Upon receiving the report and recommendations of the wage board, the commissioner will file the report with the secretary of the labor department and within 5 days, publish a notice of such filing in at least 10 newspapers of general circulation in the State. Within 15 days after such publication, any person may file objections with the commissioner, and if the commissioner deems it appropriate he may order oral argument. In any event, the commissioner must accept or reject the wage board's recommendations within 45 days after the filing of the wage board's report with the secretary of the department. If the commissioner accepts the board's wage recommendations, he will issue an order which will become effective 30 days after issuance. In such order the commissioner may modify any regulations recommended by the wage board.

APPEAL PROCEDURE

Any appeal from the commissioner's order to the board of standards and appeals must be taken within 90 days after the minimum wage order is issued. Appeals may be taken only on questions of law; the findings of the commissioner on questions of fact are final. The decision of the board of standards and appeals will be based on the record made before the wage board and commissioner and on oral argument, and will be rendered within 60 days. Court review of the decision of the board of standards and appeals is provided.

An employer appealing from a minimum wage order or regulation will have to post security with the board of standards and appeals if he wishes to stay proceedings against him pending determination of the appeal. The security may be either a bond or a bank deposit, and will have to be sufficient to guarantee payments to employees of any underpayments. The security could be waived by the board of standards and appeals when unnecessary to assure payments.

The law also provides for appeals from an order of the commissioner directing an employer to comply with a minimum wage order or regulation. If such appeal is not taken to the board of standards and appeals within 60 days, the commissioner's findings of fact and conclusions of law contained in the compliance order are final.

ENFORCEMENT

Employers must keep accurate records of the wages paid to all employees, the hours worked by employees covered by an hourly minimum wage rate and such other information as the commissioner deems necessary. The records must be available for inspection by department of labor investigators. Employers must permit labor department investigators to interview employees at the place of employment and during working hours on wages paid and hours worked. Employers also must post a digest and summary of the law or the applicable wage order.

Employees paid less than the minimum may bring a civil action against the employer or may assign their cause of action to the commissioner for suit.

An employment agency may not refer an applicant to a job paying less than the minimum wage.

Violation of law is a misdemeanor.

The new minimum wage law is chapter 619 of the laws of 1960. It was approved by Governor Rockefeller and became effective on April 18, 1960, although many provisions do not become applicable until October 1, 1960.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I was going to ask unanimous consent to include the New York minimum wage law at this point, but, I believe it is so long that it might unduly fill the RECORD. I shall therefore not make that request, but I have it available, and will be happy to make it available to the Senator from Florida or any other Senator who might be interested.

INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES IN THE UNITED STATES BY SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, it becomes increasingly clear that the heavy-handed tactics of the Soviets in summarily bouncing Americans right and left from Russia is part of a concerted drive to stir up world opinion on the eve of the trial of Francis Gary Powers. The transparency of this effort must be made clear to all, regardless of the skepticism many of us must feel about the fairness of the trial which is to be accorded the U–2 pilot.

The State Department is to be commended for the vigorous manner in which it has called to the attention of the world the blatant activities of the Soviets to roil the waters of international diplomacy before this exercise in Soviet justice gets under way. I hope we will continue to pound away with the truth about the falsity of Russian charges—both with regard to innocent Americans who are being asked to leave the Soviet Union or wherever the ugly specter of Communist lies is raised.

As never before, we need to practice tough-minded realism in taking the Russians to task and exposing the truth about their allegations. At the same time, we must leave no stone unturned in our efforts to bring home to a watching world the tremendous differences between American freedom and Soviet communism. We must pound home, particularly among the uncommitted and neutral nations, the vast differences between our free society and regimented life behind the Iron Curtain. We must, in a word, expose Soviet hypocrisy at every turn.

Mr. President, the duplicity of the Russian Bear—who preaches peaceful coexistence on one hand and practices treacherous intelligence activities on the other—has again been clearly revealed in an article in last night's Washington Evening Star. An alert reporter-photographer team from the Star caught Russian and Polish Embassy officials redhanded as they gathered voluminous information about the defenses of the United States.

It would be difficult to imagine a more startling illustration of the difference between the American and Soviet societies. In our free society, we believe strongly in the right of the people to know. We therefore reveal to public gaze all kinds of information which is regarded as strictly confidential behind the Iron Curtain.

Thus, while American citizens are cavalierly bounced from the Soviet Union for apparently harmless activities there, we permit a relatively free rein to Soviety citizens traveling in this country.

In the context of our free society, then, the Russian and Polish military officers described in the Star story, dressed in civilian clothes, took advantage of the situation to collect data at a downtown convention about our air defense, our missiles, our warheads, and our anti-plane weapons.

In the light of this exhibition it is appropriate to remind the Senate that J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, in cooperation with the Senate Judiciary Committee, has laid bare the real significance of this kind of civilian spying to the Soviet bloc nations. In a report prepared in May of this year for the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, the FBI Director said Soviet defectors have reported the ease with which information is obtained in this country has resulted in a reduction of the hazardous, expensive, and time-consuming clandestine operations which otherwise would be necessary.

One defector revealed that 90 percent of a Soviet intelligence agent's time in any other country would normally be consumed secretly obtaining information which is readily available in the United States through Government agencies or commercial publishing houses.

Soviet bloc officials habitually attend conventions, such as the Washington convention, reported so adroitly by the Washington Star by Staff Writer Jerry O'Leary, Jr., and Photographer Ranny Routt. Once, Mr. Hoover tells us, the Soviets picked up 250 pounds of material at one American convention.

Mr. President, I am not suggesting that we should in any way change our free society. I am warning that we, as free Americans, must not be deterred in our efforts to obtain intelligence information by hypocritical Soviet reprisals against Americans in Moscow. We must gather Soviet bloc secrets to save our freedom. We must be ever alert to the kind of "gumshoeing" plotted daily by Russian diplomats and exposed so completely by the alert and accurate reporting we have come to expect from the Washington Evening Star. We must respond to Soviet lies and false allegations with American truth and facts.

Mr. President, to inform a wider readership of foreign espionage in our Nation's capital, I ask unanimous consent to have the newspaper article to which I have referred printed at this point in the RECORD. I regret, Mr. President, that the photographs which I hold in my hand and which illustrated the story so graphically may not be, for technical reasons, included in the RECORD, because they add very much to the story. I hope that as we improve our techniques of reporting in the Senate, with the aid of the very able reporters who serve us here so diligently day after day, who are so very helpful to us, we shall be able, in the future, before the distinguished present occupant of the chair, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], and the junior Senator from New York leave this Chamber, either at the expiration of their terms or at some future time, to include in the RECORD photographs which are so graphic.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO NEED FOR SPYING—WE GIVE REDS WHAT THEY WANT

(By Jerry O'Leary, Jr.)

While Soviet Russia was expelling the U.S. air attaché from Moscow yesterday, four military attachés of the Russian Embassy in Washington were winding up a busy 3 days of picking up armloads of information on America's latest defense developments here.

And while the four Russians were wandering unrestricted around the exhibits of America's defense industry at the convention of the Association of the U.S. Army in the Sheraton-Park Hotel, four Iron Curtain reporters were being barred by the association from admittance to the convention presumably because they might learn too much.

These four included Gennadi A. Shiskin of Tass and Yuri V. Borsikov of Izvestia. Credentials also were denied a Polish newsman and one other Iron Curtain reporter, an Army spokesman said, because "we have limited coverage to people representing the legitimate American press and the press of friendly foreign countries."

The Russian visitors noted at the convention, all in civilian clothes, included:

Vsevolod N. Generalov and Avgust A. Yashin, assistant air attachés at the Embassy. Their ranks could not be learned.

In addition, two attachés from the Embassy of the Polish People's Republic attended the convention and acquired briefcase loads of documents about every phase of America's defense industry. They are Capt. Edward Gordon of the military attaché's office and Roman Misztal, a clerk in that office.

None of the information the Russians obtained was classified. However, an Army spokesman said there were actually seven items of defense hardware disclosed at the convention that never before had been seen by the general public. These included:

A T–114 tracked reconnaissance vehicle contemplated to replace the armored car or the light tank; a new configuration of the Nike-Zeus missile; an artist's conception of the Army's new Mauler, a mobile automatic air defense firing system with electronic computer; an SD–5 drone; a typical warhead of about 200 millimeters produced at the Picatinny Arsenal; a Red Eye hand-carried antiplane weapon; and a working model of a Fadac computer.

Colonels Lobanov and Tovma paid $1 each to register at the convention and $4.50 each to attend a reception at the Sheraton-Park on Monday night. Then the two Russian attachés attached "Member" cards to their coats bearing their names and ranks, and began their tours.

Captain Gordon also wore a card bearing his name and rank and the words "Polish Embassy." Generalov and Yashin, who arrived the second day, wore no indentification at any time during their visits to the defense display.

Captain Gordon appeared at the convention, where there were more than 144 exhibit booths, all 3 days. Mr. Misztal was there only 10 minutes on Tuesday. But the four Soviet Embassy aides made repeated visits—taking notes, acquiring documents available to visitors and talking with industry experts at the exhibit booths.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover last month warned Congress of the exploitation by the Communists of public information. Speaking of the Soviet espionage apparatus, he told the Senate Judiciary Committee:

"It is no secret that one of the results of the freedom of our democratic society is the availability of voluminous information to members of the public merely for the asking."

He said the Soviet-bloc intelligence services are well aware of this fact and take full advantage of it. Mr. Hoover said one Red defector estimated the Soviet Military Attaché Office in Washington is able to obtain legally 95 percent of the material useful to its intelligence objectives.

In fact, Mr. Hoover cited an estimate that 90 percent of an intelligence agent's time in any other country but the United States normally would be consumed by secretly obtaining information that is readily obtainable here through Government agencies or commercial publishing houses.

One of the most useful techniques is attendance at conventions of American organizations by Soviet-bloc officials, the FBI director said.

Here is how the Red attachés spent their time this week, under nearly constant observation by the Star:

On Monday Colonels Lobanov and Tovma arrived at the hotel, went through the registration process, received free briefcases from the AUSA and immediately began wandering through the 21,000 square feet of exhibit space. Their briefcases were flat when they started their tour but bulged with material on planes, weapons, electronics, missiles, and other matters as the day progressed.

At some time during the day they disposed of what was in their cases, returned to the exhibit areas and began refilling them. At 4 p.m. the two Russians had a drink together at the Sheraton-Park's poolside cocktail lounge and at 6:30 p.m. went to the reception.

Captain Gordon arrived alone at 10:30 a.m. Monday and stayed 1 hour. He was seen leaving the hotel with his bulging briefcase.

On Tuesday morning, Yashin and Generalov arrived at 10:55 a.m. and went straight to the exhibits without registering. Colonels Lobanov and Tovma came back at a few minutes before noon Tuesday but the four Russians left the hotel about 12:45 p.m., all with collections of material from the exhibits.

Captain Gordon came back to the hotel at 3 p.m. Tuesday and went straight to a missile capability display he had visited at length the day before. Colonels Lobanov and Tovma returned at 3:10 p.m. Tuesday and sat through a lengthy speech by Lt. Gen. Arthur Trudeau, chief of Army research and development, in which the general warned of an era "darkened by the sinister shadows of the hammer and sickle."

At each burst of applause, as General Trudeau discussed the Communist menace, the two Russian colonels applauded politely along with the rest of the audience. They occasionally made notes as General Trudeau spoke of how the Reds can "steal information 2 years after we have it and still beat us to the punch."

Colonels Lobanov and Tovma remained through further speeches about weapons, surveillance and communications equipment and air and ground vehicles.

Captain Gordon was the first of the visitors to return yesterday morning. He came back for his third visit at 11 a.m. and, still wearing the badge identifying him as a Polish Embassy attaché, returned to the exhibits and resumed gathering information.

Generalov arrived alone about noon yesterday, still without a badge, and went on a note-taking tour with particular emphasis on models of the Redstone, Mercury, and Jupiter vehicles.

Colonel Lobanov arrived at the hotel at 1:30 p.m., yesterday but this time he was not wearing the badge which had cost him a dollar. At 2 p.m. he went to a lecture on the modern training of the basic soldier.

Colonel Tovma returned at 2:20 p.m. and joined Colonel Lobanov in the lecture hall to hear a discussion of leadership training in our Army.

The four reporters from Iron Curtain countries were ordered out of the press credentials headquarters at the AUSA convention by Lt. Col. Arthur Chatham, Army liaison officer, when they asked to register.

Colonel Chatham conceded the action might bring reprisals against American reporters attempting to cover military affairs in the Soviet Union. He said, however, that the AUSA is a private organization and is entitled to set its own ground rules.

Newsmen recalled that last week, when candy manufacturers held a convention and exhibit in the same exhibition hall, there were strict credential requirements.

RECOVERY OF SPACE CAPSULE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I shall speak very briefly on another subject, and then I am hopeful we can reach a vote on the matter pending before the Senate.

Mr. President, when I went to school and studied physics, I learned that "what goes up, must come down." But for the last couple of years this has apparently not been true. We have been shooting things up into outer space and they have not come down at all. Some of our satellites are still up there, I am told. But now at least we seem to be getting back to the principles of physics as I studied them. Now, at least, some of the things we are shooting up into space are coming down again. And I for one am very glad to hear it.

Seriously, Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Air Force on its remarkable achievement, another first in the pioneering history of space exploration. The recovery of a 300-pound space capsule, which was ejected from a Discoverer satellite off the Hawaiian Islands late yesterday, marks a very important lead in the race to space. It has taken the Air Force a year and a half to reach this point. Perhaps within the next year and a half they will reach the point of sending a man into space and bringing him safely back down again.

The United States is rapidly moving ahead in its missile and space program. The recent successful firing of the Polaris missile, as well as yesterday's success in recovering the capsule, shows that the administration programs, moving ahead on schedule, are guaranteeing that this country will have a defense second to none. Sometimes long periods elapse before we have any conspicuous breakthrough of any sort. Then, all of a sudden, the planning, the ingenuity, and the hard work which has been expended starts paying their dividends in a rush. The Navy, the Air Force, and the Army all come up with something at the same time. The events of the last few days should put an end to idle political caviling at the defense programs of the Eisenhower administration. The fact of the matter is that while some politicians have been talking, the Defense Department has been working.

Moreover, there is no intention to let down for 1 minute in the continuing struggle for U.S. security through military superiority.

Every breakthrough calls for more energy expended along new lines. As the President made very clear in his message at the beginning of this session, new funds will be called for and new construction will take place whenever the testing results justify such increases. Sound planning by the administration has paid far greater dividends in actual accomplishment than the appropriation of unplanned funds by those who are not as fully aware of the real state of our defense needs as are those who have studied them for years and indeed made them a subject of lifelong interest.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, is there an amendment before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is there any disposition to offer an amendment?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I understand the Senator from Florida has an amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, according to some list that is on the table, I understood I was to have the floor after my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. If he is ready, I shall gladly yield to him. If he is not, I shall be glad to proceed.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator is kind. I have already told one of the attachés that I am not quite ready to proceed. I would prefer that the Senator go ahead.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I gave the Senator from Florida the impression that I might be 5 or 10 minutes longer than I actually was. But I noticed the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] sitting in the Chamber. I cut short my remarks in order that he might have the opportunity to raise a point about an amendment, because I agree with him that we should proceed with this legislation as expeditiously as possible.

Both of us knew that the distinguished Senator from Florida had an amendment, and I wished to cooperate completely, as I always try to do, with him and with my distinguished friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the junior Senator from New York. I did not know that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] had raised any question. I had been called to the telephone. Was some question raised of which I have not heard?

Mr. KEATING. I said that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] had made an inquiry. He had not been present, and he made an inquiry as to whether there was an amendment pending. He was informed that no amendment was pending. I presume that is the reason the Senator was sent for.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, so far as the Senator from Florida now knows, there is no amendment before the Senate. The Senator from Florida placed into the RECORD yesterday his amendment, which he will propose in due time, in which he has the honor to be joined by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES].

Mr. President, I expect to offer for the Senate's consideration, in cosponsorship with four distinguished Senators whom I have just mentioned, an amendment to the pending measure, S. 3758, designated as amendment "8–10–60—L," and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday at page 16238, column 2.

I have purposely refrained from making any address up to this time with reference to the amendment or otherwise, because I preferred to have all Senators who are members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare make such remarks as they cared to make on the bill prior to my making any presentation whatever.

The purpose of the amendment which I shall offer later, and which is printed in the RECORD of yesterday, as I have already stated, is to retain the present exemption of retail and service establishments in accordance with the intention of those who sponsored and helped secure the enactment of the original Fair Labor Standards Act.

I believe I can establish to the satisfaction of any fairminded person that, rather than being in accordance with humanitarian purposes of the New Deal sponsors, as such purposes are preserved in existing law, the retail and service provisions of the pending bill would be a betrayal of these purposes.

Those who are asked to vote for this bill should realize that they are being asked to go much further than the conception of this law embodied in the New Deal. The New Deal sponsors of the original act not only did not recommend that Congress attempt to apply this law to local retail and service businesses; on the contrary, they expressly recommended and urged that such businesses be clearly excluded from the application of the law, for reasons which they clearly stated and which are equally persuasive at this time, and equally demand the same exemption as was then intended.

The purpose of my amendment is to retain the present retail and service establishments' exemptions, which, in my opinion, are basically sound and should not be altered. The following are these provisions of section 13(a) of the wage-hour law which contain the retail-service exemptions and which my amendment will fully preserve:

(2) Any employee employed by any retail or service establishment, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services is made within the State in which the establishment is located. A "retail or service establishment" shall mean an establishment 75 per centum of whose annual dollar volume of sales of goods or services (or of both) is not for resale and is recognized as retail sales or services in the particular industry; or (3) any employee employed by any establishment engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothing or fabrics, more than 50 per centum of which establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of such services is made within the State in which the establishment is located: Provided*, That 75 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of such services is made to customers who are not engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, or communications business.

Since time and events have taken their toll here in the Senate, there are only a few Members of the present Senate who participated in the 1938 debate which led to the enactment of the original Fair Labor Standards Act.

I am happy, however, that one of those original Members of the Senate who was then a member of the committee which handled the matter, and of the conference committee which worked out the final form of the bill, still retains his seat in the Senate and is one of our most active and aggressive and useful Members. I refer, of course, to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], who has honored me by joining in the amendment which we will present in due time.

Less than half of us participated as Senators in the major revision of that act in 1949. Assuming that there are some of us who have not had the time to review the history of this act as it applies to retail and service establishments, I beg the Senators' indulgence while I quickly summarize some of the pertinent facts underlying the present retail and service exemptions to the Fair Labor Standards Act as adopted in 1949.

On May 24, 1937, President Roosevelt sent a message to the 75th Congress requesting the enactment of minimum wage and maximum hour legislation for those "who toil in factories." He also stated:

And so to protect the fundamental interests of free labor and a free people we propose that only goods which have been produced under conditions which meet the minimum standards of free labor shall be admitted to interstate commerce. Goods produced under conditions which do not meet rudimentary standards of decency should be regarded as contraband and ought not to be allowed to pollute the channels of interstate trade.

Thus, twice in this leadoff paragraph in his references to interstate commerce and interstate trade, President Roosevelt made it clear that he based his approach upon the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

I continue quoting from President Roosevelt:

Although a goodly portion of the goods of American industry move in interstate commerce and will be covered by the legislation which we recommend, there are many purely local pursuits and services which no Federal legislation can effectively cover.

I shall reread that part of the statement which is so applicable to the present effort. President Roosevelt said:

There are many purely local pursuits and services which no Federal legislation can effectively cover.

I noted with interest and with appreciation the fact that the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], in his address earlier this afternoon, quoted former President Roosevelt as having said that this legislation was the keystone of his labor program. I wish to couple that statement with the statements which President Roosevelt made in his message and which I have just quoted, showing us very clearly that President Roosevelt considered this legislation not only as the keystone of his program but as such keystone despite the fact that he was asking for the exemption of local pursuits and local services, which, he said, no Federal legislation could effectively cover.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BLACK

The Senator who handled the legislation on the floor is now a distinguished member of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Black. In beginning the consideration of the bill in the Senate, Senator Black said:

It provides a method of obtaining the objective of minimum wages and maximum working hours in industries throughout the Nation which engage in the transportation of their goods in interstate commerce. It is not intended to, and does not, attempt to provide by Federal legislation the fixing of minimum wages and maximum hours of employment in all the varied peculiarly local business units of the Nation.

So stated then Senator Black in opening the argument in the debate in the Senate in 1938.

I continue to quote from Senator Black:

So the bill, insofar as it relates to maximum hours of employment and minimum wages, is limited, except to the small extent I have heretofore indicated (sec. 8(a), summarized above in par. 4(1)(b)) to goods which are actually manufactured for transportation and are transported in interstate commerce. We, therefore, eliminate in the beginning any idea that this is an effort to regulate wages and hours in the various service employments throughout the Nation.

The reason for this limitation, said Senator Black in his later argument, was twofold: First, because the bill "rests squarely upon the interstate commerce clause" of the Constitution, and, second, because it was the prevailing, if not unanimous, sentiment of the committee that—and I quote Senator Black:

Businesses of a purely local type which serve a particular community, and which do not send their products into the streams of interstate commerce, can be better regulated by the laws of the communities and of the States in which the business units operate.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the philosophy of this act could have been more clearly stated as being based upon the interstate commerce clause and as being intentionally kept away from any application to businesses that operated within State lines than is shown by these preliminary statements by President Roosevelt and by Senator Black at the time of the introduction of a bill which became, by passage by Congress and approval by the President, the wage and hour law.

Mr. President, such was the handling in the Senate and by the message of the then President of the United States.

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN CELLER

Of course, the measure was also passed by the House of Representatives. I think it is of special interest to consider the colloquies which took place on that bill in the House, because the House saw, even more pointedly, the need not only for the exclusion from the law of intrastate business and service organizations, but also the wisdom for such exclusion.

When the original bill was debated in the House in 1938, Representative CELLER, of New York, now chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, offered the amendment which was the basic draft of the exemption included in the original law. Notwithstanding that the House had been assured by Mrs. Norton, then the distinguished chairman of the House Labor Committee, that the law would not be applied to the retail and service trades because they were not sufficiently related to the stream of interstate commerce, Mr. CELLER insisted upon his amendment. He stated:

Dissolve all doubt, dispel all chance of misinterpretation, accept it [his amendment] and then retail dry goods, retail butchering, grocers, retail clothing stores, department stores will all be exempt.

Mrs. Norton responded:

I think this amendment will not weaken our bill but will, in fact, strengthen it. Therefore, I ask the committee to stand with us in accepting this amendment.

The Celler amendment, having been accepted by the committee, was passed by the House and with certain changes, not material here, was retained by the conference committee and was in the bill as finally enacted by Congress in 1938, which exempted, in these words:

Any employee engaged in any retail or service establishment the greater part of whose selling or servicing is in intrastate commerce.

The original reasons, as shown by the debates and the records of the hearings, for exempting retail and service establishments were three in number. I ask Senators to follow these closely:

First. The fact that complete reliance must be placed on the interstate commerce clause; and that it was only by and through the operation of that clause that jurisdiction was given to the Congress. It was only by remaining within the jurisdiction of that clause that the bill could remain on safe ground.

Second. That there were wide variations in wage scales and hours of work in these particular establishments, that is, retail and service establishments; and,

Third. That there was great difficulty in enforcing Federal wage-and-hour regulations in local business.

In the course of his presentation, Senator Black sought occasion to bring into the RECORD and to state in the RECORD—though I shall not quote him now in full—the fact that in the attempt at enforcement of NRA—both the law, and the regulations thereunder—it had been found a hopeless task to enforce nationwide regulations against local businesses in the classes mentioned as to which conditions were so completely variable in the various States of the Nation and in the various communities within any State.

It is plain from the history and language of the exemption that Congress intended to exempt two types of establishments. First, retail establishments; second, service establishments. The retail establishment is the establishment selling goods. The service establishment is the one rendering service, such as the hotel, laundry, restaurant, the repair garage, and the beauty parlor. Of course, some establishments both sell goods and render services, such as a hotel, which provides lodging and also sells food.

Eleven years later, in 1949—and that was the time when the familiarity of the Senator from Florida with this subject matter began—Congress was confronted with almost the identical issue we are discussing here today. In the 11 intervening years between 1938 and 1949, the retail exemption contained in the 1938 Act has been virtually nullified through administrative interpretations and court decisions. The Administrator himself, in his 1948 annual report to Congress, conceded that Supreme Court decisions had virtually destroyed the exemption for all retail and service establishments, and that such decisions cast considerable doubt upon the application of the exemption to any retail or service establishment. The question before the 81st Congress in 1949 was whether to give legislative approval to the administrative interpretations and the court decisions, or to reaffirm in clearer words the original intent of Congress that the Fair Labor Standards Act was never intended to apply to retail and service establishments.

Mr. President, history is repeating itself today. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in 1949 proposed to the Senate, as it does now, that the original philosophy of the Fair Labor Standards Act and its justification on the basis of the commerce clause be abandoned and be replaced by extension of its coverage to the farthest reaches of purely local business. In 1949, the Senate completely rejected, as I urge the Senate now to reject, such an unwarranted and unsound abandonment of the original basis and purpose of this law.

The action of the Senate at that time was by a vote of better than 2 to 1, after a very full and thorough debate on the subject. The result was the adoption of the amendment which I offered at that time, and in which I had the honor to be joined by two of the Senators who join with me now, and by two Senators who, unfortunately, are no longer Members of the Senate.

The debates in both Houses of Congress in 1949 were extensive and thorough and this question was intensively analyzed and reviewed. Many of those who participated in the debate in the House of Representatives are now Members of this body and I think they will agree that no subject ever received more careful consideration.

In looking back over the 1949 debate in the House, I note with interest that Representative CELLER, who participated in the debate, in the 11 intervening years found no reason to change his original position on the retail exemption. He reiterated his position in the debate in 1949.

In the House of Representatives, this issue, along with others, was determined on a motion to substitute the so-called Lucas bill for the so-called Lesinski bill. The teller vote on the substitute was 211 "yeas" against 140 "nays." On the roll-call for the final passage of the so-called Lucas bill, the vote was 225 to 181—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 8, page 11228.

In the Senate the issue was more closely drawn. On an amendment involving only the retail and service exemption, the amendment was carried by a vote of 50 to 23—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 9, page 12520. One of the highlights of the Senate debate was a colloquy between the late Senator Taft and my then colleague, the then senior Senator from Florida, Mr. Pepper. I think every Member of this body who did not hear that colloquy should take the time to read it. It appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 9, pages 12515–12517. Apart from any question of ability of retailers to pay a proposed minimum wage, Senator Taft said:

The problem is, how far does the Federal Government have any jurisdiction or right or propriety in trying to regulate the wages of people who have no relation whatever to interstate commerce, or those who, we think, should not be included in interstate commerce?

We are not obliged to go to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court may be right or they may be wrong in their gradual extension of the concept of interstate commerce to point where it seems to include everybody in the United States, no matter what he is doing, because in some way his activity has some slight effect on interstate commerce.

Congress itself has frequently undertaken to determine what is within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and even if it were constitutionally possible, it is to my mind exceedingly unwise for the Federal Government to assume to go beyond interstate commerce in economic matters, and try to regulate the affairs of communities and States who have particular local problems, who are closer to those problems, and who are more inclined and more able to deal justly and correctly with the problems which they have to meet.

Later in his statement Senator Taft said:

So far as the pending amendment is concerned, it is no more than a reaffirmation of the intention of Congress in 1938. Both the Senator from Missouri, Mr. Donnell, and I, who filed the supplemental statement which will be found at the end of the report, felt very strongly that we were not in any way extending the exemption. We are simply reaffirming the position the Senate has taken heretofore.

And Senator Taft concluded:

Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that we should not encourage and permit the gradual extension of the concept of interstate commerce to cover all retail establishments, to cover all service establishments, to cover all service establishments such as laundries, or to cover all hotels. * * * If we do not want to have the whole concept of local and intrastate commerce finally eliminated, then I believe we ought to adopt the amendment suggested by the distinguished junior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. President, by a strange coincidence, the question of retail exemption is again before this body after a second 11-year period. By a further strange coincidence, it comes up in the same month—August—as the one during which the last debate took place—in August of 1949. The committee report again this year, as it did in 1949, would in effect assert a justification for extending the Fair Labor Standards Act to the most remote corners of the Nation. Even though they would have one believe they only intend to apply it to the largest retail and service establishments, I think we shall be able to prove that is neither their immediate nor ultimate objective. If there is any doubt in your mind, on this matter, Mr. President, I suggest that you read the first sentence on page 30 of the majority report. Here the majority boldly states that they have "deliberately chosen a broad statutory base to bring these enterprises within the scope of the act." The majority report's reference is to section 3(s) which defines an activity affecting commerce to include "any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce."

This bill is one of the instruments expressing the philosophy of those who are in favor of big, all-inclusive Federal Government. Its provisions are not the ultimate they have in mind. It is obvious, and some of them frankly state, that they intend to broaden the scope of coverage of local retail and service businesses so as to take in virtually all such businesses.

For example, in this very debate the senior Senator from Oregon stated yesterday, as reported on page 16177 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

The original bill which we introduced would have covered some 7 to 7½ million. In my judgment, there are at least a minimum of 11 million employees that ought to be covered, in the very near future, who are not now covered; and, in round numbers, there are some 22 million workers in this country that fall within the coverage of the commerce clause of the Constitution, who are not covered, but who, I hope, will be covered in the next few years.

I should like to emphasize, Mr. President, that this bill would produce so complete a change in the philosophy of the act as to enable its proponents hereafter, by very simple amendments in succeeding Congresses, to go vastly farther in extending the act's coverage of local retail and service businesses and services, and indeed, to make it all embracing. Those who are being asked to vote for this bill should realize that this is what it implies and promises for the future.

Mr. President, the question is whether it is wise to depart from the standards set down in 1938 and reaffirmed in 1949, and whether the very strong arguments then made by those who certainly were regarded as among the most liberal people we have ever had, which arguments then prevailed, and prevented the extension of this measure to retail and service businesses within the States, are still being made and are still as compelling as they were then.

It is my humble and my very sincere judgment that those arguments not only are present now, but prevail now to an even greater extent, if possible, than they did then, because we have come to a time when the activities and responsibilities of the Federal Government have become so vastly enlarged; when we, as the leader of the free world, have responsibilities which extend into every corner of the globe—responsibilities which we realize and recognize, and are seeking to fulfill; when the scope of our business activities, even the size of our population, and the scope of our State structure—extending now to Alaska and Hawaii—have become so much greater than they were at that time; and when we are not doing, federally, the good, efficient, effective job which every one of us would like to do, and which most of us believe is due in large part to the fact that we have grown too large and the fact that we have more to look after than we can look after well.

Mr. President, that argument is added to the arguments which were presented by the then President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, in 1938, and by the then distinguished Senator Black, who led the debate, and by the then and still distinguished Member of the House of Representatives, Representative CELLER, of New York, who participated actively in the debates in 1938 and in 1949.

Mr. President, the question is one which is both constitutional—that is to say, a legal question—and practical, addressed to the wisdom and the judgment of this Congress and of all the people of the United States.

So far as the constitutional question is concerned, Mr. President, all of us know that the Supreme Court has, by its interpretative decisions, so construed the interstate commerce clause that now, in some fields—although it has never been done in this field—the jurisdiction of certain acts, notably, the National Labor Relations Act, has been extended to places, areas, and industries which the Court has held merely affect interstate commerce.

Mr. President, this effort is an effort, so far as the law is concerned, to adopt that reasoning, to adopt that philosophy, to give it the sanction and the blessing of a majority, too, of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States and the approving signature of the President of the United States.

For one, while, if I were sitting as a judge, I would be bound to follow the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, at least in the field where it applied, and while, if I were practicing law, I would have to give most careful attention to it, however, in the Senate of the United States I deem it to be both my duty and responsibility to reaffirm, when I think it requires reaffirmation, the meaning of the Constitution, in which I sincerely and profoundly believe, and at least let it stand at that, until the Supreme Court gets to that declaration.

Mr. President, we have no assurance what the Supreme Court would rule in this matter as a general matter; and, in particular, I call the attention of the President and of every Member of the Senate to the fact that there is no assurance what the Supreme Court would rule in any particular case, in the myriad, in the thousands, in the hundreds of thousands of different cases, under different sets of facts, which could be brought in for determination finally as to whether the acts in the cases affected interstate commerce. I think the Court would, of course, rule that such activities would have to substantially affect interstate commerce, because it would be inconceivable to me that the Court would ever rule that anything less than a substantial effect upon interstate commerce would at all permit the inclusion of anything not directly in the channel of interstate commerce within the protection and coverage of the commerce clause.

I think not only is it true that we have a duty to stand up for what we think the Constitution means—and we have an opportunity to do it in a field in which the Supreme Court has not ruled—but we also have a responsibility in that regard. And so far as I am concerned, so profoundly do I believe that it is not in the national interest, and not within the purview of the meaning of the Constitution, that that clause can be so stretched as to cover any activity, or any business which in the slightest affects interstate commerce, that I do not want to set up a structure under which the Supreme Court would be invited to hold that even the remotest effect upon interstate commerce would be such as to permit the extension of their present interpretation of what the Constitution means to the business people of this Nation.

Mr. President, I digress at this time long enough to say that there could not be anything more uncertain, there could not be any legislation more uncertain, in its final effect upon many businesses in the United States—many of them small businesses, some of them large businesses—than to apply this kind of philosophy to business generally.

Speaking only for myself, Mr. President, I will not be a party to the passage of a law which makes possible an attenuated and I think unreasonable interpretation and application of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

So much for the legal phases of the matter, Mr. President, in which I think we have a distinct responsibility which we should not evade.

But let us come back to the practical questions which were raised at that time, and which I think are still equally applicable, and which I think should at this time be even more carefully considered than they were then.

The second of the two reasons recited by Senator Black, and freely mentioned on the floor at the time, was that there were such wide variations in wage scales and hours of work in particular establishments coming under the general classification of retail trade and service establishments that it was impractical to try to measure them all by one standard.

Mr. President, I shall not have to elaborate upon that point. Not only does the inequality in responsibility of the worker, in degree of the skill required of the worker, exist in every place where these many, many industries which we could mention are found, but the difference between customs and practices as to hours, between customs and practices as to wages, between the cost of living as to our citizens in the remote parts of the Nation, one from the other, makes it particularly necessary that we give great regard to the second reason asserted by Senator Black, which was that the variations in wage scales and hours of work in these classes of establishments—that is, retail and service establishments—were so great in various parts of the Nation, and even essentially among themselves in the same place, as to not make them susceptible of being placed under a single standard with equity and fairness and justice to either employers or employees.

The third ground asserted at that time by Senator Black was that there was great difficulty in enforcing Federal wage and hour regulations in local businesses on any equitable basis. He referred to the experience under the Blue Eagle setup, the NRA. He referred to other attempts that had been made, and stated what was well known at that time, and which I think will be recollected by most of us as being established in that experience—that it was completely impossible to enforce, in a fair way, regulations or standards applied to all the varied practices and customs and hours and wage rates in the multifarious retail businesses and service establishments of this Nation.

I think that argument is more impressive now than it was then, because we have had since that time—and I want to call particular attention to this particular fact—a course of dealing which has been adopted by 28 or 29 States. My distinguished friend from Arizona placed the list in the RECORD yesterday in his able argument, for which I commend him highly. In those 28 or 29 States an effort has been made to come to grips with this problem, and they have done so in a way that commended itself to the judgment of the legislators chosen by the very people who were affected, and who could be replaced, generally, on a 2-year basis. Those bases also had to be approved by the Governors of those States, who were selected by the people of the States.

In that matter, the Senator has called attention to the fact that there are no two States which have the same identical provisions in this field, showing so clearly, first, that there is a matter of wisdom, judgment, and discretion involved; and, second, that there are great variations as to the weight of the various problems in the States of the Union.

When we debated this matter in 1949, I remember contrasting the wage and hour laws of certain adjoining States, for instance, the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and noting for the RECORD at that time the great variance between the standards which had been approved under the judgment and discretion of the legislators of those two very fine and very prudent States, which are separated only by a line in our fine New England area.

I remember comparing the laws of two of our Midwestern States, in which it also appeared that judgment had been sufficiently different as to result in a different handling of this problem between the people who were employed in one State and those who were employed in another State right across the line, because of the difference in problems which had been seen by the legislators, and which commended themselves to the discretion and judgment of those legislators, chosen by the people of the respective States, in a different way, so that the laws reflected a different conclusion.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield gladly to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I merely wanted to ask a question at this point.

The Senator has raised, very properly, the question of the right of a State to legislate in this field. I find myself in complete agreement with the Senator. I believe a list of some 29 States was placed in the RECORD yesterday, to show the States which have minimum wage requirements to a varying degree. Surprisingly, Alaska, as I recall, had the highest minimum wage, the same amount proposed in the pending bill, namely, $1.25.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the list, which I believe was for 1957 or 1958, there was shown a $1.25 minimum for Alaska. A copy of a later bill from Alaska, which was shown to me this morning, shows that because of the high living costs and because of the pressure of the problem, the judgment of the legislators and of the Governor of Alaska has been reflected in a $1.50 minimum wage, which indicates, clearer than any words of any observer at this distance could, that the local legislators know how to judge local questions and should be trusted to do so.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct. If there is any validity to the argument contained in the States rights approach, then certainly it is shown in this particular example. Alaska, with its relatively high living costs, has chosen a higher figure than the new Federal law would provide. I think this is a good example of where the Federal Government does not know enough about all the States to legislate for them, even if the Federal Government had the right to do so, which I contend it does not have. Since the States did not turn over this right to the Federal Government, the States retain the right to legislate in this field.

Is it the Senator's feeling that if the bill we are now discussing, S. 3758, should become a law, section 3(s), which I shall read, as follows: " 'Activity affecting commerce' includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in commerce," is such that it would preempt the States' right to legislate in this field?

Mr. HOLLAND. There is certainly a grave question as to whether that would preempt the field. Judging from the recent decisions of the Supreme Court, notably in the Wisconsin case, I fear that the Supreme Court would hold that since Congress employed language which is so wide and so uncertain, in a law enacted to cover this field, therefore the Federal Government claimed exclusive jurisdiction. I fear that such would be the case.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I invite the attention of my friend to another interesting fact. I mention it to the Senator because he is from the southern part of the United States.

If we assume that employees in single stores would not be covered by the Kennedy bill, this would mean that about 14 percent of all the full-time employees in the South would be directly affected by the bill. This is a bill written in Washington, D.C., which does not take into consideration any of the situations which might prevail in a particular section of the country, such as the South.

I feel, as I stated yesterday, that a far greater danger than the extension of the coverage or the amount of money involved is the philosophy involved in the new approach to the commerce definition, which is "activity affecting commerce."

As was stated yesterday, this comes about through the very liberal and broadening decisions of the Supreme Court in the field of labor. Some of our colleagues will argue, "Well, it is in the National Labor Relations Act; therefore, it can be in anything else." I suggest that applying this concept to the labor-management law, which confines the effect of the Government action to a relatively small segment of our people and to a relatively small segment of our economy, is a lot different from applying this concept of broadening the commerce clause to a total of well over a million businesses in this country. It would have the added effect of allowing the Federal Government to go into the States and to regulate intrastate business.

I think the Senator is perfectly aware of the fact that the definition is now sought to be broadened to the point that the Federal Government could go within the boundaries of a State and regulate business upon the mere basis that the business buys something from outside the State. I think the Senator is also aware of the fact that the definition would be changed to apply not to an employee but to the employer, which would broaden the language even more.

I ask the Senator if he has any idea what the sponsor of the bill meant the other night when he said:

> The enactment of this bill is only one step, but an essential step, forward, as we cross this frontier to grasp the high opportunities which face the Nation.

I think if we take this one step we do not have to take any more steps, for I think we shall have then federalized the business of the country, and certainly we shall have taken the biggest step we could toward socializing the economy.

Mr. HOLLAND. I will say to my distinguished friend that I noted those words used the other night by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I gave the Senator credit for great frankness in the use of the word "frontier," because it seems to me that is exactly what he is asking us to do. That is exactly what he is inviting the country to do through the passage of the bill, to go into an unexplored area, for reasons which undoubtedly commend themselves to his conscience, but which, so far as I am concerned, I think are completely unsound reasons.

Mr. President, to me that reasoning might prevail in some fields of operations, but it does not prevail in this field. I have already invited attention to the fact that I think the Federal Government has more to do in this field than it can do well. I think the Federal Government would be making an abysmal mistake by trying to regiment, to regulate, and to supervise every employer, every business, and every employee in the country.

I thought the Senator from Arizona was eminently correct yesterday in bringing to our attention, when he was having a colloquy, I believe, with my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the fact that if it is once conceded that under this broadened interpretation of the commerce clause the Federal Government has power to go in and to control the wage and hour practices of employers and employees in all of these classes of business, it is only a short step to controlling prices—it is only a short step to controlling selection—it is only a short step to controlling lives.

Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has refreshed my recollection on his point to that effect yesterday, because if it is sought successfully to apply this very broad interpretation of the commerce clause to all businesses which are held to affect interstate commerce in this field, a new field on which no court has passed up to now, then perhaps we shall have some more of these pioneering efforts.

So far as the Senator from Florida is concerned, he does not want to set in motion such a sequence of dominoes falling, because he thinks they would all fall.

He thinks we should stand firmly and fight for the continuance of local control and individual control, unless that local control becomes necessary, of businesses, of employment practices, and of employee practices. He thinks we are being asked to surrender for our people a very precious heritage, which is a part of the American foundation of freedom, and he does not propose to have any part in making that surrender.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield again to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator has referred to this new frontier as unexplored. I suggest to my friend from Florida that this frontier has been amply explored down through the years of history, and the only reason we have our constitutional form of government is to protect us from getting back across the same frontier that our Founding Fathers recognized as an impossible and dangerous frontier.

I do not agree that it is unexplored. I do not think there is any one subject that has been more unexplored in the history of man than man's freedom, and we know, through our Founding Fathers, what can still freedom forever.

Certainly Federal control was the most dominant force that the Founding Fathers feared, and, as I said yesterday, they wrote throughout the Constitution safeguards against it.

This is not any dark, unexplored frontier. I would say if this were true, if we had never tried Federal control of wages, if we had never tried Federal control of prices, and if we had never tried Federal control of business, if socialism and all other forms of economy had not been tried, we might very well be tempted to go into this field, experimenting as a true liberal would, with the idea that we might find something that could add to freedom. But when the Senator says this frontier is unexplored, I respectfully have to disagree, because we built our business and we built our Government in an effort to stay away from crossing the frontier that has been the temptation, the siren song of every civilization, every government, every economic system in the history of the world.

We have to look back only a few years in our lifetime to the attempts by England to do the same things, and England is now struggling to get back out of the morass she got into.

I placed in the RECORD today an article printed in a political publication which I hope my colleagues will read, because I felt it was apropos, in that it related to how England slowly crept into these practice and found herself so lost that she had to turn around and try to get out.

We are trying to do the same thing. If Senators will read the article I placed in the RECORD today, they will see that we are not talking about frontiers that have not been explored. We are talking about frontiers about which men probably know more than they do about any other subject.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I know the Senator is a distinguished student of history, and that yesterday he referred to the experience of Rome and of Babylon in this same field. I do not think either the Senator from Arizona or I regard this frontier as anything more than a frontier in peacetime for our country under our form of government and under our Constitution. I think it is amply true to say that we have had experience in this country. I know of no such frontier in time of peace. I do know of some in time of war, and I know that the people of our country as a whole were very restless under the NRA, very restless under the OPA, and were very restless more recently under the OPS. There was no satisfaction in life when we returned home to visit with our neighbors who were merchants or business operators, because they were finding so insufferable the control by hired officials, most of whom undoubtedly had good intentions, but who under our system of government were never intended to have control of the daily business, which means the bread of life activities of our business people and of those who work for them.

I certainly agree with my distinguished friend, and I am glad he called attention to that phase of the subject, for in time of war we have had these experiences. I think there is nothing growing out of those experiences that commends that system to us in such a way that we would want to adopt it in time of peace. So far as the Senator from Florida is concerned, he is talking about this approach as a brandnew experiment in time of peace for our country, under our Constitution, and the Senator from Florida is going to do everything he can to prevent our going into that area, which he hopes will remain uncharted in time of peace in this country.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I recognize full well what the Senator is getting at in his interpretation of "frontier." But what I was trying to make clear is that we have guidelines. We have experience. We only have to look to history to tell us what will happen. We know precisely what will happen if this frontier is crossed and we follow down the dark, dismal road down which other economic systems of Government have gone. We know that if we control wages, and we constantly raise the base, when the base has not been earned, and we close down the differential until we hit the happy millennium some day when everybody has exactly the same income regardless of his ability, then there must come the control of prices, the control of distribution, and undoubtedly the loss of free enterprise would come long before that.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. I call attention to two things that have already occurred in this debate. One is the reference yesterday by the Senator from Arizona to the testimony of two great labor leaders, Mr. Meany and Mr. Greenberg, before the Senate committee in the hearings on this bill. Both of those labor leaders were frank enough to say that the minimum wage was the foundation of any wage structure in this country, and that with the institution of a minimum wage, in order to preserve the differentials between unskilled labor and skilled labor, between persons of lesser responsibility and those of greater responsibility, there would be started a movement under which all wages would rise, which would mean that prices would rise, and consequently it would mean a continuation of the inflationary spiral. That would mean, of course, living in more difficult circumstances.

The people of our country who have tried to be cautious, who have tried to accumulate enough to see them through their old age, and who thought they were relatively independent and at least in secure circumstances through the practices of free enterprises, would then find through the destruction of purchasing power of their dollar that no such result is assured, through no fault of their own, but due to the effort of our Government. Our Government must stop any such effort right here. The responsibility is on each Senator and each Representative. Only here can we start an effort of our Government to prevent arbitrary raises in wage scales that are not pertinent to acquired new productive capacity or as a matter of merit, but simply as a matter of law. That is not safe. It is not sound, and there is no way to make it so.

Mr. LAUSCHE rose.

Mr. HOLLAND. The second point I wish to make, before I yield to my friend from Ohio, is that stated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], one of the authors of the act, in his argument on the opening day of this debate, in which he stated that it was his philosophy that no business which could not pay a minimum wage as fixed by law to its lowliest employee was justified in continuing to exist; or if it did continue to exist, what he favored was the subsidization of that business by the assumption of whatever part of the employee's salary it was necessary for the general public to pay.

I do not question the sincerity and convictions of the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Massachusetts, or any other Senator. They have the right to their views. They are Senators of the United States in the finest tradition in which both of them serve. They have a right to state what they believe about our Government and what it means to them. However, I differ with all the strength I have with any such concept, that the Government may raise wages and require the payment of wages which businesses themselves cannot carry, and justify the subsidization of the wage structure.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I promised to yield first to the Senator from Ohio. Then I shall yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, is the Senator from Florida able to tell me whether any business within the country having a volume of business in excess of $1 million will not be affected by the bill?

Mr. HOLLAND. No; the Senator from Florida does not believe there is any firm doing business in excess of $1 million which will not be affected. I believe that the effect would go even further than that, because I believe that under the rule of competition, and even without the extension which is so freely predicted by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Oregon, and by those who believe with them, the passage of the bill will not only affect the businesses which technically come under it. I say that because other businesses across the street from them will compete with them.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In any event, there is not any producer, manufacturer, or other business enterprise in the country doing a volume of business in excess of $1 million which will not be directly affected by the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What about a business within the State of Ohio which clearly and unequivocally deals only in local matters, and does not at all do business across State lines?

Mr. HOLLAND. That would make no difference under the bill. The bill affects all businesses which may be construed as affecting interstate commerce. I do not know of any business that large which does not use tools which come across State lines or does not use some product which moves to it across State lines.

Perhaps the Senator from Ohio can suggest such a business. I have thought very hard on this point to try to find any business that might be exempt from that conclusion, that it does not affect commerce.

About the only one that I could think of—and it would certainly do less than a million dollars' worth of business—is the case of a small gardener who plants seeds which were produced in his own State, with fertilizer that does not come from without the State, and works with handmade tools or tools that were made within his State, and then sells his product in the town where he lives, without letting it get into the channels of interstate commerce. I have not been able to find any other business that would come under that classification.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator know whether in the calculation of the number of workers that will be affected, the statisticians took into consideration all the workers and all the employers of businesses which did more than a million dollars worth of work?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator does not know upon what bases the statisticians based their figures. We must simply accept the figures as being the best that the staff of the able Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare could find.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator understand that there is not even one employer in the country doing a volume of business in excess of $1 million who will not be affected by the pending bill?

Mr. HOLLAND. I merely say that I have not been able to think of one. I see on the floor the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, the principal author of the bill. Perhaps he can answer that question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts that question?

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for that purpose, without losing my right to the floor, so that the Senator from Ohio may ask the question of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. I understand the Senator's question to be whether there is any business in the United States of any kind doing a business in excess of a million dollars a year which would not be covered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes. Except professional employees. I mean any business in the United States, any producer or manufacturer or any retail or service operator, doing a volume of business in excess of a million dollars which will not be operated upon by the law.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would say to the Senator that there is no retail business doing in excess of a million dollars' worth of business a year which would not be covered. There may be some business concerns with some special exemptions in the bill, such as businesses dealing in food processing. But in general I would think that the bill would bring closer, substantially, a total coverage of all businesses doing a business volume of over a million dollars a year. However, I would not want to make a flat statement to that effect, because there may be some exemptions which still include businesses doing business of over a million dollars a year. But generally the thesis of the Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. HOLLAND. With the same understanding, I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does that mean that in the statistical figures dealing with employees that will be covered, all the workers employed in businesses doing a business in excess of a million dollars will be included?

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me say, in answering the question, that presumably there are certain agricultural cooperatives which are not covered, even though they do business of over a million dollars a year. That is why in answering the Senator's first question I could not make the complete flat statement with respect to businesses doing a volume of business of over a million dollars. In answer to the second question, I should like to say that I did not hear the preliminary colloquy between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Florida, so I am not quite clear on that point. Is the Senator asking a question with regard to a table appearing in the report of the committee?

Mr. LAUSCHE. No. What I am trying to find out is if there is any business in Ohio doing a million dollars worth of business a year, or more, which always has been considered as an agency subject to the laws of Ohio, which will not be affected by the bill. What would be left to the States? That is what I should like to know.

Mr. KENNEDY. In the field covered by the commerce clause, what would be left to State regulation, will be those businesses which are exempt from the coverage of the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That means those which do business below a million dollars a year?

Mr. KENNEDY. There are some businesses which are not covered by the act. I gave the Senator the example of cooperatives. There are probably other businesses which may do a gross business of a million dollars but which fall out from under the coverage of the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Which are those?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will be glad to have it studied. Generally the bill would cover all businesses in the State of Ohio doing business of over a million dollars.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is the Senator from Massachusetts of the opinion that the State of Ohio, through its legislative body and through the opinion of its people, will not be able to determine for themselves what ought to be done in this instance?

Mr. KENNEDY. I thought that argument was settled in the 1930's. However, we can discuss it again in the 1960's. I do not believe there is any doubt that Congress, in the pending bill, is moving in areas which are constitutional. There may be some questions as to the wisdom of having a minimum wage established for certain industries. There may be some employers who, because of hours of employment, find it extremely difficult to come under it. I do not believe there is any doubt about the constitutional power of Congress to legislate in this field. I cannot accept the view that we do not have the power to legislate in this field. The question is the wisdom of our doing so. That is subject to discussion. After all, the phrase "affecting commerce" was included in the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then the Senator states, or at least implies, that none of the States of the Union are capable of handling this proposition of minimum wage laws, and therefore the Federal Government must take control. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. That is not what I said. I did not say anything about the capabilities of the States. What we are talking about now is within the commerce clause of the Constitution. We have made a determination, based on needs, that it is in the national interest for Congress to decide on certain minimums, below which no employee should be paid.

I believe that we are now taking in a new area in the minimum wage. The Senator from Ohio is talking about an area which comes under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, not under the jurisdiction of the States. We are talking about areas affecting interstate commerce. I do not believe there is any doubt that the courts have held in the past, and will hold in the future, that this is a proper exercise of the responsibility of Congress. What the amount of the minimum wage should be is, I think, a matter of debate. But I did not believe there was anyone who still doubted that Congress had the power to legislate in this field.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is not the import of my question; and the Senator from Massachusetts has not answered my question. Does the Senator take the position that the State of Ohio, through its legislature, pressed by public opinion, is not adequate to determine, and should not be trusted with the duty of determining, what a fair minimum wage should be?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not believe it is possible, under the law of probability, that 50 States will move in this field at the same time and provide a minimum wage, because there will not be the same interest in the individual States to provide the necessary minimum wage. It seems to me that in this area falls our responsibility.

We are not taking jurisdiction from the State of Ohio. We were given this jurisdiction by the Constitution of the United States. It seems to me to be perfectly proper to carry on the work which was begun 20 years ago in this field.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What will be left for the State of Ohio, in the event this bill is passed, and the Federal Government controls all employers having a volume of business of $1 million or more a year?

Mr. KENNEDY. What does the Senator mean by "control"? We say that if an employer grosses a million dollars a year, he ought to pay his employees at least $1.25 an hour.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What will be left to the States?

Mr. KENNEDY. There will certainly not be left to the employer the ability to pay less than $1.25 an hour, if he does a retail business of $1 million a year or more.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Massachusetts knows that the State of Ohio has a law dealing with this subject. Is he of the opinion that the legislators of my State, who are acquainted with the public opinion and conditions within the State, are not capable of handling the subject?

Mr. KENNEDY. Without going into the details of the capabilities of the Ohio Legislature, if the Senator from Ohio will read what the minimum wages are for the various States of the Union, he will, I am sure, come to the conclusion that they are, in many cases, inadequate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I agree fully.

Mr. KENNEDY. I know the Senator agrees with that statement. Therefore, because the minimum wages are inadequate, and because this is an area over which Congress has competence and responsibility given to it by the Constitution, it seems to me to be essential that we should act.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I come to my final question. Is not the Senator from Massachusetts expounding the theory that in our country a constant increase in the concentration of power in the Federal Government is the only means of solving our problems; that is, that we must move toward a bigger, a stronger, and a more dictatorial Federal Government?

Mr. KENNEDY. It does not seem to me that we are talking about a dictatorial Federal Government when we do something to enable the Federal Government to continue a work which has been going on for 25 years, namely, to provide a Federal minimum standard of pay and hours which employees work.

The States are not meeting their responsibility satisfactorily in this field. The Senator from Ohio knows, as he said, that some States have totally inadequate minimum wage laws. This is an area over which Congress has responsibility. Therefore, why should not the Federal Government meet its responsibility by making certain that the large industries pay a decent wage?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Would not the Senator from Massachusetts give some credence to this statement: Should we not have some faith in the judgment of the people within the States who know the conditions which prevail within the States and are better fitted to decide what should be done, than this group of 100 Senators who, frequently, are far removed from the problem?

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not hold that view at all. I do not believe there is anything improper or dictatorial about our legislating in this field, for this reason. On page 59 of the hearings is a list of the minimum wage regulations in the various States. There may have been recent action in the last year; if so, the list may be somewhat dated. I do not believe we should permit employers to gain an advantage by permitting them to pay lower wages or to pay substandard wages. After all, the costs of the people are quite uniform.

The minimum wages go as low as 65 cents an hour, 60 to 80 cents an hour, 71 cents an hour, and 75 cents an hour. I think those rates are inadequate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. While I was Governor of Ohio, special instructions were given to adjust Ohio's wage minimum. After a careful study had been made by the public representatives, the employer representatives, and the employee representatives, they could not reach a judgment about raising what I thought was a low wage level.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the State of Ohio have a minimum wage law?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes; it does. I urged the lifting of the level. But after that committee or commission had met and considered the question, they could not agree on lifting it. That is, they were acquainted with the local conditions, but they did not take action. I am not satisfied with that.

Mr. KENNEDY. What is the minimum wage in Ohio?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am unable to tell the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Many States, almost 20, have no minimum wage standards. So quite obviously, in answer to the Senator's question, I do not believe those States are meeting their responsibility.

For example, on page 60, there is a reference to minimum wage laws as they apply to laundries. Does Ohio have any law pertaining to that industry?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes; I think we do, and the rate is low. Nevertheless, I still insist that the States ought to take care of this problem. The Federal Government ought not to become bigger and bigger, taking unto itself powers which it never had, changing the definition of interstate commerce, and making the definition of interstate commerce dependent upon arbitrary figures or dollars. It is that about which I have doubt. If Congress can set the standard as $1 million, then 4 years from now it can bring it down to $10,000. What will happen then will be that the small businessmen of the States will be required to report to the Federal Government, all vestiges of State control will be destroyed, and the power of the Federal Government will become greater and greater.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are not talking, now, about lowering the standard to $10,000. We are speaking of a situation in which millions of Americans do not receive an adequate wage. In certain large cities in the United States, in the laundry business, the pay is 65 cents an hour for a 48-hour week. That is true not only in one part of the country; that situation exists in many parts of the country. Service station attendants work 54 hours a week.

We are talking about Americans who have to pay the same prices we pay. We are not talking about a theory; we are talking about a fact. Employers in many States are not paying decent minimum wages. Of course, in some States the situation is satisfactory.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have no quarrel with the attempt to lift the wage, but I have grave doubts about the propriety and, if I may say so, the integrity of trying to regulate the wage rate of business in intrastate commerce solely on the bases of the dollar volume of business done.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not want to mislead the Senate, but I have here a figure relating to the cleaning and laundry business in Ohio. It refers back to the 1935 figure, which is 35 cents an hour. I should like to know whether that amount has been raised.

Mr. LAUSCHE. While I was Governor, a commission was appointed to make a study and was instructed to raise the rate. It did not raise it because I think they found that the wage was far above that amount. I told the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago that they could not agree. I think the present Governor has instructed them to restudy the matter and recommend what the wage rate ought to be.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator will refer to page 60 of the hearings, he will see that many wage rates have not been changed since 1915. For women, in one State, the wage is 15.6 cents an hour. So I think there is a need for action by the Federal Government.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the minimum wage in interstate commerce should be increased; and I am in agreement with the proposal to increase it.

But I cannot agree with the proposition of converting what is domestic business into interstate business.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield, so that I may ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LUSK in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to ask this question because the Senator from Massachusetts mentioned the Taft-Hartley Act. I think this is a good place to clear up the entire field of apprehension, about which we are concerned.

As the Senator well knows, my philosophy does not embrace having the Federal Government dictate wages in the country. My philosophy is always one on the high-wage side, rather than on the low-wage side. So I would be against any such bill, regardless of how it was cleaned up.

But I think this is the meat of the matter: In the Taft-Hartley Act, the term "affecting commerce" means the following:

(7) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

If that type of definition of "affecting commerce" were contained in the Senator's bill, I believe it probably would remove some of the apprehensions which some of us have, because this is very clear. I think the term "affecting commerce," which has been taken from court decisions, although in my estimation it is broader than the original intent of the commerce clause, nevertheless is sufficiently restrictive so that people in business can tell fairly well whether they would be in interstate commerce.

We have been debating the definition that the Senator's bill contains in section 3(s), "activity affecting commerce," as follows:

(s) "Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

Would the Senator agree that his definition under section 3(s) is much broader in scope than the definition in section 2 of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. KENNEDY. As I recall, during the consideration of the labor-management bill last year, we were concerned about whether the State's law or the national law would apply. The authority as given under the Taft-Hartley Act ran to almost every conceivable kind of business; it was the National Labor Relations Board, rather than the Congress, which set certain arbitrary standards below which they would not assert jurisdiction.

We have set these standards by congressional action. We have given the $1 million figure for retail and service businesses and we have set them rather high.

I would say the language is somewhat different, because I think the Taft-Hartley Act talks about obstructing commerce.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is right.

Mr. KENNEDY. And this language is different.

I would say I do not think the coverage is different. I cannot think of any business we are attempting to cover that would not be covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. Can the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes, I can think of quite a few.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator from Arizona please tell us?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let us go a step further: Under the Senator's definition, the prescribed wage is now applied to the employer's entire business, not to a certain employee or employees. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, as amended, the application was to only the particular employees who were found to be engaged in interstate commerce.

Let us consider a warehouse business as an example: Let us say that only one man in the warehouse unloads the trucks and moves the merchandise into the bins. Under the old definition, he would be covered by the act. But under the new definition, because that man is engaged in interstate commerce and because there is no question about his being engaged in interstate commerce, the entire firm would be covered by the act, even though many of the employees of the firm—such as typists and clerks and so forth—would never actually themselves be engaged in an act that could be interpreted as being in interstate commerce.

Let us forget about a limitation of $1 or $1.25 or $1.50 or anything else, as regards coverage. Our concern is that under this very broad change from the original act and the act as amended—and I now refer to the definition of "activity affecting commerce"—it is almost impossible for me to think of a firm that would not be covered by this, outside of the exemptions in the act.

Mr. KENNEDY. I agree that there is a difference in definition which we are now covering, as between the previous act and this measure.

But I ask the Senator this question: Does he know of any area of activity that we are now covering, that could not be covered by the definition of "commerce" in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Oh, yes; I could enumerate several.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator from Arizona please do so?

Mr. GOLDWATER. For instance, I refer to the warehouse situation I just now mentioned.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Arizona does not think that if there were a labor dispute among the warehouse employees, the National Labor Relations Board could not assume jurisdiction, does he?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The labor dispute is a result; it is not a part of the definition of "activity affecting commerce" or having led or intended to lead to a labor dispute burdening commerce or the free flow of commerce. The area of wages does not obstruct or hinder the free flow of commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is right.

Mr. GOLDWATER. So I do not think that could be applied.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is why the definition is somewhat different here.

Mr. GOLDWATER. However, under the definition of the Senator from Massachusetts, as I say, it is difficult to think of any firm which would not be covered by the bill, outside of the exemptions the bill contains. A warehouse situation is one instance.

Let us consider a retail store that does all its business within the boundaries of one State, and does not make a sale over a State line, but brings in the merchandise across State lines. It would be covered, under the definition of the Senator from Massachusetts. That certainly would be one.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have just been checking with the staff. The National Labor Relations Board drew the line arbitrarily at half a million dollars, in the retail trade. The Board would not assume jurisdiction, but it had jurisdiction.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not think that means anything in connection with this particular debate. We have set arbitrary limits. Many persons will doubt the wisdom of doing so, as regards interstate commerce.

I think interstate commerce, as the Constitution intended, is the flow of goods across State lines. There is no argument about that.

But when we try to bring under the control of that clause, businesses that are the recipients of this flow, and when there is no return flow, I cannot follow that argument.

Mr. KENNEDY. In conclusion, let me say that I should like to have the Senator from Arizona, after consultation—and I shall also have consultation with our staff—state for me the kind of companies which could be covered by this definition, which could not be covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; and if the Senator will permit, I would be glad to explore the types of effect this bill would have on the coverage—the further interference by the Federal Government in that business that might go beyond the mere control of a minimum wage and the other parts of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I shall be very happy to do that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not have the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I agreed to yield next to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

But, first, I should like to make two comments—one, to open the door to a correction which I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts will wish to make. He spoke of the fact that businesses were not covered unless they made a million dollars a year. I think he meant if the total gross volume of business was $1 million a year.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. The profit might be nothing, as a matter of fact.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Florida is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. Or, in the case of the average retail business, the profit might be only 2½ percent of the $1 million a year.

Mr. KENNEDY. There is no question about that.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts would wish to make that correction.

Mr. KENNEDY. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLAND. Second, I wish to comment on the very frank statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, which I think may disclose some of the reasons why he is so much interested in this measure. I refer to his statement—and I think I am quoting him correctly; if not, I hope he will correct me—that but for such an act as this, employers in some States would have an advantage over employers in other States where the wage level is less or is lower.

Mr. KENNEDY. No, I do not think that is exactly what I said.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Massachusetts correct me?

Mr. KENNEDY. I was attempting to suggest—although I do not think what the Senator from Florida has stated is far from what I said.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Massachusetts state it in his own words, again?

Mr. KENNEDY. I say I do not think an employer in a business affecting interstate commerce should, by paying a substandard wage or a sweatshop wage, gain an advantage over an employer who is trying to pay a decent wage.

Mr. HOLLAND. That is a little better statement than the one the Senator made earlier.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think it comes as close to being correct as the Senator's statement does.

Mr. HOLLAND. The point I wish to make is that I think this is a point of view which has not been brought up in this debate. It is a point of view which does not have any particular interest in the employee or his standard of living, a point of view which does not have the same objectives at all as have been recited in the debate this afternoon and in the report as the objectives of the bill. And if the Senator is trying, by his bill, to iron out and even up competitive conditions throughout the Nation, without taking note at all of the fact that living costs are different in some parts of the Nation from other parts, as the Senator well knows, and in some businesses of the Nation as compared with some other businesses, then I say all the more is the unwisdom of this effort made apparent, because to attempt, by the fiat of law, to measure, for what the Senator referred to as competing employers in various parts of the country, the same standards of pay, in order that no one may take advantage of the other, is an objective that I do not think seems good and does not measure up at all when it is compared with matters that have been mentioned in this debate.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I respond?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am very glad to yield for any response.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am not suggesting that Congress should attempt to equalize competitive conditions in wages throughout the Nation. We are talking about a floor under wages. The Senator talks about differences between the cost of living in one part of the country and another; but there are not enough differences, and the standard of living is not much cheaper, in any one part of the United States that anyone can get along well on $1 an hour, regardless of whether he lives in Massachusetts or Florida or California or Texas, or no matter where he lives. The cost of living is higher, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, in Birmingham, Ala., than it is in Boston, Mass. What we are talking about is rockbottom. I am not suggesting we should equalize wage scales across the country, but the minimum should be equal.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator knows this perfectly well, himself, so it is not news to him when I say that the legislatures of the several States charged with this same responsibility, in a much more direct way, who know much more about the conditions in their States, have recognized the difference between living cost in large cities and in cities of intermediate size and in smaller communities. In some States, as I recall, as many as four brackets have been fixed; in others, three; in others, two.

I think it is quite idle to say that State legislatures are not in much superior position to look over their own situations, which we cannot possibly look at nationwide. We have a new State of Alaska, which has set up a minimum wage of a dollar and a half an hour, because they know so well their living costs are so much more there than in the rest of the Nation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLAND. In a moment. After I have yielded to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], then I shall gladly yield to the Senator from Illinois.

We cannot any more take care of a differing situation with the same degree of accuracy or facility as the State legislatures can than we can fly, because conditions and costs of living are so vastly different, and the State legislatures recognize them as being so different in certain States as to call for two or three or four standards.

I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question, or does the Senator wish something besides a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I would like to read a letter.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to yield to the Senator from Ohio to read a letter which he thinks has interest in this discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In April 1959 I wrote the director of industrial relations in Ohio about the Ohio law, and at that time the legislature was considering a bill. No information was given to me on the outcome of that bill.

In January of this year, my legislative assistant, Mr. Scanlon, followed it up with another letter. I think the letter is very interesting and is rather descriptive of the problems in the State. The letter reads as follows:

I have your letter of January 4 asking to be brought up to date on the subject of minimum wages in Ohio. Following up my letter to Senator LAUSCHE of April 29, 1959, as I advised in this letter, there was a minimum wage bill in the 1959 session of the legislature. This bill, which would cover men and women along the line of the Federal bill, was introduced at $1.25 per hour, but the rate reduced to $1 in committee. The sponsors of the bill were willing to go to 90 cents per hour, but the opponents (and the opposition was chiefly to the principle of minimum wages) would not go above 75 cents per hour. Since the drycleaning wage order, effective January 1959 called for a 90 cents per hour minimum wage, the proponents of the bill did not see how they could accept a 75-cent figure unless the bill also provided for wage board, which was not acceptable to the opposition.

There was a great deal of opposition from the rural districts who felt they should not have the same minimum rate as the big cities—as a matter of fact, in the metropolitan areas the rate is usually above 90 cents. However, in the small rural counties where there is not much industry to absorb those people who want to work, they must seek employment in the service industries and will work for whatever they can get.

It is subject to debate as to whether the employers in these small rural counties should dominate the minimum wage picture, but their arguments evidently made some impression on the administration, and, while I was personally in favor of the 90-cent rate, the Governor made a statement to the effect that he thought there was some merit to the contention that the employers in the small rural counties could not afford to pay the same rate as those in the metropolitan counties and that possibly there should be three "belts," with different wages covering the various sized areas. For instance, one rate for the metropolitan areas in which are included the largest and best paying cities, one rate covering the areas in which are comprised the medium sized, and one rate for the rural areas. In the early thirties when the first minimum wage rates were established in Ohio, we did have these three classifications, as did most of the other States, but those States adopting a statutory rate do not make this exception and most of the States, including Ohio, with minimum wage rates set by boards, have gotten away from this practice.

Pennsylvania still has this differential in the rates covering some of their service industries, but I understand that they find it impractical and are attempting to get away from it.

Senator LAUSCHE will recall that for three or four sessions, Senator Putka had a bill in the legislature for a 75 cent per hour minimum statutory rate. In his last session, Senator Putka was joined in this bill by Senator Danner, but the opponents smothered the bill and it never got out of committee. In this session the opposition was willing to take the 75 cent rate, but the proponents felt that the economy had moved ahead so that 75 cents was no longer realistic.

Inasmuch as the statutory rate bill did not pass we have started machinery preliminary to making a survey in the laundry industry.

I shall not finish reading the last 5 or 6 lines of the letter.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I ask the Senator, who wrote the letter?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Margaret A. Mahoney, who I think was a delegate to the convention.

Mr. KENNEDY. It is a very good letter. Whom was she representing?

Mr. LAUSCHE. She is the director of Industrial Relations of the State of Ohio. She occupied that position while I was Governor, and was reappointed by the present Governor, Governor Di Salle.

This shows that even within the State there are different conditions, where three categories of wages are fixed. It is clearly pointed out that in Ohio the legislature was unable to pass a dollar minimum wage bill for the entire State.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is why we should act.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There may be a question about whether we should think that our judgment is infallible and that the judgment of the State legislators is full of error, imprudence and ignorance of what is good or bad. That is a question for decision.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will yield next to the Senator from Illinois, if the Senator will bear with me a moment.

I have had handed to me a long list of the various States which have different classifications under the wage and hour laws or wage and hour orders; some having one, some the other, and some both.

I shall not attempt to read all of these, or even to place them all in the RECORD, because some of them do not bear upon this point, but the paper is available to any Senator who wishes to see it.

This shows that in the State of Colorado there are three different zones, differing in accordance with the sizes of the cities.

In the case of Kentucky there are three different zones, differing in accordance with the size of the cities.

I have nothing on which to rely other than this list, but in the case of Minnesota it is indicated that there are different groups and classifications for different industries. There are as many as four classifications by size of city for some industries, and a smaller number with reference to others.

The same thing seems to apply in the State of New York. I am glad to observe that the Senators from New York are present. Apparently this is what is done under wage orders issued pursuant to the State Wage and Hour Act.

Again, the State machinery has found a way to deal with the difference in living costs, depending upon the size of the city. I notice that the State of New York also has different classifications for different industries. At least that is so, if the list is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point, for a clarification of the facts?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will be happy to yield to the Senator in a moment. I am not trying to show anything other than the fact, which I think is clearly and irrefutably shown by the list, and which is known to every Senator present; namely, that the legislatures are closer to their people and closer to the industries in the States. They have found in some cases the wisdom of enacting laws which make certain differentiations. In other cases they have set up wage boards to look further into the facts, with authority to act within certain boundaries.

I cannot conceive of this Congress, at this distance, trying to legislate for 50 States. We cannot legislate with anything like the accuracy necessary to solve the various problems within the various States. The problems can be dealt with by the States more adequately under State law, as is shown in the case of many States.

For example, according to the list, the State of Pennsylvania has three zones; one for cities of 500,000 or more, one for cities down to 10,000, and one for cities of less than 10,000.

Mr. KEATING and Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLLAND. The legislation is adjusted under sound discretion. The problem has been solved in different ways. That is the point. The problems are different. They are different in varying industries. They are different in varying communities. I think we would be blind if we assumed to have a superior knowledge to that possessed by the legislators and the Governors, or a more accurate knowledge of the facts within the farflung 50 States of this Nation.

Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. JAVITS, and Mr. KEATING addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLLAND. I had agreed to yield to the Senator from Illinois. Then I shall be glad to yield to one of the Senators from New York. Which New York Senator was on his feet first?

Mr. JAVITS. It does not matter.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should yield next to the senior Senator from New York.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask my good friend from Florida whether in the State of Florida the legislature has made any provision for minimum wage standards in retail trade, laundries, and drycleaning establishments, hotels and restaurants, and for employees in canneries?

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not believe the legislature has done so. I do not believe the legislature needs to. There are higher levels of wages paid in our hotels and in our restaurants than are paid in the canneries, which are controlled by the Federal wage and hour law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I take it the Senator believes it does not cost anything to live in the State of Florida, and it is not necessary for the legislature to fix any minimum wage?

Mr. HOLLAND. There are many people who are delighted to live in the State of Florida.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And it does not cost anything to live there?

Mr. HOLLAND. We have almost 5 million permanent residents and about 9 million people come to Florida as our guests. Many of them are from Illinois. Many are happy to stay in Florida.

The point I am making is simply this: In the State of Florida we have very many deluxe industries which employ many hundreds of thousands of workers. Those people are well paid. Everybody knows they are. The competing industries have to meet, in large part, the competition of others who draw from the State labor pool.

It is a fact, if the Senator wishes to know it—and I am sure he does—that in those industries in our State which are controlled under the wage and hour law most of the pay scales are higher than the pay scales required under the wage and hour law. The people are paid more than the law requires. This is necessary to meet the local competition for labor.

In the case of canneries, which are under the Federal wage and hour law, the workers are paid more than the rate required by the Federal wage and hour law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But with respect to the workers in the retail trade and in the laundries and drycleaning establishments, does the Senator feel it does not cost anything for workers to live in Florida, so no minimum wage is needed?

Mr. HOLLAND. We happen to believe that the everyday activities of every citizen in the State do not have to be regulated either by the State legislature or by the Congress far away in order for our people to be happy or in order for our people to live prosperously. We still have some confidence in the application of private enterprise and in the rules of competition.

We are drawing laboring people every day of the year from Illinois, from New York, and from other fine States. We are delighted to have them come to Florida.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will yield in a moment.

These people do not come to Florida merely to enjoy the sunshine and our salubrious air, although they do enjoy it. They come to Florida because of the things they can receive in Florida, including the rates of pay there, if they have to work for pay. Those pay rates are extremely satisfactory, because more than a quarter million new people come to Florida each year.

This last year the census count showed 4,890,000 people as permanent residents of Florida. About 9 million vacationers during the winter were not counted among the nearly 5 million permanent residents.

This figure of nearly 5 million permanent residents compares with a figure of 2,771,000 in 1950, which means that we had the largest rate of population increase of any State in the Nation. Our increase was 76.5 percent.

I think it would be rather idle for the Senator to claim that we do not have anything in Florida which attracts laboring men and women, or that the pay for labor is not enough so that these men and women are willing to come to Florida, because the facts shout so much more loudly even than we might shout on the floor of the Senate. I have heard the distinguished Senator from Illinois shout rather loudly. I have done some shouting myself. Our shouting would not amount to anything compared to the facts. The facts are that a quarter million people, including an adequate share of the working people, find that Florida conditions are so much better than they find somewhere else that they move to Florida and become our permanent citizens. I do not think we have to argue about what happens in Florida.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. When the good people of Florida—and there are many good people in Florida—feel that the time has come when their lives must be regulated, regimented, controlled, and supervised by their legislature, they will certainly effectively gain that end.

When the citizens of Florida think their Senators and Representatives should vote for such a system as is proposed, they will certainly send somebody else here to represent them in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, because the Senators and Representatives from Florida have no such mandate from the proud and independent people who inhabit the great State of Florida.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am delighted to hear this eloquent chamber of commerce speech by my friend from Florida on the beauties of that State and the great magnetizing influence which it has in drawing population from other portions of the Union. Sand and sunshine seem to have great pulling power. I have observed that most of these migrants are beyond working age. There are not many of them in the full flush of youth and health. They go to Florida to retire on the earnings which they have made elsewhere.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I break in——

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I wish to finish my sentence.

Mr. HOLLAND. I want to break in right there, because I see that the distinguished Senator from Illinois, with all of his erudition, has not been fully educated on the growth of Florida. Florida is becoming one of the great manufacturing States. Florida is already the greatest fruit-producing State in the Nation. Florida already has the greatest fruit-canning industry in the Nation. Florida produces more oranges and grapefruit, for instance, than all the rest of the Nation combined, and a little more than twice as much. Florida produces more citrus fruit than any other State by a proportion of 2 to 1.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What about the hot air industry?

Mr. HOLLAND. We produce some of that, too. The State of Illinois is known to produce a good bit of it, and some of it is even transplanted to the floor of the Senate, where it functions very effectively and very engagingly, and we like to listen to it.

But the point could not be better illustrated than by what the Senator from Illinois has stated, and I am grateful to him for his statement. The problem is a State problem, and no two States are in the same economic condition. The legislature of every State is answerable to its own people. Each legislature will legislate to meet its own problems. The Governor of every State—and I have had the honor of serving in that capacity in my own State—certainly must be responsive to the will of the people in his State. I am sure the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] was so responsive making an all-time record in serving five terms as Governor of Ohio, in a State where the majority of the electorate at all times were of the opposite party. Notwithstanding that fact, the citizens knew a good man when they saw him. They insisted on electing and reelecting him for five terms, as I recall. Is the Senator suggesting that a man with that kind of experience had not learned something about what his people think and about living conditions in his State? That man who could then turn around and come to the U.S. Senate by a huge vote, notwithstanding the fact that if I read the newspapers correctly, most of the people who urge this class of legislation were fighting him.

I think it should be well understood that governors and State legislators know something about what their people need, and they legislate accordingly. I do not care how anyone may feel to the contrary, I merely wish to say that that is a sounder mechanism than for us to sit here and try by one bill to regiment all of the business in this great Nation from Florida to Alaska and from Hawaii to Maine, and to put all relationships between employers and employees under one halter. It does not make sense, and I do not think it is good Americanism.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I take it, then, the attitude of the Senator from Florida is that the Federal Government should not fix a minimum wage for the people of Florida, and that the Florida Legislature will not fix the wage. The Senator from Florida does not believe in a minimum wage, whether it is fixed nationally or locally, is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator, I think, should better let the Senator from Florida state his convictions on the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is that not the position of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOLLAND. No. The Senator from Florida wishes to keep the Federal Government in those fields that are so clearly Federal that there is some justification for exercise of its powers, and he does not think that this bill follows that rule.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And the State of Florida refuses to act.

Mr. HOLLAND. The State of Florida will act when there is a need for action.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rather infer that the Senator believes that a man or woman does not need anything to live in Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. The State of Florida will act when in the judgment of its own people, and in their own conviction, there is a need, and the action then will be in accordance with those needs and in accordance with those convictions.

I do not think it is sound for us to reach farther into the grabbag and try to lay down a rule of conduct and regimentation of business for this great Nation of 50 States, as farflung as they are, with conditions as different as they are.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator talks about regimentation. What about a living wage for employees? Is the Senator not concerned with that subject? Should he not be concerned with it?

Mr. HOLLAND. I certainly am.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why does the Senator not do something about it?

Mr. HOLLAND. If my people were not concerned, we know perfectly well our State would not prosper. We know perfectly well that our State cannot prosper except under a balanced economy, and a part of that balanced economy in our opinion is not to ask the Government to tell us what should be paid and what should not be paid. That procedure has not been undertaken up to the present time.

We have a great pulling power for people in whatever capacity, high or low, they are fitted. They are coming by the hundreds of thousands, and we welcome them. We keep the welcome mat out. We do not think it would be very much of a welcome mat if we were to say that Florida had become a welfare State, and had passed the type of legislation which is found to be popular in some of the tired, old States which are losing population and not gaining it.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. I take it that the Senator from Florida does not share the view expressed in the Senate by some of our brethren that when the people of a State elect a Member of the Senate they select a wise man, whereas when the same people select members of a State legislature they select foolish people.

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not believe in that theory. I think the State legislature is still able to take care of State business. We have a fine Governor.

I hope my friend from Illinois will not run away.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all. I thought you had finished.

Mr. HOLLAND. I did not mean to say anything unfriendly or unsympathetic to my friend, because we welcome hundreds of thousands of good people who come from Illinois. I would like to say that they are a little more ambitious people than some of the people who remain in their own States because they glimpse the increased opportunity for good living for themselves and their children. They have come in by the thousands, and we welcome them. We hold out open arms for them.

From time to time the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] comes down and we feel that same way toward him. He is always invited. He is always welcome. He will always be generously received. We shall forget the fact that he has thought about some plans for government that are not in accord with the thinking of our people, because we accord to him complete freedom of conscience and convictions and we want him to follow his own.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am delighted at the tribute to my character that the Senator from Florida has just paid. But I should like to know why the Senator from Florida is so opposed to the Government promoting human welfare. The Senator speaks of a "welfare State" in very scornful terms. The Senator from Florida is an erudite lawyer. He knows that the promotion of the general welfare is stated in the preamble to the Constitution as one of the fundamental principles and purposes in the formation of this Republic. In article I of the Constitution, it is also stated that Congress shall have the power to levy taxes, to promote the general welfare.

Why does the Senator think this Government should give subsidies to ship operators and shipbuilders and airlines—I know the Senator from Florida has been interested in those operations—and yet should not try to promote human welfare? What is wrong with the Government trying to help people? Does such an effort deserve all this edged scorn in his voice?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Illinois has asked a good question, a fair question. The Senator from Florida has not supported helping industries which the Senator from Florida did not believe should be helped, and which he did not think were necessary to our country and its defense and security, but has helped those industries which were so disadvantaged by what is going on in other parts of the Nation that they were about to dry up.

The Senator from Florida has supported the great maritime shipping industry of our country, because he believes that that industry is one of our great arms of defense. He has supported the aviation industry for the same reason. He sees on the floor the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], who has done so much in that field.

He has supported subsidies in government where they were greatly needed. However, the Senator has heard no voice coming from his people—and there are nearly 5 million of them—demanding a regimentation of their businesses or of their employees.

To the contrary, they are building every day a bigger and stronger and healthier State, and are happily building it. The Senator from Florida will not go out of his way to set up a welfare State and set up controls when they are not needed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Everything that benefits the owners of business the Senator from Florida favors; anything that helps the welfare of people the Senator from Florida is against. Is that correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. Oh, no; I am afraid the Senator from Illinois is not as fair as he customarily is. I am sure he does not mean to be unfair. The Senator from Florida was the original supporter of the act in our State providing benefits for the aged. The State of Florida is far up on the list of States which have done great things for the aged who need it. The State of Florida has been very good in its treatment of the aged people who come there. We impose no tax on their homes for any purpose up to a valuation of $5,000. We are generous in scaling down the value, too.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is done to attract visitors.

Mr. HOLLAND. Oh, no; it applies to our people as well as to Illinois citizens who have come to live with us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That was done to get the aged to come to Florida to retire.

Mr. HOLLAND. No; the sunshine did that job for us. I do not believe that a $5,000 exemption in one of the colder States to the North—I will not mention it—would reverse the trend and send the old people scurrying from Florida to a cold climate which they had left to go to Florida in seeking a mild climate and pleasant conditions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We are familiar with the purpose of the Florida Homestead Act. Florida first passed a constitutional amendment exempting all residents of Florida from a State inheritance tax. That was superseded by the Federal inheritance tax law. Then the people of Florida passed their constitutional amendment exempting homesteads up to, I believe, originally $3,500, and later $5,000. The first act was to attract people to the east coast, to Palm Beach, to attract the wealthy people who were on the point of dying. Their children encouraged their parents, too, because if there were no inheritance tax, the children could then inherit everything from their parents without paying any inheritance tax. In other words, if their parents were going to die, they might as well go to Florida to die.

That law was knocked out by the Federal inheritance tax law. Then the State adopted the homestead law to attract people to the west coast. It was purely a real estate promotion venture. I do not like to see my friend from Florida wrap the mantle of human welfare around his State on such a matter as this. They first tried to protect the wealthy aging; when they failed, they helped the middle class. In both cases, it was a device to draw the older citizens.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Illinois is proving my point, and he is doing it very eloquently and very successfully, in showing the concern which the State of Florida has for its people.

However, I do not believe he would want the RECORD to be inaccurate in one minor particular. Therefore, I will correct him in that respect. The State of Florida adopted a tax exemption on inheritance taxes, by constitutional amendment. Then, looking down with some envy upon the great exodus of people who were going from other States to Florida, Congress passed a law which gave credit against the Federal estate tax in a rather small amount.

As quickly as we could, we called our State legislature together and the legislature adopted an amendment under which any amount credited by the Federal Government on the payment of the Federal estate tax can be taxed by the State, in the wisdom of the legislature, but not exceeding that.

I do not believe that the Senator would say that that is an unintelligent action. Rather, it is a part of a general program under which, with a climate that is attractive, an incentive has been offered to the people in our State, and it has added to attraction of the sunshine and salubrious breezes from the gulf and the Atlantic——

Mr. DOUGLAS. What about the magnolia blossoms? Is the Senator in his flowery speech going to neglect them?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator has beaten me to it. He took my final, concluding phrase from me. I was going to end up with references to mocking birds and magnolia blossoms.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What about the Spanish moss? It is as thick upon the trees of Florida as it is upon the arguments of my beloved friend.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Would the Senator from Florida be interested in the information, as disclosed by page 61 of the hearings, that Illinois has no minimum wage provision whatever for hotels and restaurants?

Mr. HOLLAND. I hope the Senator from Illinois will follow with interest this disclosure.

Mr. ERVIN. Would the Senator from Florida be interested in the information, as disclosed at page 60 of the hearings, that the minimum wage law in Illinois for women and minors in laundries and drycleaning establishments is 23 to 28 cents an hour?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am shocked. I am terribly shocked. I thought that the attitude of the Senator from Illinois has displayed here and in his State would reflect much better treatment of women and minors in laundry and drycleaning employment. Perhaps he can explain that situation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In the first place, our Illinois rates are 23 cents to 28 cents higher than in the State of Florida, where the rate is zero.

Mr. HOLLAND. We have no minimum.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is right. We do not have a higher rate than we do because the Republican Senate in the State of Illinois prevents our getting a higher minimum wage law through the Senate. So it is the Republican allies of the Senator from Florida who prevent a higher minimum wage law being enacted in Illinois.

Mr. HOLLAND. I judge, from what the Senator says, he believes that Senators who with me sit on this side of the aisle, and others in his own State and in other States, have for reasons sufficient to themselves taken no action, or action which he regards as inadequate action, but which we here may regard as adequate. I do not approve of that philosophy. I will not be a party to forcing on the good people of Illinois a thing which I think they can measure under the guidance of the Senator from Illinois, able as he is, better than we can judge here.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Would the Senator from Florida be interested to know that the State of Illinois has no wage and hour law with reference to hotel and restaurant workers?

Mr. DOUGLAS. In that respect we are on a level with the State of Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Except that we have a greater appeal and have a great many more hotels. We have a higher rate of pay. The second point is that it is good to have a Supreme Court judge as a Member of the Senate, because he does not merely listen, but also looks for the facts. He found a fact which I believe is somewhat confusing if not disastrous to the Senator from Illinois in his argument, when we find that laundry and drycleaning workers in Illinois are paid a minimum wage of—how much was that?

Mr. ERVIN. Twenty-three to twenty-eight cents an hour.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is a grossly inadequate wage but not as inadequate as the nonexistent minimum in Florida.

Mr. ERVIN. Would the Senator from Florida draw the inference that the fact that the minimum wage of minors and women in laundries and drycleaning establishments in Illinois was 23 to 28 cents an hour indicates that it was necessary for the people of Illinois to pass a law in order to have the women and children paid that much in Illinois?

Mr. HOLLAND. Evidently the problem existed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is wholly inadequate. We have tried to increase it by State action, but the Republican allies of the Senator from Florida, who control the Illinois Legislature, and have controlled it continuously for all but 2 years of the last quarter of a century, have not permitted such a State law to be enacted.

Mr. HOLLAND. I notice, if I may go to another page——

Mr. ERVIN. I wanted to ask the Senator about a statement on page 59.

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes.

Mr. ERVIN. In Illinois there was established, by executive order, a State minimum wage for women and minors in the retail industry, amounting to 55 cents, and that was held to be invalid by an Illinois circuit court.

Mr. HOLLAND. An Illinois court?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did the Senator from Illinois hear that statement?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I heard it. I do not claim that the Illinois circuit courts are perfect. Illinois has a great many Republican judges who do not fully understand the law and the Constitution.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is interesting to observe that the Senator from Illinois finds it necessary to place the burden on the Republicans in order to explain any discrepancy in his State.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is accountable for much of the trouble.

Mr. HOLLAND. Florida is a Democratic State. Many fine Republicans live there. More and more of them are coming there. We welcome them. We have not found that they take over the government; they generally join us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator has joined them.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Illinois does not find me sitting on the other side of the aisle. I am not here to boast at all, because I am humbly thankful. I have been elected Governor of my State. The Democrats did that. Registration in the State then was about 15 to 1 Democrats over Republicans.

The last time I was elected to the Senate, which was the third time, the registrants were 5 to 1, Democrats over Republicans.

So I think the Senator from Florida can say with some degree of certainty that he represents the Democrats of Florida and must be practicing the kind of democracy in which they believe.

I have been twitting the Senator from Illinois a little keenly, perhaps, about his own State; but I think it is worthy of notice, when he makes this great charge against Florida, that a 55-cent minimum wage for the retail trade has been knocked out by the courts of his State, when there has been a 23-cent and a 28-cent minimum—and apparently there still is—for women and minors in the laundry and drycleaning trade, under the laws of his State. Apparently that minimum has not been knocked out. If it has been, there is no such information here. Then, in the matter of restaurants and hotels, no action has been taken.

There may be other fields in which there is a more adequate enactment in the State of Illinois; but for the canning industry, I do not find any at all in the State of Illinois. That industry is not cited as having any minimum wage or hours. In the other fields covered by the various lists, I find no minimum wage for the State of Illinois.

I think the Senator from Illinois and I may agree on what has happened. He comes from a State which has not found it necessary to enact high wage standards, or to enact any at all, in some trades. I am perfectly willing to assume that the good people of Illinois, through their duly elected representatives, have done what they thought should be done in that State. I do not want to supersede their judgment with mine. Neither do I want to supersede the judgment of the legislators and the Governor of the State of Florida by the judgment of Senators here, including the Senator from Florida or any others. I do not believe that is the way to solve this problem.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Florida is perfectly well aware that the State of Illinois, like most of the industrial States of the Nation, is one in which the rural and nonindustrial areas are grossly overrepresented in at least one branch of the State legislature. This condition runs through virtually all American State governments. It is true of New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, California, Illinois, and other States as well. In Illinois, it so happens that in the senate the nonindustrial areas are overrepresented. Because of that fact, and associated with that fact, the Republicans control the upper house of the State legislature. It is almost impossible to pass an adequate minimum wage law through the legislature as long as they control that body. It is this fact—the underrepresentation of the industrial areas on the State level—which is forcing more and more industrial areas to appeal to the Federal Government for action. This is a fundamental political reality. It cannot be covered up.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the frankness and candor of the Senator from Illinois. In the State of Florida, we do not have a Republican majority in either house. One State senator is a Republican, and 6 out of the 95 members of the house are Republicans. So we cannot blame any action there upon them.

As a matter of fact, this is not a party issue, as everyone knows. My recollection is that some of the States which have passed wage and hour laws are now Republican controlled. I know nothing, for example, about the control of the senate and house—the legislature—of the State of New York; but I know that both Senators from New York are members of the Republican Party, and I am perfectly willing to be associated with them on the friendliest terms, even though——

Mr. DOUGLAS. They are very charming gentlemen.

Mr. HOLLAND. Even though I sit on one side of the aisle, and they sit on the other. As I recall, their Governor, as recently as the convention at Chicago the other day, was a Republican.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I hesitate to get into this schizophrenic discussion between the two wings of the Democratic Party. However, I wish to inform the Senator from Florida that we take great pride in the fact that both branches of the Legislature of the State of New York are Republican; that the Governor of New York is a Republican; and that all the elected State officeholders, except one, is a Republican.

I am happy to be associated with members of both wings of the Democratic Party. They are charming gentlemen. I know there are many, like myself, who may follow my dear friend from Illinois, and there are many who will follow my good friend from Florida.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or who follow a middle course.

Mr. KEATING. They may follow a middle-of-the-road or a more progressive, more realistic, or more idealistic approach. One could use many different adjectives.

However, there is one thing on which I should like to set the Senator from Florida straight in this discussion. I believe he referred to the fact that there had been heretofore no argument about the point that Florida and other States had so enthusiastically embraced the working people who came there from the Northern States. The Senator from Florida must have been absent when I was complaining about that subject yesterday.

Workers have migrated there because industries have located there which were previously in a Northern State. I know that it is not entirely due to wage rates. I know of the beautiful climate of the State of Florida. I have enjoyed it. I like warm weather better than cold weather. I admit it. Nevertheless, much of the exodus or pirating, as some use the phrase—I am not referring to the Senator from Florida, but to some of his fellow citizens in the State of Florida—has taken place because some States have much lower wage rates. This is one reason why, it seems to me, the Senators from the State of New York, in looking out for the best interests of the people who work in that State, and of the industries of that State, so many of whom have left because of the very point the Senator from Florida has brought up, must be in favor of some Federal standard in order to avoid the further exodus of industries from their State.

Our present distinguished Governor has reversed a good bit of the trend. I give him great credit. But it has become very serious to the State of New York and to many other Northern States.

I can well recognize why the Senator from Florida and his associates are opposed to any minimum wage. In my judgment, it is because a minimum wage might well have a deterrent effect on the exodus of industries from the North.

Mr. HOLLAND. First, I am glad the Legislature of the State of New York, wholly Republican controlled in all of its activities, has shown an attitude of willingness to enact legislation along the lines suggested by the Senator from Illinois—which at least deprives him of the argument that none but Republicans defeat legislation of this type.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield, in order that I may make a correction?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall yield in a moment.

I wish to say to my distinguished friend that I know of no industries that have come from New York to Florida. Our industries have been what are generally called clean industries, such as electronics, aviation, atomic energy, and similar ones.

Mr. KEATING. Our industries are clean. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLAND. If the Senator looks at the smoke-stained walls of the cities in New York, he realizes that not all of the New York industries are clean. But ours are.

The second point I wish to make is that as an attorney I have had the duty of settling in our State a good many people from New York and other States in the East. I must say in frankness to my distinguished friend that in many instances the reason for their coming to Florida has been the very high tax structure of the very States from which they have come—including the Senator's own State.

I do not think it is at all true that we have "stolen" industries from New York. We have not put out any effort to "steal" industries. I refused to support the distressed-areas bill of last year or the year before when the amendment which would have made the law such that none of those funds could be used to attract industries to move from one State to another was rejected. I do not think the Federal Government should aid in that migration. I do not think the States should pay for the cost of moving industries from other States.

We are perfectly willing to continue growing under the situation which brings people and industries to our State; and we are grateful that the Nation has located great activities in our State. We assume that is because of geographic and climatic reasons. In that connection, I refer to the guided-missile establishments at Cape Canaveral, which have been the reason for the location in Florida of a number of aviation and electronic plants. I refer, similarly, to the location of a number of plants in Pinellas County, such as the plant of the Minneapolis-Honeywell Co. A large number of important plants have been established in Florida in connection with the guided-missile developments and the developments in other industries. Our great industries have not been plucked away from New York or from any other State; they have been established in Florida in connection with the growth of these great, new efforts.

If the Senator from New York thinks that Florida is not attuned to the fact that we are living in a new and an exciting age with many changes, he simply does not know Florida.

A short time ago, when I was interrupted, I started to say that quite recently the Governor of Florida has been chairman of the National Conference of Governors, and also chairman of the Southern Conference of Governors—which indicates that we pick for our Governors rather intelligent men.

Mr. KEATING. And also the chairman of the Democratic National Convention.

Mr. HOLLAND. In making that reference to the selection of the Governors of our State, I exclude present company, of course.

So I think we have demonstrated the ability to take care of our own problems.

Sometimes there are problems which we find that we, ourselves, cannot take care of, or problems which lie peculiarly in the Federal field. When there are such, I shall be here aggressively presenting requests for attention by the Senate, and I shall be supporting equally the legitimate claims from other parts of the Nation for attention in similar fields. So all of us are living together.

But let us continue to live under an American system which says the States have certain sovereign responsibilities and important duties to their people. The States can best see how their people are living and how their industries are operating. I would rather trust to their judgment, instead of the judgment I possess, when it comes to looking over the great expanse of this Nation—from Alaska to Florida and from Maine to Hawaii—and trying to make up my mind as to what the hundreds of thousands of industries affected need by way of a wage-and-hour law.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I simply wish to correct a statement the Senator from Florida made; I am sure it was made through inadvertence. In the first part of his remarks the Senator from Florida said, as I understood him, that the Senator from Illinois, distinguished as he is, dictated the policies of the State of New York.

Mr. HOLLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. KEATING. So far as I know, the Senator from Illinois had nothing to do with the action of the Governor of New York or the action of the New York Legislature in enacting the New York minimum wage legislation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Either the Senator from New York misunderstood me or else I accidentally stated something entirely foreign to what I intended to state.

Mr. DOUGLAS. However, I think that is a matter of record. Certainly the Senator from Illinois had nothing to do with it; but we are very proud of the fact that Franklin Delano Roosevelt, when Governor of New York, and Herbert Lehman—a former distinguished Member of this body—when Governor of New York were responsible for the New York minimum wage law; and certainly the well-doing of such distinguished Democrats in the State of New York has greatly improved the Republican Party in New York and has enabled the two distinguished Republican Senators from New York to come to this body, whereas if it had not been for that competition and that resultant well-doing, perhaps they would have been relegated to back seats in their own party.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratitude to the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator had heard my earlier remarks, he would have heard me plead for retention of this program in the form in which it was recommended by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. He recommended it in terms which could not possibly be misunderstood and in terms which I think are still effective, and should be effective, in shaping our thinking.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I wish to express my gratitude to my friend, the Senator from Illinois, for having such a solicitous interest in my political welfare.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, I agree. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. I deeply appreciate it.

Of course, I think it is true that the two political parties in New York—as in the case of many other States, I imagine—do vie with each other in trying to do the best for the people that they can do. I have a high regard for many of the things President Roosevelt accomplished. I disagree with some of the things he did and I disagree as to some of the things he failed to do. But it must be conceded that in New York both Governor Dewey and Governor Rockefeller have been in the forefront of what we like to call progressive, forward-looking legislation.

Mr. HOLLAND. Let me say that is certainly true.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me enter a caveat. In the first place, Governor Dewey did not dare undo the work which already had been done; and, second, Governor Rockefeller wanted to continue it.

Mr. KEATING. Of course, I would not want to get into a partisan debate which in any way would lower the standards of Senate debate. So I shall not try to reply to what the Senator has said, except to say that I am sure most Americans have a very high regard for the statesmanship of both Governor Dewey and Governor Rockefeller.

There is one point which I wish to clear up with the Senator from Florida. It was not my intention to create the impression that low wages alone have attracted industries from New York, Ohio, Illinois, Massachusetts, and other Northern States to other areas of the country. Other factors are involved, although low wages often are an important factor.

Although the distinguished Senator from Florida may not be able, offhand, to refer to any specific company which has been enticed—and in that connection I like the word "enticed" very much better than the word "stolen," for the word "stolen" has a sinister connotation—from New York or other Northern States to Florida, yet the fact remains that even as regards the industries to which he has referred, when a company which has plants in many States decides where to open a new plant, one of the factors it considers—and, of course, any man in business would consider it—is the wage rate in the particular locality.

Far be it from me to say that the Federal Government should fix wage rates. I would rue the day when the Federal Government stepped in to fix wages and to fix prices. Much with which I take issue in the platform adopted at Los Angeles by the party of the Senator from Florida relates to my fear that if we carried all of it out, it might well lead to the fixing of wages and prices.

That would be foreign to my thinking. But I think that is a far cry from saying we should not fix a fair minimum which represents a rockbottom wage on which any family could live in this country, and do it on a Federal basis, applying it to all the States. I think there is wide discrepancy between those two matters.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator for his comments.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have obtained the figures showing the representation in the Legislature of the State of Ohio. In the 1959 session they declined to adopt a $1 minimum wage recommended by the committee. The bill was defeated. In several sessions while I was Governor the legislature failed to enact such a bill. While I was Governor, there was a Republican legislature in each of the five terms except the first. In this biennium there is a Democratic legislature, having a representation of 20 Democrats in the Senate as against 13 Republicans. In the House there are 78 Democrats and 61 Republicans. I think the efforts of Governor DiSalle, of Ohio, in trying to get the bill through by suggesting a division into three categories, the metropolitan areas, the semi-rural-urban areas, and the rural areas, is about descriptive of what the different counties represent. There are some which are typically rural, others are between rural and urban, and then there are the metropolitan centers. There may be a preponderance on the rural side.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to ask my dear friend from Ohio what conclusion he draws from this lineup in the Ohio Legislature and the failure of the Ohio Legislature to establish an adequate minimum?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think the conclusion to be drawn is that in the normal processes the wages are substantially above that minimum. In Illinois no one would pretend that it is 23 cents. It just cannot be. But I give these figures to show that a very dominant Democratic legislature still had trouble getting the bill through.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The inference I draw is very different. It is that in the State legislatures, as in the Congress, there is a peripheral group of Democrats which always votes with the Republicans.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, that is a conclusion which the distinguished Senator from Illinois can draw in his own discretion. There have been many votes on various questions of appropriations proposed for what I thought were necessary public improvements—I do not think any of them were in the State of Illinois—in my own State and in other States, and I think the Senator from Illinois, with a fine impartiality, has generally voted against measures of that kind which were at all in question. I am not disposed to call the Senator a Republican——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a correction on that point?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am not disposed to call the Senator a Republican simply because he does not agree with my philosophy that the investment of our Nation in improved flood control, navigation, and waterpower projects is an investment which pays off manifold. That is a matter of individual conscience. Nothing would ever make me charge the distinguished Senator with being a Republican, because I know he feels very intensely otherwise; and I hope he will conclude that there sit on this side of the aisle some who believe as I do who still are stanch Democrats, though they may not agree with the conclusions of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a correction? Because the Senator from Illinois has complained of voting with the Republicans, I will say that this very week, on the floor of the Senate—and I commended him on the floor—he and three other Democrats voted with the Republicans in an effort to strengthen the civil rights of our Nation. Apparently the Senator from Illinois does not always find Republicans repulsive. I do not like to hear a discussion which indicates or implies that the word "Republican" is a dirty word, because oftentimes the Senator from Illinois and I have found ourselves in agreement.

I am always happy when I am in agreement with anyone, and I am unhappy when I find myself in disagreement. But I do point out that the RECORD should be corrected, and I again commend the distinguished Senator from Illinois for voting with the Republicans and for seeing that the Republicans were in the right on the issue of civil rights.

Mr. HOLLAND. Before the Senator answers, may I say the Senator from New York has made a telling answer to the Senator from Illinois, what amounts to a coup de grace in this discussion, and I commend him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, let me say that there is always a saving remnant of virtue on that side of the Chamber, and any manifestation of it is quite welcome. So I welcome them. I only regret that during the discussion last winter, when we had a chance to pass a decent civil rights bill, there were so few Republicans wanted to do it. The Senators from New York helped us, but most of the Republicans did not help us, when we tried to pass a decent civil rights bill. Now when there is very little time and other matters to take care of, suddenly all the Republicans want a civil rights bill. We welcome their deathbed repentance, provided they are sincere, and I was very happy to see that deathbed repentance. I say to the Senator from New York that I exempt him from that statement. He has been consistently in favor of civil rights. The Senators I am talking about are the very ones whose chairs are now empty and who are not present here this afternoon. I am merely talking about the men who filled the presently empty chairs who would not help civil rights last winter by voting for those measures. Then, to embarrass the Democrats this summer, all of a sudden they develop an enthusiasm for such legislation. I voted with them because I thought they were right this week. I lament that they were not right last winter when a few of us were carrying the burden.

Mr. KEATING. I merely call attention to the fact that there are many more vacant chairs on the side of the Senator from Illinois than there are on our side.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But not as many proportionately.

Mr. KEATING. Perhaps not, but there are many more empty chairs there, a situation which we hope to remedy.

I take issue with the Senator when he implies I am the only Republican who voted for the bill. All the Republicans except two voted to strengthen the Civil Rights Act and on the Democratic side only the Senator from Illinois, my distinguished friends, the Senators from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA and Mr. HART], who are sitting in the Chamber, and the Senator from Oregon joined the Republicans in our great effort. They were the only ones voting with the Republicans at that time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I am so glad that the eye of the distinguished Senator from Illinois was turned the other way and that he has been diverted from the Senator from Florida; and I am glad I have noticed that they have not cast into the outer darkness two Members on their side who joined the better informed Democrats on this side in the vote of the other day. No intention of any sort has been shown to dissociate them from their side because their consciences required them to vote responsibly.

Mr. KEATING. On some matters we are in disagreement. I was merely pointing out that the extremes within the parties are much less in the Republican Party than in the Democratic Party.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank both of my friends. They have contributed materially to the debate.

I apologize to other Senators for having taken so long. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] who was a member of the committee at the time the original act was passed and a member of the conference committee, who knows the background of the legislation perhaps better than any other living person now serving in the Senate, is ready to speak. I hope he will be gracious enough to allow me to read one more page of a prepared address, and then to yield the floor.

Mr. President, the retail and service businesses are opposed to the extension of the act in the pending measure because they conceive their activities to be purely local. People in these businesses probably have not given too much thought on the question of interstate or intrastate commerce. Their position, however, coincides with the concept of intrastate commerce in that they feel their activity is a local activity best governed by local government.

One might contend that their objection to Federal control in this area is not well founded and that they have nothing to fear if the Federal Government regulated this aspect of their businesses. Many retailers, however, are quite familiar with the implications of being covered under this law, as they had a taste of it prior to 1949 when their exemption was practically eliminated as the result of administrative determinations and court decisions.

I am not mentioning their troubles under the OPA, the OPS, and the NRA. Although the retailers at that time were only required to pay 40 cents an hour and time and one-half for overtime, their troubles stemmed not so much from the minimum wage and overtime provisions as from the complications and intricacies of the act as interpreted. Many retailers were literally blackmailed into submission. They could not afford extended litigation. Even though they might have been able to prove they were entitled to the exemption. The situation under this law is comparable to that we find arising out of the administration of other Federal regulatory laws. As Senators all know, Federal regulations and interpretations are not always consistent with what Congress intended and what the courts have ruled, much as administrative personnel might strive to carry out congressional intent. In many, many instances, American citizens must go to the trouble and expense of litigating to override these erroneous interpretations and to protect their rights.

Mr. President, as an attorney I brought the first suit in a Federal court for a small grower-owned packinghouse at Lakeland, Fla., which suit ultimately reached the court in Washington, D.C., and was knocked out for technical reasons. I wish to tell the Senate that the technical reasons required the suit to be reinstituted in Washington, D.C.

I wonder if we really think it is fair or reasonable to have a requirement that people who are adversely affected, whether they live in Alaska, in Maine, in Florida, or in Texas, must come to Washington, D.C., to litigate a matter, at huge expense, which they think is a life-and-death matter for the preservation of their rights and perhaps for the preservation of their entire fortunes.

This is an expense which is too often impossible for the citizen of modest means to meet, and too often he must capitulate to bureaucratic demands. It is this long arm of the Federal Government that local retail and service people fear.

Let us make no mistake about it. The retail dealers of this Nation, the automobile dealers, the agricultural equipment dealers, the hotel people, the restaurant people, the laundry people, the electrical equipment dealers, the hardware dealers, the bakers, and any other number of local stores and institutions, which fill the main streets of every town, village, and city of this Nation, are terribly afraid of the proposed law. I do not want any Senator to seriously consider voting for the bill without realizing that that is the case. It is my contention that we should keep Federal legislation in a field affecting these far-flung business enterprises, hundreds of thousands in number, to a very bare minimum, and should pass such legislation only when there is a clear and overriding national justification.

I close with the statement that search as I have—and I have carefully considered the majority report in this connection—I have not been able to find such a justification. I have not been able to find a clear and overriding national interest which would call on us to enact any such punitive legislative as that which is proposed.

Mr. President, I yield the floor, and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay Mr. AIKEN, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BYRD of Virginia, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CLARK, Mr. COOPER, Mr. COTTON, Mr. DODD, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. FONG, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GORE, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. JORDAN, Mr. KERR, Mr. LUSK, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SMATHERS, Mrs. SMITH, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WILEY, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, is there an amendment before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original bill; no amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it in order to move the third reading of the bill?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; we would have to call up an amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am wondering whether there is any chance to get a vote on any amendment tonight. We began the consideration of the bill on Wednesday evening. It was discussed all day Thursday, and now all day Friday. The present session is expected to be limited in length. Many bills are before Congress. I think the people know what is at issue.

As I understand, 40 amendments are to be offered, possibly, by one Senator. Another dozen, or even 40, may be offered by all other Senators together. The Senate has not acted on even one amendment.

I am wondering whether there is any chance, if any Senator can tell me, that we might vote tonight on one amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not have 40 amendments; the number is 32. I shall not call up those amendments if the Holland amendment or the amendment in the nature of a substitute prevails. I think it would be foolish to start on those amendments, even though some of them are extremely important, when there is a chance that their need might not be felt, if either of the other amendments is accepted.

Speaking now as one Senator who is interested——

Mr. KENNEDY. I know I am trespassing on the good nature of the Senator from Louisiana, but would the Senator from Arizona be agreeable to a unanimous consent request that debate on the Holland amendment be limited to 3 hours on each side?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I shall have to object to any unanimous-consent agreement. I announced that earlier.

I realize that the Senator from Massachusetts and the majority leader are anxious to get on with the work. I cannot blame them. However, I must remind Senators that we have had all year to get on to the minimum wage bill. The minimum wage subject is a very complicated subject, as we have discovered from a reading of the bill and the little debate which had taken place on the floor. The objection is not voiced so much to the $1.25 or the coverage; it is voiced to some of the radically new language contained in the proposal, language that has not been proposed to be included in the Fair Labor Standards Act until now.

Mr. KENNEDY. Could not the Senator from Arizona let the majority of the Senate decide that question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; that is what I propose.

Mr. KENNEDY. Instead of delaying a vote day after day, let us at least begin to vote on some of the amendments. I do not say that we should finish the bill; I simply say that we should make our voices heard as to whether we shall accept the Holland amendment or not.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Last night the Senate recessed at about 7 o'clock. I am willing to stay as late as possible tonight. I understand there is a gentlemen's agreement to end the session at about 10 o'clock. The Senator from Louisiana desires to speak.

I think that when we start to call up amendments, they will move with relative speed.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator from Arizona think we can vote on an amendment tomorrow?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I would not want to answer the Senator's question in the absence of either the Senator from Illinois, the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], or the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], both of whom have amendments to offer. I do not know when the minority leader will speak, and I do not know when the Senator from Florida will speak. I cannot speak for them; I can speak only for myself.

Mr. KENNEDY. Of course, the Senator from Arizona is well within his powers; I simply say that I do not believe it will be possible to move ahead with all the proposed legislation before the Senate unless we can begin to vote and let the majority decide which way they want to act on this bill and on other bills. I do not think there is any doubt that Senators can prevent the passage of a single bill in the Senate in the month of August.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I assure the Senator that that is not my intention. I recognize the fact that a minimum wage bill will be passed by the Senate, but it is imperative that those who disagree with the language of the bill should have the opportunity to change it. If that takes 2 days, 3 days, 4 days, or 5 days, that will be the way the ball bounces.

Many Senators opposed the taking of the recess when it occurred. We felt we should stay here and work, recessing only for the time necessary for each party to attend the conventions. Had we done that, we would have been further along in our work. All of us feel that we could have worked more diligently during the early months of the year on this matter and acted upon it. In fact, it has been before the Senate for a long time. It was introduced on January 6, 1959. There is every reason to believe that we could have got rid of it long ago.

It is simply a happenstance that we are faced now with a 3-week or 4-week session to consider a number of bills which some Senators feel are important, and some feel are not important.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator may recall that he offered 40 amendments in committee. It took some time to move them out of the committee.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; I was remarking how gentlemanly the Senator from Massachusetts was, and how patient he was. He did not push us. He did not say, "Let us hurry up." He listened to the arguments in the subcommittee, and he listened to the arguments in the full committee. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for that. With the exception of a few instances, the Senator from Massachusetts was very kind to us of the minority. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. If no amendment is pending, is not the third reading of the bill in order?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I do not yield for that purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as regards a quorum call, I think all Senators know what is going on; and certainly it is not the custom to have quorum calls at 7 p.m. on Friday night unless there is a desire to extend the business of the Senate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I did not wish to have the quorum call. But sometimes the Senator is a little stubborn. But I do not know the reason why he wanted the quorum call.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Is it not true that on the Republican side there are a number of Senators—perhaps a majority on that side—who are just as anxious as are any Senators on the Democratic side to have a minimum wage bill passed here and enacted into law?

Therefore, I hope it will be carefully noted generally, both here and throughout the country, that it is not the majority of the Senators on the Republican side that have a whole sheaf of amendments that have the effect which has been mentioned. It is the Senate which has that idea.

I, too, am a Senator. I am in favor of the bill. I have joined in the majority report; and I am just as anxious as is the Senator from Massachusetts to vote for the bill tonight or tomorrow or at the earliest possible opportunity; and I will stay here in the hope of being able to do so. I hope that is clearly understood both here in the Senate and throughout the country.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me say to the Senator from New York that I do not know of any Senator who is more cooperative on the committee, and I make that statement with complete conviction. So I do not include him at all in these remarks.

I do not think I used the word "Republican" in talking about who was conducting the effort. I referred to their leader, who, I believe, is the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], in the case of this struggle. I do not say the Senator from New York is participating in it.

Mr. JAVITS. That is just the point; it is not the Senator from New York personally. The quorum was requested by a Senator on the other side.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is not presenting his amendment—for reasons which we entirely respect, and which are best known to him. But he is not on our side.

I think it is clear that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is not the leader of the GOP. But he, as a leader, is opposed to this measure; and he has allies on both sides of the aisle. I think that fact should be clear to the entire Senate and to the country.

There are many Senators on both sides of the aisle who are just as passionately devoted to the enactment of such a measure as is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. So I have taken this opportunity to correct what I thought was a little nuance to the contrary.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is not the only Senator who is opposed to the bill. I am a Democrat, and I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield, provided I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to thank the Senator from New York for "taking me off the hook." My friend, the Senator from Massachusetts had suddenly puffed me up into dimensions which I could not quite understand. So I thank the Senator from New York for relieving me from that dreadful situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield briefly to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, is a request pending?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand from the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] that he would like to have an amendment proposed. I always like to be cooperative. I have here an amendment which provides for a new section 11, as follows:

> Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the powers of the Secretary of Labor to regulate wages, hours, or other conditions of employment shall be limited to those specified in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended.

If it is thought important to have an amendment pending, I shall be glad to submit this one; but I shall request the courtesy of being allowed to make a statement on it at the proper time. My former statements have not related to it at all.

I shall be glad to hand a copy of the amendment to any Senator who may wish to see it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator state when he thinks we may have a chance to vote on it—tomorrow, perhaps?

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not think so. Due to the announced fact that various Senators will not be present tomorrow or Monday, I think the earliest time probably will be Tuesday morning. So far as I am concerned, I would be agreeable to the entering of unanimous consent agreement to have the vote on this amendment taken on Tuesday, shortly after the Senate convenes on that day, after having a very few minutes for each side to discuss and debate the amendment.

But in connection with a measure of the importance of this one, affecting hundreds of thousands of businesses throughout the country, and which has had the attention of the full committee and of the subcommittee for 2 or 3 years, I do not think we should be too much impressed as regards any assumed necessity to act without full debate on each amendment that is proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield—although I do not have the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Louisiana may yield to the Senator from Florida, for the purpose of permitting me to respond.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator for his request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I think the Senator has made a very good suggestion. If we can make no progress by meeting on Saturday or on Monday, then, if I cannot get a whole loaf, I am perfectly willing to take half a loaf.

So, if agreeable to the Senate, I would accept what I believe to be the spirit of the Senator's suggestion—namely, that he call up his amendment, and that we have reasonable debate on each side. Would the Senator agree that 1½ hours on each side would be agreeable?

Mr. HOLLAND. Certainly. However, I wish to make it clear that I have now been talking about the amendment I have just now read, not about the amendment on which I have previously spoken, and on which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is speaking, and on which various other Senators have already spoken, and on which numerous other Senators have indicated a desire to speak.

Senators are impetuous; they are interested in having an early vote. And so am I.

I have advised both leaders that I am not interested in a filibuster or in any unlimited debate or in any long waiting time before we vote. But I do wish Senators to be present.

Apparently the Senate and its leaders thought it important to have this session, and thought it was important to have Senaors return here. I agree as to both of those conclusions; I want Senators to be here. I do not want to have my important amendments passed upon unless Senators are here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator have any reason to believe that more would be here on Tuesday than on either Saturday or Monday?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes. I have not been advised by any Senator; and this morning—in the absence of the distinguished majority leader, which I regretted at the time; I thought the majority leader was present when I began to speak—I asked whether any Senator who had a desire to be absent after Monday of next week would indicate that intention or that desire to me; but I have not heard of any Senator who desires to be absent after Monday. I do not state of my own knowledge that no Senator wishes to be absent after Monday; and certainly we must realize that we must transact the business of the Senate.

I say to the majority leader that I am perfectly willing to have this first amendment passed on, on Tuesday. I am not willing to have it said that there will be no transaction of business between now and then. I wish to speak at some length on the amendment, and I am sure that other Senators are interested in speaking on it.

I know the agricultural segment of the Nation is much disturbed by the action of the Secretary of Labor in assuming to take charge of wages and hours and conditions for agricultural laborers under the provisions of an act which I think has no reference to wages and hours. But he has done so; and I think this amendment, if adopted, would put an end to an unauthorized and unjustified practice. I do not know whether the amendment will be adopted, but I think it should be debated.

I do not intend to ask for any unusual privilege. The Senate may do as it wishes with any amendment that is proposed.

I hope we shall not drift into the habit of having a motion to lay on the table made whenever an amendment is submitted. I have already discussed a principal amendment which affects every Main Street merchant in the Nation—an amendment which I am not offering, because I felt that a motion to lay on the table might be made. I have been assured by both the majority and the minority leaders that no such action would be taken by them; but I have seen in the recent past in the Senate some indication that the minority and the majority leaders do not completely control actions of other Senators. Therefore, I have withheld the amendment which is generally referred to as my amendment, but which is not such. I am joined in it by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and I could have been joined by two or three dozen more Senators. But I want to make it clear it was a nonpartisan amendment, carrying out exactly the same objectives which the Senate adopted, by a vote of more than 2 to 1, in 1939, the last time the issue was before us, which I think is worthy of discussion.

I have no objection to making the amendment which I am discussing now subject to a unanimous-consent order that it be voted on shortly after the Senate convenes on Tuesday, with ample time to discuss it between now and then.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, would it be possible to get unanimous consent for the Senator to yield to me so I may ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for that purpose, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think the suggestion the Senator from Florida is making is a very sound one. There should be a study of this question. The importance of this bill has been impressed upon me, because, although I am not a member of the committee, for 2 years we have heard a great deal about this important legislation, which reaches deeply into the economy of this country.

I would appreciate very much the opportunity to propound a question to the Senator from Florida. We have heard about this legislation for 2 years. I am not on the committee, so I am not familiar with the details, except as stated on the floor. Is it true that rather precipitate action taken in the House of Representatives caused the removal of some 14 million people from coverage under this act in the bill that the House sent to the Senate just before we recessed?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes. The House version of the bill when it came to the Senate contained such a provision with such an effect.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. May I ask the Senator from Florida if he feels that some really penetrating debate on the matter on the floor of the House might have prevented what one might call a catastrophe from happening at that time?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am sure that could have been the case, but I was not present and I did not read the debate.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But it did happen, because the bill was voted on in a short time?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct, and there should not be precipitate action on a measure as far reaching in its effect on businesses of all sizes in the United States, in all the 50 States, and which contains as many matters of great concern to many people as this bill does.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It illustrates what can happen as a result of not thoroughly investigating the ramifications of the bill, which reaches so deeply into the intimate activities of business and the economy of the country. Therefore, I think this subject deserves some further careful consideration, especially in view of the fact that many of us have different ideas on it, and we have not had time to see the finished product and the amendments offered to it.

Mr. HOLLAND. I agree with the Senator from Iowa. I do not mind stating the purport of the amendment which I have offered and which I have asked become the pending business. Has it so become, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me so I may ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLLAND. May I state the burden of the amendment for the information of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PASTORE. That is not the purpose of my question.

Mr. HOLLAND. I will yield.

Mr. PASTORE. If the Senator will yield, I would like to propound a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yielded for that purpose to the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 24, between lines 5 and 6, to insert the following:

SEC. 11. Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the powers of the Secretary of Labor to regulate wages, hours, or other conditions of employment shall be limited to those specified by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended.

On page 24, line 7, it is proposed to strike out "SEC. 11" and insert "SEC. 12".

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, may I state, very briefly, the purport of the amendment? This amendment flows from the fact that the present Secretary of Labor has seen fit to issue an order which he claims is predicated upon the Wagner-Peyser Act, or some such act, which has no reference at all to agriculture, which requires that migrant agricultural labor must be supplied by his agency only after conditions of labor, including wages, hours, and the like, are guaranteed to him by the areas requesting the labor.

In our State this is a very vital question, because we have had to turn for our stoop labor in large measure to the Bahamas and Jamaica simply because it cannot be obtained in the United States.

I understand that in the State so well represented in part by my distinguished friend from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the same situation obtains with reference to Mexico.

I understand there are similar situations in the State so well represented in part by my distinguished friend from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]. Likewise is it true in Texas. There are other States affected in lesser degree. In fact, the last time I discussed this matter with my distinguished friend from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the ranking Republican member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I understood from him that it was a matter of great importance in his State.

The fact of the matter is that we believe Senators from the various affected States have the right to be heard on this issue.

I have been asked by the Vegetable Growers Association to offer this amendment. I have been so requested by my own fruit and vegetable association in Florida, representing all the reputable handlers, cooperatives, and others, and I believe every reputable producer in my State who has membership in one of the various organizations.

I would be glad to have it disposed of in an expeditious manner, but not without an opportunity to have it heard on its merits.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Louisiana, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. Is this a matter which is changed in any way by the bill?

Mr. HOLLAND. No. This is a matter as to which important industries of this Nation have found it necessary, in the very field of Federal control or asserted control over wages and hours of labor, to ask for protection. If these industries are not entitled to ask for protection when such a bill is being considered, then the Senator from Florida will be greatly disappointed.

Mr. KENNEDY. In other words, the power the Secretary is using in this regard does not come from the Fair Labor Standards Act, which we are attempting to amend on this occasion?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. The Secretary of Labor insists that he has the power under other acts to prescribe conditions of work, wages, and hours, as well as housing conditions and other conditions of labor. I notice the junior Senator from Vermont is nodding his head. I think perhaps the Senator has run into this same problem.

The industries affected feel with very deep conviction that the Secretary has no authority to do this. The intent of the amendment is to make it clear that the Secretary of Labor must look for his authority in this field entirely to the four corners of the bill which we are now considering.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. If this is not an appropriate time to consider such an amendment, then the Senator from Florida is very greatly misinformed.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ELLENDER. I have already consented to such an arrangement.

Mr. PASTORE. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

I think the argument being made by the distinguished Senator from Florida carries a great deal of weight, but it is a limited argument. I listened all afternoon to the description of the amendment, which was not offered, which I now understand is the crux of the situation on the floor determining the question as to whether 32 other amendments will follow. The Senator from Florida has made a grand concession with reference to the amendment he has in his hand now, but that is not the main amendment in which the Senate is interested. If the Senator will join to his unanimous-consent request the assurance that he is willing to limit debate on the crucial amendment, that will at least alert the Senate as to whether or not we are going to have 32 other amendments offered. I think that would be a proper and a very fair proposal.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. I think that is what the Senator from Florida should do, inasmuch as he has fully debated his own amendment this afternoon. This amendment is the crux of the problem, I will say, as to whether we are going to be here 2 or 3 weeks on this particular bill. This amendment should be joined in the unanimous-consent request. With a limited time agreement we should start voting next Tuesday. Then I think we would be evincing a sincere desire to bring about action on the bill.

I have been in the Senate long enough to know that three Senators in the Senate could prevent a vote tomorrow. They could prevent a vote on Monday.

Since I realize the practicalities involved and am realistic about the matter, if we cannot get a vote until next Tuesday, then why does not the distinguished Senator from Florida add to the unanimous-consent request his other amendment, which is the very crux of the problem, so that we could have that amendment discussed under limited time beginning next Tuesday? Then I think we would be doing a service for the Senate, we would be doing a service not uselessly to tax the patience of the Members of the Senate, and we would be doing an even greater service for the people of this country.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PASTORE. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I mean, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not care to whom I yield, but I will yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I appreciate the very sincere and almost impassioned remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island. I think the Senator is entirely sound in his comment. I should like to relate to the Senator the history of what has happened.

The Senator from Florida announced several days ago that he and other Senators intended to offer this amendment. The Senator from Rhode Island was one of the few Senators who did the Senator from Florida the courtesy to sit during most of the debate this afternoon. I think the Senator's patience probably wore out, in time.

Mr. PASTORE. No, my patience did not wear out; it certainly did not wear out. I was unimpressed, but I was patient. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is frank as well as patient and courteous, and for all those qualities I commend him highly.

Mr. President, some days ago I went to the two leaders on this question. I went to the majority leader first, of course, since he is my leader, and I went to the minority leader later. I told them about the amendment. This was before the debate started. I told them I intended to offer the amendment. I asked the majority leader if he could give me any assurance that the amendment would not be subjected to a motion to lay on the table. He stated to me with great candor and great friendliness that so far as he was concerned, and he was sure so far as the majority whip was concerned, no such motion would be made. However, he reminded me that there were other Senators who had not shown heretofore, in the recent past, the willingness to be governed by the decision of the leadership.

The Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, was very kind and very courteous, and his answer was along the same line. I do not think any of the leadership gave any other indication. I have not talked with the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], but I am sure in my own mind that he would follow the policy of his distinguished leader, the Senator from Illinois.

I could not get any assurance of that kind. I have tried the best I could to report to the Senate faithfully what I had heard about the absence of Senators tomorrow and Monday. I attempted to make that report on the basis of good faith this morning, and before I had finished I found that the roof of the house was in flames, and that we had a long and distracting discussion about matters which were not involved at all in the simple and considered report I was trying to make to the Senate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am perfectly willing to offer that amendment, but I do not wish to have it subjected to a motion to lay on the table until the full strength of the Senate is present. I think that is a reasonable hope and expectation. I am perfectly willing to have a vote on the amendment on Tuesday. I so advised the majority leader. I so advised the minority leader. Neither of them could give me any assurance on this matter.

I think Senators are practical men. I know they are considerate. I think the Senator from Rhode Island is one of the most practical and one of the most considerate of all.

I think under those circumstances the Senator from Rhode Island would agree with me that my decision not to offer the amendment until we have some such assurance is a reasonable decision.

I invite any further comment the Senator cares to make. I felt that I not only was within my rights—which I knew was the case—but also that I was within the realm of consideration and cordiality to my fellow Senators, in telling them what the amendment was and in having it printed in the RECORD. It was printed in the RECORD yesterday for the information of all Senators. Attention was invited to the matter. The offering of the amendment was withheld until we could have some sort of assurance that the whole Senate would be present or would have a chance to be present on notice duly given as to when the vote was going to take place before I presented the amendment and made it the property of the whole Senate.

If that is not a reasonable position, I should like to be corrected by any Senator. I think it is reasonable. I think it is considerate. I think it is friendly.

I have not kept away from any Senators all the facts so far as I have known them. I am sure the majority leader would confirm, if confirmation were necessary, which it is not, everything I have said. I am sure the minority leader would, also.

I am perfectly willing to have the vote on the amendment, which the Senator from Louisiana and I and other Senators will offer, set for Tuesday, with appropriate time limitations, but I wish to be sure that we are not confronted with a possible motion to lay on the table before that time. There are absent at least four Senators who at least have expressed to me a friendly inclination toward the adoption of my amendment.

If that is not a reasonable position, then the Senator from Florida does not know what is reasonable. The Senator from Florida has tried to express himself perfectly clearly in the presence of both leaders and in the presence of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think all Senators understand the situation.

Does the Senator from Rhode Island think that the position taken by the Senator from Florida is an unreasonable position?

Mr. PASTORE. I never for once questioned the motives of my distinguished colleague, for whom I have a great deal of affection.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my friend.

Mr. PASTORE. However, I quite agree with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. There comes a time when a man must stand up and be counted.

I realize that there has to be adequate debate on the matter. I hope there would not be a subterfuge in the way of a filibuster against what we are trying to accomplish. I realize that every Senator has a right to express his viewpoint. I am the first one who would fight to the end to preserve that right.

What I say is that if we are to engage in a limited time agreement in regard to this amendment, we should engage in a limited time agreement on all amendments. Let every Senator who wants to talk to come in tomorrow. Senators can speak until midnight tomorrow. They can speak until midnight Monday. However, at some time we ought to start voting. There comes a time when a man has to stand up and say "Yea" or "Nay."

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have been taking positions for some time.

Mr. PASTORE. If we talk from now until the cows come home, or until next Christmas, I do not think it will change any Senator's point of view.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I will say, for myself, that I have never run away from any vote in the Senate since I have been here, which is only 14 years, although some of them have been very disagreeable votes. I do not expect to run away from this vote.

I do not expect any other Senator to run away from voting on the measure. I am perfectly willing to vote when Senators have completed their discussion on the amendment. I wish to make it abundantly clear that this amendment presents a life-and-death issue to hundreds and thousands of small merchants and service establishments throughout the Nation, and anyone who does not realize that fact had better wake up and begin to realize it, because it is that serious.

So far as I am concerned, I have made my case very clearly. I think with candor I have twice stated on the floor of the Senate that I shall have no part in any filibuster on this bill. I restate that position now, but I think that in times like this, in an extended session of this sort, as much time is required for a real and satisfying discussion of an important measure such as the one before the Senate as at any other time, and I shall insist that that time be granted.

I do not think I can say any more. I have not, in my statement, added to the information which both leaders have on this subject. I think they will confirm everything I have said as to my conferences with them. I am sure they will. My contacts with everyone who has been on the floor of the Senate, and to whom I have spoken have been right on the table. No Senator who has been attending to his duties and who has been present in the Senate during the debate has misunderstood the situation.

That is my position. I am perfectly willing to have the time fixed for voting on the first amendment set for Tuesday. I might be willing to have the time for voting on the other amendment set later, but I am not willing to offer it at this time unless we can get a unanimous-consent agreement that there will be no motion to lay on the table. I thank the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has stated that he would not be prepared to offer his second amendment unless he could get a unanimous-consent agreement that there would be no motion to lay it on the table. If the Senator received assurance that there would be no effort to lay any of the amendments on the table, would he perhaps join with the minority leader in agreeing to some time limitation for debate on all amendments beginning on Tuesday?

Mr. HOLLAND. As I told both the majority leader and the minority leader, I will not agree to a time limitation on all amendments. On my second amendment, which is the only one I have besides the one which I have described, I was quite agreeable to that course. So far as the Senator from Florida is concerned, he speaks not only for himself but for four able and distinguished Senators who are senior to the Senator from Florida, including the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] They are all deeply concerned about the pending measure.

The Senator from Florida has not asked any member of the committee to join in the amendment, though he understands that three members of the committee will support it. The Senator from Florida has presented the amendment as a kind of grassroots amendment, speaking, as he believes, for great groups of people who feel that they are vitally interested in the defeat of the proposed extension of the wage and hour law, which would be accomplished by the provisions of the amendment.

The Senator from Florida will not yield at all on his insistence that adequate time be given for full presentation and debate. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is the one who insisted upon my offering my other amendment. I am willing at this time to have a unanimous-consent agreement entered into for a short debate and for a final vote on Tuesday without at all cutting off time tomorrow or the time Monday for further argument on this or any other amendment.

I yield back to the Senator from Louisiana with appreciation for the time which he has given me.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, it is very clear that we cannot get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on any of the important amendments to the bill. The bill was introduced in January 1959, a year and a half ago. It was reported as a new bill on June 27, 1960, and as has been stated on many occasions on this floor, it is a very important measure. I do not believe that it should be rushed through the Congress. If the truth were known, I believe there is a little politics involved in bringing the measure up now.

On the other hand, it strikes me that the Senator who is handling the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], might do well to leave something for himself to undertake when he becomes President in January.

Seriously speaking, this is a very vital matter. Back in 1937 I was a member of the committee which proposed the original Fair Labor Standards Act. We worked on that measure for many long hours before we finally enacted legislation. It was a departure from past legislation. Many of us thought that even the act that was passed by the Congress would not meet constitutional requirements.

I think it would be a serious mistake for us to rush the pending bill through in 2 or 3 days. It ought to receive adequate debate, and I hope and pray that Senators who have endorsed this bill will take a long look at its provisions and find out for themselves the impact that it would have on the small businesses of this country.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question along that line?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I believe the Senator has made his position clear. I should like to emphasize the consideration given to the bill by the committee. The record shows that the committee started hearings on May 7, 1959, and that the committee report was filed on June 27, 1960, which was 13 months and 20 days later.

The record also shows that hearings were held, in which 1,262 pages of fine-print testimony was taken, and it seems to me that in view of the fact that this bill will affect in a most substantial way the economic welfare of thousands upon thousands of businesses, and the economic welfare of millions of Americans, there ought not to be any insistence in the Senate that those of us who are not privileged to serve upon the committee which considered the bill, and who had no opportunity to consider the evidence until it was printed a few weeks ago, deserve no more than 3 or 4 days in which to consider legislation of such vast import.

I wish to make this record to corroborate further what the Senator from Louisiana has so well stated.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, it is my belief that this important measure should be considered next January when we return; it should not be rushed through the Congress in the course of 2 or 3 weeks.

I consider it that important. The evidence is, as I said, that the bill has been pending for more than a year and a half. Now proponents want to rush it through. That attitude strikes me as being tainted with a little politics. So far as I am concerned, I shall take my time to look into the matter further and to expose what the bill contains and how it will affect the business people of this country.

On July 6, 1937, the Senate Committee on Education and Labor reported to the Senate S. 2475, the bill which, a year later, became the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The committee's decision followed the general lines of a request by President Roosevelt, sent to the Congress in May 1934, in which the President asked for the enactment of legislation putting into practice "labor standards which will permit the maximum but prudent employment of our human resources to bring within the reach of the average man and woman a maximum of goods and services conducive to the fulfillment of the promise of American life."

I was a member of the Senate Labor Committee at the time S. 2475 of the 75th Congress was reported. I assisted in preparing that legislation for presentation to the Senate. I participated in Senate debate on the bill. I was a member of the committee of conference which, in 1938, came into agreement on minimum wage legislation. At all points, in all ways, all along the line, I supported the concept of a minimum wage and maximum workweek, as contained in the 1938 act.

Today, however, I rise in opposition to this so-called minimum wage bill, because I believe the changes it proposes in the 1938 basic legislation, as well as the amendments thereto, are neither needed nor justified. If this legislation is adopted, I am convinced that it will actually injure the working men and women of our country. It will work unjustified and unwarranted hardships upon employers. It will do great violence to our Constitution, and further corrode the safeguards erected by the Founding Fathers against arbitrary and total Federal control over all segments of our national life.

First, Mr. President, in evaluating the pending legislation, let us look at the need, or lack thereof.

The original 1938 enactment provided for an initial minimum wage of 25 cents per hour, and covered all persons engaged in, or producing goods for, commerce. "Commerce," as used in the act, referred, of course, to foreign or interstate commerce—the only "commerce" over which the Federal Government has constitutional jurisdiction.

It should be noted that, in 1938, 25 cents per hour was generally recognized as a suitable minimum wage for employees engaged in commerce, or in the production of goods for commerce, although the original Senate bill called for an initial minimum wage of 40 cents per hour.

Adjusting both of these figures for variations in the purchasing power of the dollar, one finds, Mr. President, that the existing minimum wage of $1 per hour is more than ample. The initial 25-cent-per-hour rate, the rate applied in the 1938 act, is the equivalent of about 52.5 cents per hour today, based upon declines in the purchasing power of our dollar since 1938. In other words, workers today would have to receive 52.5 cents per hour in order to purchase what 25 cents per hour would purchase 22 years ago.

Yet, as I have stated, the present minimum wage is $1 per hour.

Even if the 40-cent-per-hour figure recommended by the Senate had been adopted as the 1938 minimum, today's $1 per hour minimum would still be ample. The 1938 Senate recommendation of 40 cents per hour adjusts upward to about 84 cents per hour today, based on comparable purchasing power figures for the dollar for 1960, compared with 1938.

The present minimum wage is $1 per hour.

By either comparison, Mr. President, it is easily seen that the 25-percent increase in the minimum wage proposed in this bill is neither necessary, nor justifiable.

I realize and appreciate that two major arguments will probably be offered to refute the data I have submitted. In general, I expect these arguments to be:

First, Americans are not accustomed to a "stand-pat" economy; our people are entitled to more consideration than merely a "purchasing power" adjustment in the minimum wage.

The answer to this is simple: Under existing law, American workers covered by existing minimum wage legislation do get more than merely a purchasing power adjustment. Based on today's minimum wage of $1 per hour, and considering the purchasing power adjustment based upon the original minimum of 25 cents per hour, it becomes obvious that the standard of living adjustment accomplished since 1938 aggregates something like a 100-percent increase—that is, the difference between 52.5 cents, the adjusted purchasing power equivalent of the 25 cents per hour 1938 minimum wage, and today's minimum of $1 per hour.

The second argument which has, or may be, offered to rebut these data is based upon the premise that unless the minimum wage is raised, hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of American workers, will be frozen in a highly underpaid status.

Mr. President, I have before me certain figures taken from the May 1960, issue of the Monthly Labor Review, a pamphlet published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor. The data reflected in the tables entitled "Earnings and Hours" completely refute the argument that present-day workers engaged in commerce, or in the production of goods for commerce, are in a sweatshop status.

Here are the average hourly earnings, by major industries, as of February 1960, as contained in the document I referred to earlier:

	Per hour
Mining	$2.71
Manufacturing	2.29
Transportation and public utilities (January 1960 figure)	2.60
Wholesale and retail trade	2.27
Finance, insurance, and real estate	1.87
Service and miscellaneous	1.20

In other words, Mr. President, the average hourly wage paid in all major industries within our country, in fact, all groups covered by the Bureau of Labor Statistics report, is in excess of the present $1 per hour minimum wage.

Even a cursory review of these data leads inevitably to the conclusion that no increase in the minimum wage can be justified at this time, much less the ultimate 25-percent increase proposed under the pending bill.

I should also remark, Mr. President, that the 3-year approach contained in the pending legislation is highly dangerous. As Senators know, as to those workers already covered by the minimum wage law, the base wage would be increased to $1.15 per hour the first year, $1.20 per hour the second year, and $1.25 per hour the third year. The escalation feature of the bill, above and aside from the proposed wage level itself, is a highly dangerous gadget. For one thing, it writes into law a built-in assurance that we are not going to get tough in the highly competitive foreign trade field.

Foreign competitors will be put on notice that Uncle Sam, by raising the wage floor over a 3-year period, will not become a tougher competitor in foreign markets, but that, on the contrary, foreign competitors of American industry can look forward to an increasing differential between their production costs, and ours. I need not remind Senators that the United States is in an unprecedented and, to my way of thinking, intolerable position vis a vis foreign competition. We are losing markets. Our balance of payments deficit this year will approximate about $3 billion. We are spending more money abroad than we are deriving from foreign trade with foreign countries.

There are two ways to cure this situation. One involves reducing the amount of money we pour into foreign countries, through such programs as the foreign-aid program. The Congress has steadfastly refused to impose any appreciable reductions in this program, despite the pleas of quite a few Members of the Congress, including myself.

The second way to cure the balance of payments deficit involves selling more U.S. commodities abroad. In order to achieve that goal, our goods must be competitive, and, since perhaps the largest single item in the cost of any manufactured item is the cost of labor, it behooves us to see what our competitors are doing, and to meet those actions, instead of according to our competitors an even greater price advantage than they now enjoy.

This bill would do just the opposite. Instead of holding the line on wages, instead of meeting foreign competition where it can best be met, that is, on the basis of price, the measure now under consideration would actually result in a deteriorated U.S. foreign trade position.

I have before me an article taken from the May 30, 1960, issue of U.S. News & World Report, dealing with our foreign trade problems. It begins:

> U.S. manufacturers, competing at home, and in export markets for business, complain about labor costs probably more than anything else.

This article demonstrates just what Uncle Sam is up against when he goes out into the world marketplace to sell his goods. It also shows what a fantastic advantage foreign countries enjoy in selling their goods within our own borders.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BUSINESS AROUND THE WORLD

U.S. manufacturers, competing at home and in export markets for business, complain about labor costs probably more than anything else.

U.S. economists, both in Washington and around the country, tend to say that labor costs are going up faster abroad than in the United States.

Economists point out that, since 1953, hourly wage rates in Europe have gone up much more than in the United States. That's true for every major country.

The implication is left that, given time, European wage rates will catch up with American. Then, U.S. business won't have competitive trouble any more.

But the question is: How long is this going to take?

Apparently, it will take a very long time, if it ever happens at all.

The reason is that the United States has such a tremendous lead.

Wage rates in different countries are difficult to compare fairly, however.

The big problem is to add to money wages the value of social security and other fringe benefits. Now an official French agency, the National Institute of Statistics and Economic Studies, has come up with tables comparing hourly wages in manufacturing in the United States and major European countries, taking these fringe benefits into account. As for April 1959, they show:

Hourly wages in the United States, $2.71; in Britain and Germany, $0.78; in Switzerland, $0.77; Belgium, $0.74; France, $0.72; Italy, $0.61; Holland, $0.57.

Now, take the case of Germany, for example. The table indicates that U.S. wages are more than three times as high as German. Even if German wages rise faster than American, it will take quite a time for the Germans to catch up.

Actually, German wages in the last couple of years have gone up about as fast as American wages. This year, German wages seem to be heading for a yearly gain of perhaps 7 or 8 percent. It will be surprising if American wage increases show as much of an advance.

Labor shortage is severe now in Germany. Union pressure for higher wages is more acute than in former years. But, even in 1960, the Germans won't be gaining ground significantly on American workers.

So, waiting and hoping for their foreign competitors to catch up on wages doesn't look like a very promising pastime for American industrialists.

Mr. ELLENDER. I returned only last Sunday from a 3½-week stay abroad. I visited most of the countries of Western Europe. I have never, on any visit, come across such thriving business as is being carried on in those countries. Prosperity is found everywhere. There is no unemployment. Goods are being sold all over the world by the countries of Western Europe to the countries we used to have as customers. But now we are deprived of much of that trade because our wage structure is so far out of line with those of our competitors in Western Europe.

I do not mean to say that we should lower the wages which are now being paid in this country to the level of the wages now being paid in Western Europe. There is no country in the world which has a living standard comparable to that of the United States. It will take the countries of Western Europe, with all of their present prosperity, many years to reach our standards. It will take them many years to reach even half of what our present average wage scale is.

Nevertheless, as I have pointed out, we are losing ground. Our economy is in danger. In 1959 for the first time since the Civil War, we sent more dollars abroad than we had come in.

Next Monday we will be asked by the Department of Commerce to appropriate millions of dollars so that we can stimulate the sale of our products abroad. But how can we compete under the conditions I have just stated, when the average wage in our country is $2.71 an hour, and the highest wage in Western Europe is 78 cents an hour, and that in Great Britain and Germany?

Unless we take steps now to make it possible for us to increase our foreign trade, I fear that more and more of our dollars will go abroad, and that will be bound to affect the living of every American.

Yet, under the bill now before us, the domestic minimum wage would be raised over a 3-year period; additional workers would be covered by the minimum wage; and, last but not least, our entire wage structure is going to be raised, for if experience proves one thing, it proves that an increase in the minimum wage is followed inevitably by upward shifts in the entire wage structure.

Mr. President, I am convinced that this bill, offered in the guise of helpful legislation, may well prove to be the most hurtful, the most dangerous, the most inflationary single piece of legislation Congress has had before it during recent times.

But aside from the threat this bill poses to our competitive position both at home and abroad, aside from the dangers to our continued economic stability inherent in the bill, aside from all of these things, the bill deserves defeat for one other major reason.

In my earlier discussions, I pointed out that the 1938 act accomplished two basic purposes, among others: first, it fixed a minimum wage for employees; but, second, it confined its coverage to employees engaged in commerce, or in producing goods for commerce. That is the way the present law is written.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am sorry I was unable to find the facts I wanted before the Senator passed the point I had in mind. He was discussing the subject of the effect the bill would have on the total wage structure of the country. I wondered if the Senator from Louisiana was aware of what Mr. George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, said in the committee hearings. He said:

Let us begin by recognizing that the earnings of millions of American workers are keyed directly to the Federal minimum wage.

Mr. Max Greenberg, president of the Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Union, AFL–CIO, said this——

Mr. ELLENDER. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am reading from page 74 of the report.

Mr. Greenberg said:

There obviously will be some upward pressure by those people who today are receiving $1.25 so that they will move forward. I am sure we want something like that to happen.

The reason we today consider the retail worker on the lowest rung of the economic ladder is because of the fact that we have so many who are making less than a dollar. If everybody was making a dollar and a quarter, obviously, when we went in to bargain for those people whom we have organized, we would be able to get them a fairly attractive wage.

What those two gentlemen, high in the ranks of labor, are saying is that not only would the $1.25 minimum wage affect the relatively few persons who would receive it, but it would have an impact upon the entire wage structure; they have to maintain this differential. In other words, when a person who has been making $1 an hour gets $1.25, the man who has been making $1.25 will want to make $1.50. The man who has been making $1.50 rightly feels that he must maintain the differential, and he asks for $1.75; and so up the scale.

I wanted to add to the Senator's very interesting discussion about the impact the fact admitted by two of the leaders of labor in this country.

I may go a step further: The Senator will find in the report made by Secretary Mitchell to the committee on the impact of the last amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act a recognition that this does happen, although so far it has been impossible to determine or arrive at an exact amount. His study showed that in what he calls the low-impact area, the labor costs rose 10 percent; and they ranged from 20 percent to 40 percent in the higher impact areas.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was aware of the statements the Senator has just read. That is what happens. The minimum wage is used as a base from which to start. The fact is that the pending bill would broaden the base by making it possible for every industry in the country to be covered. That is very unfortunate.

I hoped that further consideration of the bill would be postponed, so that enough time would be available for its consideration, because I believe this is one of the most far-reaching bills to be presented to the Congress.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I entirely agree with the Senator. We tend to forget entirely the economic implications of the bill; and, in my opinion, very serious constitutional implications are also involved in the language which defines "commerce" and "activities affecting commerce." This is the second time we have tried to include that concept in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Furthermore, all we can do is guess how the Court may rule. But, having watched the activities of the Court, I think we can safely assume that this measure would give the Federal Government carte blanche in dealing with the economic system of the Nation.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield briefly again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. To bear out the contention that the further consideration of this measure could well go over until January, so as to provide opportunity for more study, I point out the following which appears on page 39 of the hearings on the bill:

Senator PROUTY. * * * Another question: How did you arrive at this figure of $1.25? Why wouldn't $1.50 be better?

Mr. MEANY. Well, this is a field where you've got to make a little progress. It is quite obvious that the minimum standard, the minimum yearly wage required for what we call a decent, normal standard of living, is still going to be far above what this $1.25 will bring.

In fact, the minimum is $4,200, isn't it?

Mr. RUTTENBERG. It is $4,600.

If the proponents of the bill are honest about their attempts to provide such a decent living wage, it seems to me the minimum should be $2.25, because it would work out at $4,680 a year. This illustrates the need for more study, and it also is illustrative of the fact that in the retail and service industries, in the great majority of cases, the wages augment other family income. So we would find that the average wage in the retail and service industries, although not entirely so, would be very comparable to the wages received by workers receiving higher hourly wages, because these people have what we might call a guaranteed annual wage. They work 12 months a year, and the "peaks" are handled by extra workers. The wholesaler controls his labor costs by laying off the extra workers when the peaks have passed; and the same is true of employers in the construction field.

So I think there is considerable difference between the wages in the fields this bill attempts to cover and the wages in many other fields.

I had hoped the further consideration of the bill would be postponed, so as to permit further study. However, in view of the events of the past few weeks and the "political sex appeal" of the bill, I am afraid that is a little too much to hope for. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

Mr. President, Senate bill 1046, introduced on February 16, 1959, is a companion measure to the pending bill, which was reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on June 27. In other words, this bill or the companion bill remained before the committee from February 16, 1959, until June 27, 1960. All during that long period of time the bill was available for consideration by the committee. But now, Mr. President, there seems to be an attempt to get the Senate to rush through the further consideration of the bill. However, I believe we should have more time, and I express hope that consideration of the bill will not be rushed.

I was saying the 1938 act accomplished two basic purposes, among others: First, it fixed a minimum wage for employees; but, second, it confined its coverage to employees engaged in commerce, or in producing goods for commerce.

"Commerce," of course, is defined in the act as interstate or foreign commerce—that is, "trade, commerce, transportation, transmission or communication among the several States, or from any State to any place outside thereof." This coverage, it should be noted, is subject to a number of specific exemptions.

The legislative history of existing law is of particular interest and importance today, since it demonstrates conclusively that the approach to coverage adopted in the pending bill was considered in 1938, and was rejected by the Congress.

First, let us look at the pending bill.

As I understand it, it would make several basic changes in existing law, insofar as coverage is concerned.

First, coverage based upon the actual work of an employee would be discarded, and in its place would be substituted an "employer" test. Under existing law, it is possible for one employer to have in his employ two categories of workers—that is, workers subject to the act, and workers outside the jurisdiction of the act. The fact of coverage is presently determined on an individual, worker-by-worker basis.

Under the bill, this distinction would no longer exist, since the fact of coverage would not depend upon the activities in which an individual worker might be engaged, but would be determined solely and simply by virtue of his employer's activities. Thus, if the employer were engaged in a business involving interstate commerce, all of his workers would be covered, regardless of the actual work which they might do.

As is obvious, this shift from an employee basis to an employer basis could, under existing law, actually remove some workers from the coverage of the act; but by another legislative sleight of hand, the bill takes care of this contingency in a convincing and comprehensive manner.

In fact, Mr. President, as was pointed out during the debate this afternoon—my good friend, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], made the point, and I am sure what he said is correct—it is impossible to name even one business that would not be covered by the pending measure. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator cite any business that would not be covered by this measure, if the definitions of "commerce" included in the bill are to apply.

As I have indicated earlier, existing law applies to employees either "engaged in commerce, or the production of goods for commerce." The bill would expand this coverage, apparently ad infinitum, by adding to the above definition a new category; that is, employees of employers whose activities affect commerce.

Thus, Mr. President, for all practical purposes, the following changes would be made, as to coverage:

First, the bill would continue to cover, as the act now covers, all employees "engaged in commerce, or in the production of goods for commerce"; but, second, it would also bring within the coverage of the act all employees of employers who are found to be involved in "an enterprise in an activity affecting commerce," and who are not otherwise exempt.

There are four key changes in this new, broadened coverage:

The first shift, from an employee to an employer basis, I have already discussed.

The second major change involves the definition of "enterprise," which, as I read it, could mean practically any activity known to the mind of man. I quote the definition of "enterprise":

"Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either directly or indirectly through unified operation or common control or otherwise) by any person for a common business purpose of providing goods or services, or the products thereof, or a combination of them, to others, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units: Provided, That within the meaning of this paragraph a locally owned and controlled retail or service establishment shall not be deemed to be other than a separate and distinct enterprise solely by reason of an agreement (1) that it will not sell any goods competing with the goods specified by a particular manufacturer, distributor, or advertiser, or (2) that it will join with other locally owned and controlled concerns in the same industry for purpose of collective purchasing.

I submit, Mr. President, that this definition is all inclusive; it covers the waterfront, so to speak. It would bring within its terms any and all commercial, business, industrial, or other activity known to modern civilization, except those specifically exempt.

The second gadget found in the bill involves the definition of the word "activity" affecting commerce. I want to remark initially that the definition of this term, as stated in the bill, is a real humdinger. I read the definition:

"Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

This definition, too, is all-inclusive, but, over and beyond that, it carries overtones of none other than Gertrude Stein, whose proclamation that "a rose is a rose is a rose" is now rivaled by this bill's declaration that "an activity includes any activity."

Finally, Mr. President, we come to this legislative jewel, this all-inclusive diadem set in the unconstitutional crown of this bill, the declaration that it covers all enterprises engaged in activities "affecting commerce."

It is my judgment, Mr. President, that the term "affecting commerce" is so sweeping, so all-inclusive, that each and every employee of each and every employer in the United States will be covered by the Minimum Wage Act unless he is specifically exempt from coverage under one of the exemptions—of which the Senate bill contains only eight. These are:

1. The 12-man logging exemption.
2. Nonprofit hospitals and educational institutions.
3. Canning and processing of agricultural commodities, but seasonal activities only.
4. Motion-picture theaters.
5. Trucking and pipeline employees.
6. Small area broadcasting companies.
7. Automobile salesmen.
8. Hotel and restaurant employees who receive a substantial part of their income from tips.

Under this bill practically every employed person in the United States would be brought within the coverage of the minimum wage unless he falls within one of the specific exemptions enumerated above.

It is interesting to note that back in 1938, the House of Representatives passed a bill which would have accomplished substantially the same goal accomplished under the pending bill—that is, it would have put coverage on an employer, as opposed to an employee basis, and would have extended the act to cover activities affecting commerce.

When the bill went to conference, and I was one of the conferees, the Senate was adamant; we insisted that the bill's coverage be confined to employees engaged in commerce, or in the production of goods for commerce. We so insisted for a number of reasons, not the least of which were the following:

First, extending the coverage to activities affecting commerce has overtones of doubtful constitutionality; second, we did not desire to usurp the prerogatives of the States in this regard. The Senate report on S. 2475 of the 75th Congress asserted:

> The bill carefully excludes from its scope business in the several States that is of a purely local nature. It applies only to the industrial and business activities of the Nation insofar as they utilize the channels of interstate commerce, or seriously or and substantially burden or harass such commerce. It leaves to the State and local communities their own responsibilities concerning those local service and other business trades that do not substantially influence the stream of interstate commerce. For example, the policy in this regard is such that it is not even intended to include in its scope those purely local and small business establishments that happen to lie near State lines, and solely on account of such location, actually serve a whole local community trade within two States (S. Rept. 884, 75th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5).

Even President Roosevelt, whose special message to the Congress in May of 1934 sparked the determined congressional drive for fair labor standards legislation, had no desire to cover purely local business with the minimum wage and hour law. His special message stated, in part:

> To protect the fundamental interests of free labor and a free people, we propose that only goods which have been produced under conditions which meet the minimum standards of free labor shall be admitted to interstate commerce. Goods produced under conditions which do not meet rudimentary standards of decency should be regarded as contraband and ought not to be allowed to pollute the channels of interstate trade (S. Rept. 884, supra, p. 2).

Finally, the President said:

> With the establishment of these rudimentary standards as a base we must seek to build up, through appropriate administrative machinery, minimum wage standards of fairness and reasonableness having due regard to local and geographical diversities and to the effect of unfair labor conditions upon competition in interstate trade and upon the maintenance of industrial peace.

These excerpts, plus the legislative history of the 1938 act, show a clear, specific, and well-founded desire on the part of both the President and the Congress to confine the operation of the act to real, bona fide interstate and foreign commerce operations. Yet, under the pending bill, this concept would be completely destroyed. The act would cover everything, and everybody, for all practical purposes, involved in any way with an enterprise whose activity might affect commerce.

I want to emphasize again, Mr. President, that no American businessman would be relieved of Federal regulation under the terms of this act, no matter where he might be, unless he falls within one of the specific exemptions in the bill.

What would this mean?

Let us see. Let us see how the present act, which covers only employees engaged in commerce, or in the production of goods for commerce, has been interpreted. On the basis of these interpretations, plus the expanded coverage proposed in the bill, it may be possible for us to get an inkling of exactly how far the proponents of this legislation wish to extend Federal power and control.

I have accumulated a few of the thousands of decisions handed down by Federal courts involving coverage of the existing law. The following exhibits were taken from the annotations found in the United States Code Annotated, that portion dealing with the Fair Labor Standards Act.

I desire to read a few of these. Before I proceed, however, I wish to reiterate my belief that the passage of this bill would no doubt lead to a stronger and stronger centralized Government. I can see the long hand of Uncle Sam reaching into every industry in my State. I can see that hand reaching into the State of Ohio and, in fact, into every State of this Union.

In my humble judgment, the bill, if passed, would preempt the right of a State to pass its own minimum wage laws.

As was stated this afternoon, many States have seen fit to have minimum wages fixed at so much for one area, with a different rate for another area, and an entirely different rate for still another area, such as a big city. If the States have to make that differentiation within their own borders, we should stop to think of what we are being asked to do in the Congress. We must deal with 50 States. I think it is wrong for us to take from the States the right to fix minimum wages and to deal with problems which the people in the States know best how to handle.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to my good friend.

Mr. LAUSCHE. There was some discussion this afternoon as to what impact the passage of the bill would have on the ability of a State to put into effect its own concept of what the minimum wage ought to be. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana what the situation would be, let us say, as between the operations of the Federal law and the operations of the Massachusetts law in respect to industries covered by the bill.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Federal law would override the State law. There is no doubt about that. The Federal law would take jurisdiction. If the State saw fit to fix a minimum wage at Lowell, Mass., at 75 cents an hour, and at Boston, Mass., at 90 cents an hour, that right would be taken away from the State of Massachusetts. The State would have to comply with the Federal law. The State could pass a law which would give to the working people a greater minimum wage level than provided in the Federal law. I presume the State could do that, but the State would be precluded from passing any law which would insure a lesser wage than that provided in the Federal law.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I invite the Senator's attention to the record at page 59 of the hearings containing the testimony given on the various bills.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have it before me.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Table 3 on page 59 shows that in 1957 the State of Massachusetts adopted a minimum hourly rate of $1 applying to retail trade. In the event the proposed bill is passed, would the provisions of the proposed bill, bringing the rate up to $1.25 within a specific time, override the Massachusetts law of $1?

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not think there is any doubt about it. It would. There is no question about it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In other words, the Senator from Louisiana does not agree with the statement which was made this evening that the passage of the bill would take no jurisdiction from the States?

Mr. ELLENDER. Of course I do not.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I invite the Senator's attention to page 60. In 1958 Massachusetts passed a law fixing the minimum rate of pay for laundries and drycleaning establishments at from 95 cents to $1. Which of the two laws would be applicable, in the event the pending bill were passed?

Mr. ELLENDER. The Federal law.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Federal law.

Mr. ELLENDER. If it were passed as is now proposed, of course.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to follow up on the same subject. I invite the Senator's attention to page 61 of the testimony, which shows that in 1959, with respect to hotel and restaurant establishments, the Massachusetts Legislature fixed the minimum wage rate at 65 to 90 cents. It follows that the Federal law would override the decision of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts made in 1959, does it not?

Mr. ELLENDER. I have no doubt of it.

That only goes to show, Mr. President, that the law which is now on the statute books of Massachusetts provides a wage level differential with respect to various industries.

As the Senator from Ohio has pointed out, in respect to restaurants the Massachusetts law provides for 65 to 90 cents. As to the laundries and drycleaning establishments, there is a provision for 95 cents to $1. For the retail trade, the provision is for $1. It is true that the wage differential in regard to two of the items is not much, but it shows that there must be a difference in the bases upon which the State itself has decided, which results in difference in the wage rate on a priority basis.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is the Senator prepared to express an opinion as to what would be the legal situation in States where the minimum rate fixed exceeds the rate established by the Congress?

Mr. ELLENDER. As I said a while ago, I believe if the guaranteed minimum wage rate is higher in the State law, then that law would prevail, because it would give more than the Federal law provides.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is that a specific provision?

Mr. ELLENDER. No, it is not. I am merely stating a "cornfield" opinion. That would be my view.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I repeat what I said a moment ago. The Senator from Louisiana does not subscribe to the statement made here today that the passage of the bill would take no jurisdiction from the States.

Mr. ELLENDER. I absolutely do not agree with that statement.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I concur.

Mr. ELLENDER. I repeat, I am waiting to find out what businesses in Ohio, in Louisiana, in Florida, or in any other State of the Union will not be covered under the broad definition of "affecting commerce," if the pending legislation were enacted.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I heard the Senator state that in his opinion practically every industry would be covered.

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no question about it, because there is no State which is completely self-sustaining. There must ultimately be traffic between the States and this would fall under the provision "affecting commerce" included in this bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I correct in my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana was a member of the Senate committee which was charged with the responsibility of handling the act as it was passed in 1938?

Mr. ELLENDER. I was.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I correct in understanding also that the Senator from Louisiana was a member of the conference committee which ironed out the differences between the House and the Senate, which resulted in the form of the final act as it was passed?

Mr. ELLENDER. I was.

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask if the Senator has noted departures in the opinions of the Supreme Court and the regulations of the Administrator from the intentions of the Senate and the House, and from the intentions of the drafters of this bill when it was passed, that are actual, real departures?

Mr. ELLENDER. Without question. It would require 10 hours to point out all of them. I was confronted by many of my constituents with questions on specific problems. I had many discussions with Mr. Walling, who administered this original act. Both the Administrator and the courts went far beyond what I expected them to do in my judgment. Notwithstanding the congressional intent, the Administrator and the courts went far beyond what any of us expected in declaring coverage under terms of the act.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator. I believe his statement points up the fact that we are dealing with a very complex matter affecting, as it does, literally hundreds of thousands of businesses in every State of the Nation. By the very nature of the bill, it leaves something to regulation and something to court interpretation, because it is so comprehensive. As I understand the distinguished Senator, both in his statements here and in private conversations I have had with him, unfortunately in many instances regulations of the Administrator, some of which have been upheld by the courts and some of which have not gone to the courts, have widely departed from the intentions and meaning of the Congress that passed the act.

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no doubt about it. They were outrageous. The bill that originally came from the House in 1938 included some of the provisions in the pending bill. But the House and Senate conferees agreed to the language that is now contained in the law. The distinguished Senator from Florida pointed out in 1949 that another effort was made to put the same language that is now sought to be put in the act, and I think it was defeated by a 2-to-1 vote. Am I correct?

Mr. HOLLAND. The fact is that it was beaten by a little better than a 2-to-1 vote when the committee, as did the committee this time, tried to bring about a very great widening of the provisions of the act to bring in larger groups of businesses, numbering hundreds of thousands of different businesses that were never intended to be covered. The Senate, after considerable and, I believe, exhaustive, debate, decided in its wisdom at that time that the original objectives were sound, and we wrote much stronger language that did not depart in any way from the provisions of the original act.

Mr. ELLENDER. If we pass the measure as written, with the proposed new definition of "commerce," we cannot tell what will happen. We shall have a strong centralized Government just as sure as God made apples.

Mr. HOLLAND. With the vast change in definitions and in coverage, even in the wording of the act, does the Senator think that for 10 years or more it will be uncertain whether many businesses are covered by the provisions of the act?

Mr. ELLENDER. If I represented a business I would advise that it would come under the act if the pending bill is enacted without any ifs and ands, because I know what a court would decide. If the courts of the country interpret the pending bill as they did the original act as I will show in a moment, there is no telling what they would do if we should make the act apply to employees and employers whose activities affect commerce in any manner. They are given carte blanche. Every business in a State will be covered except those that are exempted. I predict that if the bill is passed as written, the only businesses which will not come under the act will be those which are specifically exempted. That is what will happen.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I wish to direct the Senator's attention to another subject. Does or does not the act operate upon the wages paid to employees receiving above what is supposed to be a minimum sustenance wage? I now call the Senator's attention to what is called the maximum hours section, which reads:

SEC. 7. (a) (1) Except as otherwise provided in this section no employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce for a workweek longer than forty hours, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is [employed].

Mr. ELLENDER. That is, in excess of 40 hours.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes. That is in the existing law. This is the amendment.

(2) No employer shall employ any of his employees who in any workweek (i) is employed in an enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce, as defined in section 3(t) (1), (2), or (3), or in an establishment described in section 3(t) (4), and who, except for the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960, would not be within the purview of this subsection, or (ii) is brought within the purview of this subsection by the amendments made to section 13 of this Act by the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960—

(A) for a workweek longer than forty-four hours during the second year from the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960.

unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours above specified at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed.

Let us assume that an industry or a producer or a service company is newly brought within the law. The minimum wage which we have discussed will apply. Will the law also apply to the overtime payments to workers who are already receiving as high as $3, $3.50, and $4 an hour?

Mr. ELLENDER. It will. That practice has been followed in the past. As I remember, in the bill all the newly covered workers and newly covered businesses are given the same exemption that we originally gave in the act of 1938. The Senator will recall that it required 3 years before the workers got the 40-hour week.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The same as is proposed.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; that is what I have reference to.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the public is laboring under the impression that the pending bill deals only with the minimum sustenance wage, that impression is wrong, because it attempts to control by Federal law wages in excess of the minimum sustenance wage.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is true. Of course, when labor bargains with industry, it does not get any less by way of overtime. The hours are fixed. They start from that. They can make overtime pay of one and a half or two times the fixed wage.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If there is a bargaining agreement. However, if there is none, we by law say it shall be done.

Mr. ELLENDER. Oh, yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then not only are we taking care of what we call a living minimum wage, but we are by congressional act stretching our hands in and saying, "You shall pay time and a half if there is a $3 or $4 wage."

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no doubt about it, if they work over the limited time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The time that is limited in the third paragraph, schedules 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. That, as I said, is similar to the provisions of the original act that was passed in 1938.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. It started with 44 hours, then went to 42 hours, and then to 40 hours. It took 3 years to reach the 40-hour goal. This is to apply to newly covered businesses which will have to pay $1.15, $1.20, and $1.25. There will be the 3 years in which to pay it. They will not be confined to overtime provisions after 44 hours, 42 hours, and 40 hours over the same period. In other words, the full time and a half provision for work over 40 hours will not take effect until after 3 years.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It begins in the first year, but the hours are reduced. They begin at 44 hours, then go to 42 hours, and then to 40 hours.

Mr. ELLENDER. Forty-four, forty-two, forty; yes. Of course, that schedule applies to new industries coming under the coverage.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes; to new industries.

Mr. ELLENDER. The ones that are in now come under the law by the pending bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Those which are at present under the law are already down to 40 hours.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. To summarize, is it the opinion of the Senator from Louisiana that the power of the States to fix minimum wages for the industries which are covered by the proposed act comes to an end?

Mr. ELLENDER. Unless, as I said, the wage is above the minimum fixed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes. Secondly, the statement that no jurisdiction is taken away from the States is not in accord with the language of the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLENDER. I would not so interpret it; no.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Third, the bill not only deals with minimum wages, but also attempts by law to tell what the wages shall be when the workweek is over 40 hours, regardless of the wage that is fixed between the employer and employee. Is that correct?

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. I would now like to read a few excerpts from the annotated code to show the extremes to which the act of 1938 was subjected by interpretation by the courts. I shall not take the time to read all the decisions—I could, but I will not do so.

I read as follows:

This chapter does not apply to local activities which merely affect commerce, obstruct commerce, burden commerce, or compete with commerce unless the activities are themselves directly interstate commerce (Mitchell v. Rogers, D.C. Hawaii 1956, 138 F. Supp. 214).

This chapter does not extend to businesses or activities that merely affect interstate commerce (Higgins v. Carr Bros. Co., Me. 1943, 63 S. Ct. 337, 317 U.S. 572, 87 L. Ed. 468. See also, Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Company, Fla. 1943, 63 S. Ct. 332, 317 U.S. 564, 87 L. Ed. 460; Noonan v. Frnco Construction Company, C.C.A. Mo. 1943, 140 F. (2d) 633; Johnson v. Filstow, Inc., D.C. Fla. 1942, 43 F. Supp. 930; Twyman v. Milk Bottlers Foundation, 1943, 44 N.Y. S. 2d 416, 180 Misc. 229, affirmed 45 N.Y. S. 2d 222, 180 Misc. 788, affirmed 47 N.Y. S. 2d 206, 267 App. Div. 918; Brooks Packing Company v. Willis, 1943, 137 P. 2d 923, 192 Okl. 538; Cudahy Packing Company of Alabama v. Bazanos, 1943, 15 So. 2d 720, 245 Ala. 73).

Although the original act was intended that way, there are many decisions showing the contrary.

Let me cite another:

The ownership, operation, and maintenance of a building in which the tenants are engaged in interstate commerce, but in which none of the tenants or a small and insignificant percentage of them is engaged in the production of goods for commerce, is at most a business affecting commerce, and this chapter does not apply (in re New York Title & Mortgage Co. (Series N–103), 1943, 39 N.Y. S. 2d 893, 179 Misc. 789).

In enactment of this chapter Congress did not exercise the full extent of its power and specifically limited coverage of chapter to employees engaged "in commerce" (Martinez v. Killian-House Co., Tex. Civ. App. 1953, 255 S.W. 2d 227).

* * * * *

Where orders are solicited within a State and the goods are shipped from without the State directly to the customer or to the agent for delivery to the customer in fulfillment of specific orders, the transactions are in "interstate commerce" (Jewel Tea Company v. Williams, C.C.A. Okl. 1941, 118 F. 2d 202).

Therefore, the law applies.

Employees of Government contractor, working at air force base, repairing and extending existing runways used in connection with interstate flights of military personnel and material were engaged in "interstate commerce" within the scope of this chapter (Mitchell v. H. B. Zachry Co., D.C.N. M. 1955, 127 F. Supp. 377).

* * * * *

Work in preparation of plans and specifications for paving of streets carrying interstate traffic and for enlarging powerplant which furnished power beyond State lines, and for making additions to existing equipment of an interurban railroad which carried interstate traffic, was work in "commerce" within this chapter (Mitchell v. Brown, C.A. Iowa 1955; 224 F. 2d 359; certiorari denied 76 St. Ct. 119; 350 U.S. 875; 100 L. Ed. —).

That shows how far the Court proceeded in interpreting the law. Certainly this was never intended. Under this ruling those engaged in the preparation of plans and specifications for paving streets were considered as being engaged in interstate commerce. Merely because the streets were used by automobiles which traveled from one State to another, those employees came within the purview of the act. Although all the work was performed within the State, the Court decided that the act applied.

Employees who worked in reservoir area of dam being constructed across nonnavigable stream as part of Federal flood control project, removing trees and brush and other floatable material for primary purpose of preventing damage to power machinery of dam, were engaged in interstate commerce and were therefore covered by this chapter (Tobin v. Pennington-Winter Construction Co., C.A. Okla. 1952; 198 F. 2d 334).

Imagine that. Merely because the trees and brush were removed, so that more water could flow to the dam and produce more electricity, and because the electricity was sold in interstate commerce, those who cut down the trees were held to come within the purview of the act. That shows how far the courts have gone in interpreting the act.

What will the Court do if the pending bill is put before it? I have before me the case to which I have referred. I could read much more of it to show the facts in detail, but I shall not take the time of the Senate to do so.

To say the least, the Court went far beyond what I would expect, as one who debated the bill and who was on the committee of conference. I say this particularly when we consider the statement made by Senator Black, who was chairman of the committee at the time, and the message from the President of the United States, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, when he presented to Congress a plan to wipe out sweatshops.

That was the real reason for the Fair Labor Standards Act. It was true that in many States, even in Massachusetts, cotton mills were paying their employees as low as 10 cents an hour.

I was proud to be a part of the enactment of law to close the so-called sweatshops. But we have gone far beyond that point today. An effort is being made now, in my judgment, to fix wages. That is what will happen if the pending bill is approved. If wages can be fixed at $1 or $1.25, then they can be fixed at $4 an hour, if that is desired. There seems to be no limitation. If that happens, then, to my way of thinking, collective bargaining will be destroyed. Labor unions will be destroyed. But unions do not seem to be able to understand that.

Let me cite a few more examples:

Persons engaged in construction of new interstate instrumentalities are not covered by this chapter, but they are covered if engaged in construction of new industrial facilities which constitute an enlargement or extension of existing interstate instrumentalities (Giannini v. Standard Oil Company, D.C. Ind. 1955, 130 F. Supp. 740).

A daily newspaper with a total daily circulation of 5,000 of which 42 copies were sent to points outside the State was engaged in "interstate commerce" so as to be subject to this chapter (Mabee v. White Plains Pub. Co., 1942, 38 N.Y.S. 231, 179 Misc. 832).

* * * * *

Where defendant manufactured boxes suitable for containing products of other manufacturing companies located in State, and such companies packed their goods in such boxes for transportation in interstate commerce, defendant was "engaged in production of goods for interstate commerce," within this chapter (Walling v. Villaume Box & Lumber Company, D.C. Minn. 1943, 58 F. Supp. 150).

Where cans of condensed cream and milk were rolled out of refrigerated boxcars and loaded into employer's truck for transportation to plant, short haul from rail siding to plant was interstate commerce since there was a practical continuity of movement of goods until they reached plant (Foremost Dairies, Inc. v. Ivey, C.A. La. 1953, 204 F. 2d 186).

Where complaint alleged that defendant was engaged in business of leasing motor vehicles to numerous corporations and persons who were engaged in production and transportation of goods in interstate commerce, that a substantial number of lessees used leased vehicles in transportation of goods in interstate commerce and that defendant employed over 100 men for maintaining and repairing motor vehicles, complaint sufficiently alleged that defendant's employees were engaged in "production of goods for commerce" so as to be entitled to protection of this chapter (Snyder v. John J. Castle, Inc., D.C.N.Y. 1943, 49 F. Supp. 926).

Where an average of 55.9 percent of rentable floor space during 5-year period involved was occupied by tenants engaged in production of goods for interstate commerce and 25 percent of total annual volume of tenants' business was in interstate commerce, building maintenance and operating employees were entitled to benefits of this chapter on ground that a "substantial part" of tenants' activities related to goods moving in interstate commerce (Frank v. McMeekan, D.C.N.Y. 1944, 56 F. Supp. 369).

I read further from the memorandum:

Building service employees, serving building tenants regularly and continuously engaged in production of goods for commerce, were engaged in "process or occupation necessary to production" of such goods within this chapter, regardless of whether they physically handled or worked on the goods (Schineck v. 386 Fourth Ave. Corporation, 1944, 49 N.Y.S. 2d 872, 182 Misc. 1037).

* * * * *

Construction company employees who actually repaired abutments or substructures of bridges on which were laid railroad tracks used in interstate transportation were "engaged in commerce" within this chapter (J. F. Fitzgerald Construction Co., v. Pedersen, N.Y. 1945 S. Ct. 892, 324 U.S. 720, 89 L. Ed. 1316).

Mr. President, that was the holding, although the bridge was located entirely within the one State and although the work was done entirely within the State. But merely because the bridge was used by a railroad which was engaged in interstate commerce, all these employees were held to come within the purview of the act.

I read further from the memorandum:

Workers on new construction which constitutes an improvement of an instrumentality of interstate commerce are, during the period of such construction, under coverage of this chapter (Tobin v. Pennington-Winter Construction Co., C.A. Okl. 1952, 198 F. 2d 334).

* * * * *

Construction company employees engaged in work of reconstructing railroad bridges that were instrumentalities of interstate commerce, under contract with railroad company, were "engaged in commerce" within meaning of this chapter (Pedersen v. J. F. Fitzgerald Construction Company, 1944, 56 N.E. 2d 77, 293 N.Y. 126, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds, 65 S. Ct. 892, 324 U.S. 720, 89 L. Ed. 1316).

* * * * *

Employees engaged in manufacture of ice, a substantial portion of which was sold and delivered within the State to railroads and packing companies for use in refrigeration of interstate shipments of perishable products, were engaged in "production of goods for commerce" within meaning of this chapter (Southern United Ice Co. v. Hendrix, C.C.A. Tenn. 1946, 153 F. 2d 689).

Let me say that was the interpretation which was made in connection with that operation for the manufacture of ice, although only a small portion of the ice was used to ice cabbage which was shipped interstate. That interpretation had the effect of closing, in my own hometown, one of the biggest ice companies we had. The wages they paid were fair enough. But overtime is the thing that actually killed the company. It was paying more than the minimum wage; but since the ice factory had to be run all day, and even on Sundays, the time-and-a-half provisions simply put the company out of business. Many of the stockholders lost their original investment. I am unhappy to say that I was one of them.

Again I read from the memorandum:

A bus company's employees, performing janitorial services at company's city bus terminal, are engaged in "commerce" within this chapter, as such terminal is part of company's business and hence part of commerce in which company is engaged (Walling v. Atlantic Greyhound Corp., D.C.S.C. 1945, 61 F. Supp. 992).

* * * * *

A company engaged in compressing bales of cotton and incidentally in storing cotton and a general utility laborer employed by company were engaged in the "production of goods for commerce" under this section with respect to that part of cotton compressed which moved in commerce (Silgaro v. Port Compress Co., D.C. Tex. 1942, 45 F. Supp. 88).

Mr. President, note that in that case no manufacturing of the cotton took place. The only operation was to reduce the size of the bale of cotton—not to reduce the poundage, but to compress the bales, so that more bales could be put into the cars. Yet because the bales of cotton were shipped in interstate commerce, the court decided that no compressed cotton came within the purview of the act, and that the minimum wage and overtime provisions applied.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 TOMORROW

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, before I overlook it, let me say that I was asked by the distinguished majority leader to ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its session this evening, it take a recess until tomorrow morning, at 9:30. I make that request.

Mr. SCOTT. No objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I read further from the memorandum to which I have been referring, as follows:

Employees of company engaged in repairing and rebuilding electric motors, and in repairing and installing electrical wiring for customers producing goods for interstate commerce, were within protection of this chapter as engaged in "production of goods for commerce" (Roland Electric Co. v. Walling, Md. 1946, 66 S. Ct. 413, 326 U.S. 657, 90 L. Ed. 683).

* * * * *

Plumbers, electricians, and other maintenance men employed by company not manufacturing any goods in interstate commerce engaged in repairing machinery used in manufacture of goods shipped in interstate, were engaged in "production of goods for commerce" with this chapter (Holland v. Amoskeag Mach. Co., D.C.N.H. 1942, 44 F. Supp. 884).

* * * * *

Where employers were engaged in business of reclaiming usable parts of wrecked and junked automobiles and selling such parts, new parts, and scrap metal in interstate commerce, an employee who drove yard wrecker, and who also kept up motors on large shears and helped to load cars that were shipped in interstate commerce with junk, was engaged in the "production of goods for commerce" within this chapter (Fleming v. Stillman, D.C. Tenn., 1943, 48 F. Supp. 609).

* * * * *

That a fire insurer would reduce premiums if night watchmen were employed was evidence that watchman would make a valuable contribution to continuous production of goods for commerce and hence was protected by this chapter (Walton v. Southern Package Corporation, Miss. 1944, 64 S. Ct. 320, 320 U.S. 540, 88 L. Ed. 298).

* * * * *

A night watchman's employment had so close and immediate a relationship to production of goods for interstate commerce as to bring him within protection of this chapter, though he engaged in no manual activities connected with production, and was not specially employed to protect such goods, and no goods were manufactured while he was on guard (Walton v. Southern Package Corporation, Miss. 1944, 64 S. Ct. 320, 320 U.S. 540, 88 L. Ed. 298).

* * * * *

Watchmen hired by corporation to look for fires in buildings owned by corporation and leased to tenants engaged in production of goods for commerce were within the coverage of this chapter since the services of the watchmen tended toward keeping the buildings in suitable condition for use in the production of goods for commerce (Mitchell v. Famous Realty, C.A.N.Y. 1954, 211 F. 2d 198).

In light of this I wonder what will happen if the bill we are now considering is enacted into law in the form which it is now written.

I read further from the memorandum:

Where transportation company retained successive night watchmen under individual contract drawn by company and purportedly between it and individual proprietorship "protection service" bearing name of watchman, and none of such watchmen had any experience or pretended to operate as guarding service, their services constituted "employment" for purposes of this chapter (Mitchell v. Strickland Transportation Company, C.A. Texas 1956, 228 F. 2d 124).

* * * * *

Where night watchman guarded entire premises and property of wholesale grocery company, including loading platform, interstate shipments loaded in freight cars and trucks, and warehouse building in which a percentage of coffee and rice was being prepared for interstate shipment, watchman was engaged in "commerce" and in "production of goods for commerce" within the meaning of this chapter so as to be covered by the chapter though none of the interstate shipments were made at night while watchman was on duty (Russell Co. v. McComb, C.A. Miss. 1951, 187 F. 2d 524).

* * * * *

Where bakery, with an annual business in excess of $1 million furnished baked goods aggregating about $57,500 to two cafeterias which used about one-third of goods for preparation of flight meals sold to airlines for use on planes leaving State, bakery employees were engaged in "production of goods for commerce" within this chapter (Mitchell v. Royal Baking Co., C.A. Fla. 1955, 219 F. 2d 532).

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I correctly understood the facts recited in connection with that case, a little more than 5 percent of the production of the bakery was used for the purpose of preparing the meals to be placed aboard the planes.

Mr. ELLENDER. No, much less than that; it was one-third of the production from the expenditure of the $57,500 that was used—one-third of the bread sent to the two cafeterias.

Mr. HOLLAND. One-third of 5 percent?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; not 5 percent.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. It should be remembered that the bakery had nothing to do with the airline. The bakery had merely sold the baked goods to the restaurants. But simply because the restaurants used some of the bread in preparing meals to be served to passengers aboard the airplanes, the bakery employees were held to be covered by this law.

I read further from the memorandum:

Where printing company printed letterheads, envelopes, accounting and business forms, checkbooks, and baggage tags for sugar producers, banks manufacturers, and airline company, which were engaged in foreign and interstate commerce, or in production of goods for commerce, printing company's employees were subject to this section (Casa Baldrich, Inc. v. Mitchell (C.A. Puerto Rico 1954, 214 F. 2d 703)).

That finding is ridiculous.

I continue with the cases:

Persons engaged in the maintenance and repair of interstate instrumentalities are engaged in "commerce" within this chapter (Van Klaveren v. Killian-House Co. (C. A. Tex. 1954, 210 F. 2d 510)).

Operating, maintenance and clerical employees employed interchangeably by a gas company and a water company, which furnished gas and water to industrial concerns for use in manufacturing products for interstate commerce and received gas flowing from out of the State, were engaged "in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce," within this section (Mitchell v. Mercer Water Co. (C. A. Pa. 1953, 208 F. 2d 900)).

Where contract for building of naval supply depot required contractors to furnish labor and services, as well as material and equipment, title to which would pass to United States when acceptance of title was approved by contracting officer, contractors performed as independent contractors and not as agents of Navy Department or instrumentalities of government and contractors' employees were therefore not exempt from benefits of section 207 of this title (Kenney v Wigton-Abbott Corp. (D.C.N.J. 1948, 80 F. Supp. 489)).

Contractors engaged in a joint venture under contract with Navy Department for construction of a naval air station at airfield where interstate commerce was being carried on insofar as their work involved extending existing runways, reconstructing control tower of administration building, and making additions to existing hangars, were "engaged in commerce," within coverage of this chapter, since persons who maintained and repaired facilities of interstate commerce were so engaged (Laudadio v. White Const. Co. (C.C.A.N.Y. 1947, 163 F. 2d 383)).

This chapter applies to work under Government contract, notwithstanding that it does not apply directly to Federal, State, or local governmental bodies (Walling v. McCrady Const. Co. (C.C.A. Pa. 1946, 156 F. 2d 932, certiorari denied 67 S. Ct. 298, 329, U.S. 785, 91 L. Ed. 673)).

This chapter is applicable to work under Government contracts (Walling v. Patton-Tulley Transp. Co. (C.C.A. Tenn. 1943, 134 F. 2d 945)).

Where employer sold 80 percent of his total sales of lumber to Georgia Highway Department and such lumber was needed, acquired and used in extensive maintenance of roadways comprising interstate commerce, employer was producing goods for commerce and was charged with knowledge that he was so doing and was subject to this chapter (Mitchell v. Raines (C.A. Ga. 1956, 238 F. 2d 186)).

Engineering firm employees, who worked all or part of their time during period in question upon designs for use in employer's plant located in another State were engaged in production of goods for commerce within provisions of this section (Craig v. Far West Engineering Co. (C.A. Cal. 1959, 265 F. 2d 251)).

Sellers of tickets for those engaged in interstate transportation are covered by provisions of section 20 et seq. of this title (Caserta v. Home Lines Agency, Inc. (D.C. N.Y. 1959, 172 F. Supp. 409)).

Those are samples of some of the decisions by our courts; and I only wish that I had an opportunity to place into the RECORD some of the interpretations that were made by the administrator of this act. They were most ridiculous.

Mr. President, I believe this list of so-called interpretations of the existing law demonstrates that even the relatively narrow standards of coverage contained therein are and have been so broadly expanded by judicial interpretation that, for all practical purposes, the initial intent of Congress has been completely ignored. On the other hand, if this propensity of the administrators and the courts to extend Federal control and influence is coupled with the much broader standards of coverage applied in the pending bill, I believe I am safe in stating that no business, no matter where located, will be safe from Federal regulation—unless it is specifically exempt under one of the exemptions carried in the measure.

How this approach can be squared with the Constitution is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain. Certainly, the Constitution vests the Congress with power to regulate commerce, but whether, in the process, the Congress can, or should, undertake to regulate all activities affecting commerce is a different question entirely. It is, however, a question which I believe the Senate must meet, and answer.

In this connection, I wish to refer Senators to an excellent study of the constitutional hazards implicit in the pending legislation, written by Mr. Eugene A. Keeney, labor counsel for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which study appeared in the American Bar Association Journal for April 1960. This article, entitled "The Proposed Amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act," begins this way:

> Without doubt, the proposed amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act expand the coverage of the present law beyond the wildest dreams of all the wide-eyed advocates of federalism.

I ask unanimous consent to have the entire article, which is entitled "The Proposed Amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act," printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

(By Eugene Adams Keeney)

(Mr. Keeney discusses proposed amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, pointing out that they greatly expand the coverage of that statute and possibly run afoul of the Constitution. The amendments are embodied in H.R. 4488 and S. 1046, now pending before Congress.)

Without doubt, the proposed amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act expand the coverage of the present law beyond the wildest dreams of all the wide-eyed advocates of federalism. This is accomplished twofold: (1) A substantial change is made in the interstate commerce provisions, and (2) many existing exemptions are eliminated.

Let us examine carefully what these amendments propose to do.

THE PRESENT LAW

In 1949 when the Fair Labor Standards Act was amended, three basic changes were made:

1. The definition of "produced" was modified so that some employees formerly regarded within the law's coverage as engaged in positions or occupations necessary for the production of goods for commerce were excluded.

2. The "commerce" definition, on the other hand, was broadened to include incoming as well as outgoing commerce with other nations.

3. Many of the act's exemptions were modified—some made broader, others narrower in scope. Several new exemptions were also added.

When the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted by Congress in 1938, it provided for the regulation of wages and hours in given areas of our national economy but it did not extend the law's coverage to the full range of the Federal power to regulate commerce.

THE COVERAGE PROVISIONS OF THE PRESENT LAW

Unlike the National Labor Relations Act, the FLSA does not apply to activities which merely "affect" interstate commerce. An effort was made in the 81st Congress to extend FLSA coverage to activities which "affect" commerce, but this proposal did not win approval.

Accordingly, the standards imposed by the statute apply only to employees not specifically exempt who engage in either commerce or the production of goods for commerce. "Commerce" is defined to include both incoming and outgoing commerce as well as commerce between the States. The "production" of goods includes not only actual production operations but also "any closely related processes or occupation" directly essential to production.

The present law contains an "employee" test of coverage—that is, an employee's rights to the minimum wages and overtime pay required by the law differ according to the nature of "his own work" in the business in which his employer is engaged. Accordingly, some employers in a particular industry may not be required to pay the FLSA rate to any of their employees; others may be required to pay these rates to some of their employees and, of course, still others may be required to pay these rates to all of their employees. Some employees in a plant may be subject to the act, while others who work with them will not be covered. (See Kirschbaum v. Walling (316 U.S. 517). See, also, Administrator's Interpretative Bulletin on General Coverage, pt. 776, sec. 776.2.)

ENGAGING "IN COMMERCE"

Section 6 of FLSA requires that every employer shall pay each of his employees "who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce * * *" according to the standards set up by the act.

Section 3(b) of the act defines commerce, as follows:

"Commerce means trade, commerce, transportation, transmission or communication among the several States or between any State and any place thereof."

Most of the questions with respect to the commerce-test coverage involve employees in the following groups:

1. Those who participate in the distribution of goods which move through the channels of commerce, and

2. Those who directly aid or facilitate the operation of instrumentalities of commerce by (a) providing materials or power used by the instrumentality, or (b) maintaining or repairing them.

As to the first group, employees who participate in the distribution of goods shipped in commerce, the determination of which employees are covered depends on when the goods come to rest at the end of their interstate journey. Before the 1949 amendments, the Labor Department took the view that the act applied to all employees of wholesalers and other distributors, not specifically exempt, who distribute goods received from outside the State. Some employers, however, insisted that coverage stopped at the unloading platform of the distributor's warehouse. Employees who handled and aided distribution to local customers after the goods had arrived at the warehouse were to be considered outside the act. This conflict was resolved by the Supreme Court which held that where an employer is engaged in the local distribution of goods obtained from other States, the act applies only to those employees who spend a substantial part of their time in:

1. Procuring or receiving goods from other States, or

2. Handling or delivering to the local customers goods which have been imported from other States in response to either special orders or a preexisting contract or understanding with the customer (Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co. (317 U.S. 564)).

It has, however, been well settled that the FLSA applies to employees whose work relates to the shipment of goods to customers who are located outside the State.

As to the second group of employees, the U.S. Supreme Court has also held that the following workers come under the FLSA's definition of "engaged in commerce," since they aid interstate commerce:

1. Employees maintaining and operating a toll road and bridge traversed by vehicles hauling goods in interstate commerce (Overstreet v. North Shore Corp. (318 U.S. 125)).

2. Employees of a construction company engaged in building new abutments and repairing superstructures on railroad bridges under a contract with an interstate railroad (Pedersen v. J. F. Fitzgerald Constr. Co. (324 U.S. 720)).

Before employees may invoke the act's protection, using this aid-to-commerce approach, the Supreme Court holds that they must establish a direct and immediate tie between their activities and interstate commerce. The work performed must be "actually in or so closely related to the movement of commerce as to be a part of it (McLeod v. Threlkeld (319 U.S. 491)). The McLeod case also held that employees of a commissary which furnished meals to maintenance-of-way employees were not engaged in commerce since their work was less immediately related to the functioning of instrumentalities of commerce.

PRODUCTION OF GOODS FOR COMMERCE

The FLSA gives the term "produced" a somewhat narrower definition than it received from the courts prior to the amendment of the statute. Under the definition set up in 1949, the word "produced" covers:

(1) Employees producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any other manner working on goods shipped in commerce; (2) employees engaged in any closely related processes or occupation directly essential to the production of such goods.

As to the employees in the first group, the 1949 amendments made no changes from the original act. The act continues to apply to those who do actual production, who transport semifinished goods between plants during production and who package the goods for interstate shipment after they have been finished. The Supreme Court has held that production under the act includes all steps "which lead to the readiness for bringing goods into the stream of commerce" (Western Telegraph Co. v. Lenroot (323 U.S. 490)).

Prior to the 1949 amendments, the phrase "production of goods for commerce" was defined as including all processes and occupations necessary for such production and the courts interpreted this to cover all types of work which indirectly contributed to the production.

For example, "necessary" tasks were held to include work performed by night watchmen, office employees and maintenance workers, as well as janitors, elevator operators, window washers and other building service and maintenance workers who serviced the buildings in which goods were produced for commerce even if these employees were employed by an independent contractor or the landlord who owned the building. Typical of creeping Government bureaucracy, the extent of coverage expanded little by little and soon employees who were producing fertilizer for farms and crops which found their way into processed articles to be shipped in commerce, as well as employees of independently operated factories, restaurants and canteens, were held subject to the act. The key factor then, is that coverage at present extends only to those workers who are engaged in a "closely related process or occupation directly essential" to the production of goods for commerce.

The conference report (see House Conference Report, No. 1452, 1949, 81st Cong., 1st sess., pp. 14–15), makes it clear that in 1949 Congress was alarmed by the Labor Department's expansion of coverage to local areas through administrative fiat. The report indicates beyond a doubt that the statute is not to be considered applicable to local activities, and that the Administrator is to apply the law within the bounds originally contemplated, which did not include local business. Listed below are six examples which the conferees enumerated to illustrate noncovered employees:

1. A local fertilizer company engaged in selling all of its fertilizer to local farmers within the State for use on land on which sugarcane is grown, which cane is then sold to sugar mills within the State and processed into raw sugar to be sent out of the State (McComb, Administrator v. Super-A Fertilizer Works (165 F. 2d 824, 1st Cir.)).

2. Employees of a quarry engaged in mining and processing stone for local use in the construction of a dike located in the same State who transport the rock from the quarry to the construction site, when the construction of the dike would prevent an oil field that produced oil for commerce from being flooded (Schroeder v. Clifton (153 F. 2d 385, 10th Cir.; cert. den., 328 U.S. 859)).

3. Employees of a local window-cleaning company doing business wholly within the State, many of whose customers are engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce (Martino v. Michigan Window Cleaning Co. (327 U.S. 173; rehg. den., 327 U.S. 816)).

4. Employees of a local independent nursery concern whose duties include mowing the lawn around the plant of a customer within the State engaged in producing goods for interstate commerce (1944–45 W. H. Man., p. 125).

5. Employees of a local architectural firm whose activities include the preparation of plans for the alteration of buildings in which goods are produced for interstate commerce (1944–45 W. H. Man., pp. 138–139).

6. Employees of a local exterminator service firm, who work wholly within the State exterminating roaches and other pests in private houses, apartments, hotels, barber shops, colleges, hospitals, and also in buildings within the State used to produce goods for interstate commerce (3 C.C.H., Labor Law Reporter, 4th ed., No. 25, 150, 385).

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE LAW

As detailed above, the present law applies only to an employee who himself is engaged in interstate commerce so that some employees of an employer may be covered while others are not. Further, the word "production" is defined at present as covering only employees actually engaged in working on goods for interstate commerce or in any "closely related process" directly essential to the production of such goods. The proposed amendments would increase this coverage beyond the power given Congress under the Constitution.

These proposed changes are detailed as follows:

1. The wage and overtime provisions (see secs. 6 and 7, dealt with in secs. 5(a) and (6) of the bill) are made applicable not only to employees now covered but also to every employee engaged in an activity, affecting commerce.

2. The phrase "activity affecting commerce" is defined in a new section 3(s) as broadly as possible by including "any activity in commerce, necessary to commerce, or competing with any activity in commerce. * * *" Thus, activity affecting commerce goes considerably beyond the Taft-Hartley definition which defines "affecting commerce" as meaning "in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tended to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce, or the free flow of commerce." Accordingly, "activity affecting commerce" includes any activity "necessary to commerce" or "competing with any activity in commerce."

These changes bring about the most expansive type of coverage ever contemplated. They go beyond the Taft-Hartley Act's definition of interstate commerce and reach virtually every small business, since even the ice cream parlor on Main Street is "necessary to commerce" or "competing with any activity in commerce." The Supreme Court has ruled in the past that the present coverage of the act is not coextensive with the limits of congressional power over interstate commerce. (See Kirschbaum v. Walling (316 U.S. 517), Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co. (317 U.S. 564), 10 E. 40th St. Bldg. v. Callus (325 U.S 578); Phillips v. Walling (324 U.S. 490).) These 1959 changes, however, make the coverage coextensive. In fact, it is almost impossible to conceive of anything within the congressional power over interstate commerce that would not be covered by these changes.

The two phrases "competing with commerce" and "necessary to commerce" should be further considered. I seriously doubt whether the Supreme Court would hold constitutional a statute which cuts away at the very needs of intrastate activity. It is almost inconceivable to have a business that is not in some way competing in commerce or necessary to commerce.

Since the Darby Lumber Co. case (U.S. v. Darby Lumber Company (312 U.S. 100)), decided by the Supreme Court in 1941 sustained the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations by passage of the FLSA, it has been held that Congress has the authority to regulate activities having a substantial effect upon interstate commerce and that this authority extends to intrastate activities which have such an effect. (See also Cotton Mills v. Administrator (312 U.S. 126).) It was held in the Darby case that Congress properly exercised its authority to prohibit interstate shipment of goods produced in violation of the wage and hour law standards. The Court even went further and upheld these standards of wages and hours against claims that they violated due process.

Considering the constitutionality of the FLSA, the statute has been sustained by many pronouncements from the Court since 1938. Besides the basic challenge to its validity under the commerce power, it has been unsuccessfully challenged:

1. As a violation of the freedom of the press (Oklahoma Press v. Walling (1946, 327 U.S. 186));

2. As an improper delegation of legislative power (Op. Cotton Mills case supra);

3. As an authorization of unreasonable searches and seizures (Oklahoma Press case supra);

4. As providing arbitrary and discriminatory bases for exemption (Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co. (327 U.S. 178)); and

5. As a violation of the 10th amendment's reservation to the States of all powers not delegated by them to the Federal Government (Darby case, supra).

Despite these Supreme Court pronouncements, this contemplated expansion of coverage most certainly should not be sustained under the authority of the commerce power. The Darby case goes pretty far in permitting Federal intervention in intrastate activities which have an effect on interstate commerce, but I doubt if the invasion of strictly local activities now proposed can be sustained under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Another example of the breadth of these new proposals, which will enfold even the smallest local business, is the new section 3(t)(7), which provides for coverage for all employees of a business, even those not engaged in an activity affecting interstate commerce, when somewhere in the establishment there is one employee engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce and the firm does a gross annual business of $50,000.

The examples given in the 1949 House conference report mentioned before are only samples of the unconstitutional expansion of coverage into local areas which these amendments contemplate. Let us look further into the coverage of activities which simply "compete" with activities in interstate commerce. This would cover a small drug store selling cigarettes, tooth paste and the like, if it competed with a large grocery store which affected commerce and if the small store had even one employee who handled goods received from out of the State and it did a gross annual business of $50,000.

Indeed, under these amendments it would not be necessary even to show such competition, for it appears that this small drug store would be covered regardless of the volume of its business if it simply sold any goods to one engaged in interstate commerce or one engaged in producing goods for interstate commerce or possibly even to one engaged in an "activity affecting commerce."

BURDENING OF COMMERCE

The definition of "affecting commerce" found in the Taft-Hartley Act includes the phrase "burdening * * * of commerce, or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening * * * commerce". A distinction should be drawn between the burdening of commerce when a labor dispute is involved and the burdening of commerce when a minimum wage is required to be paid. It cannot be denied that commerce is burdened and interstate commerce is hampered when there is a labor dispute resulting in cessation of work. A good example is the recent steel strike. But is there a burden on commerce when a minimum wage is not paid as prescribed by a Federal law? Certainly not. Has interstate commerce been interfered with? Definitely not. It would appear that the analogy between the burdening of commerce by a labor dispute and the burdening of commerce by nonpayment of a minimum wage is not justified.

I have discussed present minimum wage law and the proposed amendments only as they pertain to the possible conflict with the Federal Constitution. The Members of the House and Senate must give careful consideration to these proposals which appear to contemplate that the Federal Government should reach into the very smallest local affairs within a State. If these amendments are enacted, with this broad coverage, a giant step will have been taken toward the eradication of State borders and powers of the State, and the elimination of State governments. The proponents of federalism will then have a carte blanche.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the proponents of this bill contend that an increase in the minimum wage to $1.25 per hour is needed so as to offer much-needed relief to low-income families.

I contend that if this measure is enacted, it may result in just the opposite; that it could bring misery to many low-income families, if not outright economic disaster.

Let us consider the plight of the employee who is now paid $1 an hour in a small laundry. Operating costs being what they are, the owner cannot pay any more. His margin of profit is very small, and is only realized at a great deal of work on his own part, and that of his family.

But if the owner is forced to increase his pay scale by 25 percent, then he probably will give serious consideration to the possibility of introducing more automation into his plant operation.

He will use this additional 25 percent of operating costs to install new type machinery which obviate the necessity of hiring as many persons as he previously employed. In addition, his plant operation will probably become more efficient.

But what of the poor worker who was making $1 an hour—the person that the proponents of this measure contend they want to aid? He is simply out of work, and ultimately he and his family will become public charges—all at an increase in cost to the American taxpayer.

Thus, instead of being a help to the low-income families of this country, this measure has become a pistol aimed at their heads.

Passage of this measure poses one other great danger to the low-income families of this Nation, namely the specter of inflation and a rising cost of living.

Are there any Senators present who do not foresee another inflationary spiral if this measure is enacted?

It is very clear to me that a rise in the minimum wage would be invariably followed by a rise in all salary levels. This would be followed, just like the night following the day, by an increase in the cost of living.

Who then would be hurt? It is very clear, in my judgment, that those who would feel the brunt would be the low-income families.

Thus, the effect of this bill would be to do nothing to actually aid the low-income families of this Nation, but would cause them more harm.

In my judgment, the minimum wage has always been considered as a floor, the begininng from which honest bargaining between industry and labor as to salary scales should proceed.

If labor can receive a higher price from industry, and industry is able to pay that price without destroying itself, that is well and good. That is the American system.

But this proposal to arbitrarily jack up the floor, and at the same time, to include in this coverage millions of persons who are clearly outside the purview of interstate commerce is, in my judgment, completely unwise.

This is far removed from the concept of collective bargaining which has brought so many needed reforms to industry-labor relations in recent years.

But today the laboring man is, in general, in good shape. His working conditions have been improved, and today he can earn an adequate wage.

But under the pending measure, this would be destroyed. Instead of helping the low-income families, the measure will, eventually, make them no-income families by pricing them out of employment.

Mr. President, I wish to make it abundantly clear that I am not opposed to working people being given every opportunity to better their working conditions—wages, hours, and other conditions of employment. I do, however, have grave doubts about the prudence of substituting government edict for collective bargaining in achieving those goals.

If Senators who are desirous of doing so would take the time and trouble to study the economic history of our country, during the last 30 years, it will be found that one reason why the Fair Labor Standards Act became necessary was the lack of status and authority of labor unions at that time. Prior to the enactment of the Norris-La Guardia Act in 1932, and prior to the enactment of the so-called Wagner Act, unions were more or less at the mercy of employers, and the courts, which did not hesitate to use the injunction as a means of stifling the development of unions and preventing any kind of collective bargaining or other concerted activities by organized labor. Even in 1937, which was only 2 years after the enactment of the Wagner Act, labor unions were still enormously weaker than the employers with whom they were called upon to bargain. As a result, workers, themselves, were not able to obtain what many believed were needed improvements in working conditions—particularly wages and hours.

Mr. President, I believe it was very fortunate for labor to have been accorded by the Congress an act such as the Wagner Act. I was not in the Congress when the Wagner Act was enacted, but I read the debates which preceded the enactment of the law. It was very unfortunate that when the act was presented to the Congress management did not freely join in the discussion so as to have a more balanced act. The position which was taken by management in the early 1930's was unconscionable. Management should have worked with labor in an effort to get on the statute books a suitable, working act which would have been in balance. However, management instead warned labor that they would not assist, would not join, and would not contribute to the passage of any act, but instead would try to defeat it before the Congress, and if they should fail before the Congress would beat the act in the courts.

Of course, all of us know what happened. The law was enacted almost according to the way the labor unions wanted it. The act was no doubt abused. An amendment to the act was required to bring it back into the balance to which I referred.

When the pendulum had swung the opposite way, it was very difficult—in fact, impossible—to get labor to join in changing the Wagner Act. I well recall, Mr. President, that for 7 years I held hearings as a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in an effort to get labor and management to join and to let Congress enact a fair labor law which would put labor and management in balance. Labor refused to join, and as a result the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted. It is my considered judgment that if management and labor had joined then, and if they could join now, more adequate laws could be passed which would be to the benefit of both labor and management.

Labor says now that management has the advantage. That may be true. If both could get together across the table in a committee room and try to agree to a reasonable act which would put labor and management more in balance, I would be in favor of it. I hope some day they will get a little sense in their heads and follow that course of action.

In order to hasten these needed improved working conditions, the Federal Government determined to more or less "step in" and help do the job. As a result, the Fair Labor Standards Act was written into law. This act, I submit, accomplished through legislation what could not, at that time, be accomplished through collective bargaining, because of the relative weakness of unions, vis-a-vis employers.

Now, however, Mr. President, a different situation obtains. The labor movement in the United States wields tremendous power; representatives of workers are well able to sit down across the bargaining table from representatives of industry and obtain from them such concessions which may be justified through the processes of collective bargaining. I need not remind Senators that not only are the organization and existence of labor unions protected by Federal law, but the right of workers to join free and independent unions, is also protected. Under the National Labor Relations Act, employers are required to bargain collectively, and to do so in good faith. It is an unfair labor practice for an employer to fail to do so.

On the other hand, if agreement between a union and an employer as to wages, hours, and working conditions cannot be achieved, the right of the members of the union to strike the employer's place of business is guaranteed and protected, under Federal law. Further, members of unions are accorded the right to peacefully picket the employer's premises, and to engage in other concerted activities.

These guaranteed rights, along with a parity of strength on the part of labor unions, have been achieved, generally speaking, since the initial enactment by Congress of minimum wage-minimum hours legislation.

In my opinion, there is no need for further intrusion on the part of the Federal Government into an area where labor and management are well able to protect themselves. The achievement of improved working conditions, including wage increases, is certainly a suitable subject for collective bargaining. It strikes me that in the light of the protection accorded to working people to so bargain, plus the present position of economic power enjoyed by organized labor, Uncle Sam should not further inject himself into the picture.

I should not need to remind Senators that the overriding objective of the so-called Taft-Hartley Act was to restore the balance between labor and management, a balance which had been heavily weighted on the part of labor with enactment of the Wagner Act, during days when the labor organization movement was in its infancy. If, indeed, that approach is going to be preserved—and enactment in 1959 of the so-called Labor-Management and Disclosure Act was certainly a further manifestation of that approach—then it is the height of inconsistency for the Congress to seek to again revert back to pre-1947 days, by substituting Federal power for a free and open process of collective bargaining. This comment, I believe, is particularly appropriate when it is understood that the pending bill would not only raise minimum wages—a function of collective bargaining—but would also further expanded Federal power overall classes of business, by broadening coverage of the act.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he does not agree with me that the proposed change of definition of persons engaged in interstate commerce and in the production of goods for hauling in interstate commerce to cover those who are engaged in activities affecting commerce would virtually lay down a principle under which local governments could be deprived of all power to regulate any activity in this field?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no doubt about it. As I frequently said today, and I believe other Senators agreed, it would simply mean that the long arm of the Federal Government could dip down into North Carolina, and into every business in that State, or any business to be created later, and tell the employer what to do. There is no doubt about that. That is the worst feature of the bill.

My objection is not so much to the increase in the minimum wage. That is not the point, because in most cases employees who are not protected by collective bargaining get more than what the bill proposes to give them. It is the increased coverage that bothers me and should bother every other Senator.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to ask the Senator further if he does not agree with the view that when the Founding Fathers drafted the Constitution, they separated the powers of government between the Federal Government and the States because they had studied the history of mankind and mankind's quest for the right of self-government, and had found inscribed upon each page of that history that self-government cannot endure in any country in which all the powers of government are centralized at one point.

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no doubt about it. In drafting the Constitution the States did not give to the Federal Government unlimited power. They limited it in the Constitution. The States reserved to themselves what is not included in the Federal Constitution. This principle, of course, has been violated many times now. Nevertheless, I will not lend my voice to further violations.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator whether one of the great advantages which this Nation enjoys under the Constitution, that is, the division of powers between the National Government and the States, does not lie in the fact that it permits each State to make experiments in government and in economic matters, which experiments if successful may be adopted by other States, but which experiments if unsuccessful do not affect the welfare of any other State?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is what has really made America great. It is the fact that our local people have had a hand in deciding what should be done, and what was best for them to do, not only in trade and in dealing with each other, but also in the administration of laws generally speaking. Except for the fact that all this was handled on the local level, America would not have become the great country it is today.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator agree that one of the best ways to preserve the America that we know and love and, in fact, to preserve liberty, is to leave as much of the government as possible at the local level, to be handled by the legislatures of the 50 States, which cannot be pressured or coerced into action by any groups, rather than vest it in Congress, which can be pressured into action by groups of a self-seeking nature?

Mr. ELLENDER. There is no doubt about it. That is what I have been striving for all my life as a legislator. I served in the Louisiana Legislature for 12 years before I came here. I served as speaker of my State house. I will soon conclude 24 years of service in the Senate. I have always been in favor of States rights and in letting the local communities handle anything that deals with them directly and which is of a local nature.

Mr. ERVIN. I take it that the Senator from Louisiana, like the Senator from Florida, does not accept the thesis which was advanced here by some of our brethren on the floor of the Senate, that when the people of the States elect Senators they always elect wise men, but when these same people elect members of their State legislatures they always choose unwise men, incapable of government.

Mr. ELLENDER. I must have been a fool at one time, and must be a very wise man now, because I served in the State legislature of my State before I served in the Senate.

I fully agree with the thesis of the Senator from North Carolina. In fact, my friend from Florida takes the same position, that it is a tragedy indeed that all those whom the pending measure seeks to help will not get that help if it is enacted into law. In fact, they would be worse off. That has been the history in business and in industry. When labor costs get too big, automation comes in. As a result, many people lose their jobs. If we keep on raising wages in all businesses, it is bound to result in more automation and the loss of jobs.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not wish to abuse the patience of the Senator. The night is pretty far advanced. However, I do wish to ask him this question. Agreeing as thoroughly as I do with him that the new definition of commerce in the bill is the worst thing in it, and opens the door to federally fixed time and wages in all business in the States—that is what it does—I should like to ask the distinguished Senator if the granting of that kind of power does not grant an ancillary or additional power, which can be recognized at any time; namely, that the Federal Government also has the power to fix prices in these same industries.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not see any difference.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator knows how I feel, and I know how he feels on the question of a Fair Employment Practices Act, which depends for its legality and for its constitutionality upon the question of whether the Federal Government has the power to reach down and tell employers whom to hire, and employees whom to associate with in the unions. Is it much of a step from the things we have been talking about to the granting of power that cannot be questioned again, to set up an FEPC law?

Mr. ELLENDER. In that connection, since I have been in the Senate there have been three proposals which, if enacted, would have destroyed our way of life.

Several years ago, under the guise of enacting a so-called minimum wage law, there was a section written into the proposed act which would give the administrator of the law the power to go into a business and fix the salaries of the employees, beginning at the minimum fixed in the bill.

In other words, he could have classified employees into perhaps four, five, or six classifications, beginning with the minimum wage that was fixed in the law, which was at that time originally at 85 cents but reduced to 75 cents. If that bill had been enacted into law, we can imagine the lack of competition that would have existed in business, if the administrator would have been able to go into businesses and classify employees and fix their wages without the consent of the employers.

The next bill that was proposed was the one that the Senator from Florida referred to, the FEPC bill, which would have forced an employer to accept as employees people not of his choosing.

The third bill that we beat down was the one that provided that if a private enterprise did not give full employment, the Federal Government had to do it.

If we had put those three bills on the statute books we can well see what would have happened to our great United States. We would have enacted a law which would have fixed the wage without the consent of the employer, forced the employer to hire people not of his choosing, and if private enterprise did not maintain full employment, the Government would have done it. It would have been only a question of time before our great country would have been destroyed, if any of these proposals had been enacted into law.

It strikes me that both of these objectives should be left in the hands of the toilers themselves, who, working through their legally designated collective bargaining agents, operating under the Federal guarantees referred to earlier, are well capable of sitting down with all classes of management and, across the bargaining table, resolving their differences.

The collective bargaining approach as opposed to more Federal coercion has many merits, other than those to which I have previously referred. Briefly, it seems to me that these are:

First, a recognition that a nationwide wage structure is, by its very nature, harmful to the patterns of normal economic growth which would otherwise occur. In this connection, I have always been of the opinion that fair and decent wages should be based upon considerations other than merely dollar values. Actually, Mr. President, an hourly wage of itself is meaningless, and remains so until it is converted into purchasing power. Thus, $1.25 per hour should not be viewed as a means of and in itself; on the contrary, any wage must ultimately be converted into what it will buy in the way of goods, wares, and merchandise before it can be realistically evaluated. I need not point out to Senators that a given dollar value will frequently buy more in one area of our country than it will in another, since costs of living are less in some areas than in others. What may be a "fair" minimum wage in Louisiana, for instance, could very well be a bare subsistence in other parts of the country. Furthermore, distinctions should be made not only as to geographical areas, but as to population density, as well. I have found that, as a general rule, costs of living are lower in rural areas than in urban communities. Certainly, in order to be fair, these distinctions should be observed. Yet, under the pending bill, these two vital considerations, along with others, would be ignored; instead, a federally provided, nationwide minimum wage would be imposed. The result: scant, if any, benefits to workers in some areas, while employees in others would receive a relatively handsome base wage.

Second, a broadened, national, federally imposed minimum wage would actually result in economic hardship to some workers, as opposed to economic betterment, about which proponents have generalized so often. I have already touched upon this possibility in my discussion of the probable impact this legislation could have upon small businesses particularly in rural, or low labor cost areas. However, let me remark again that should employers in such areas be saddled with either a higher minimum, or should a minimum be imposed where none previously existed, quite a few businessmen, employers, if you please, Mr. President, will be faced with one of two alternatives: Either they can go out of business, due to an economic inability to pay higher wages and survive, or they can increase prices. Neither of these alternatives can possibly be said to be beneficial to the workers this measure purports to help.

Under the initial alternative, unemployment would be substituted for employment—certainly far from a beneficial result; under the second alternative, rising prices would rob the employees of part, if not all, of their so-called gains, and, in addition, carry the prospect of new injury to other segments of our economic community.

If this discussion proves anything, it proves, in my mind, the complete fallacy of a nationwide wage structure. On the other hand, should the matter of wages and hours be left in the hands of employees and employers, to be resolved through collective bargaining, then bargaining discussions could, and doubtless would, take into consideration the factors I have referred to.

Why take a step which would substitute the cold, dead hand of Federal fiat for what should be a reasonable, and very human, process of collective bargaining?

Mr. President, I have already spoken longer than I intended to speak, but I harbor strong feelings on this subject. I believe, I wish to emphasize, in the right of American workers to be paid a fair wage; by the same token, I am convinced that under a free enterprise system, the Federal Government—or any other government—should not be put in a position where it has the power of life and death over private industry. Yet, under the pending measure, a bill which would provide an all-inclusive minimum wage, this last result would be bound to obtain. If workers are underpaid, then their right to exercise their rights accorded under law should be exercised, and working conditions improved through collective bargaining. Under no circumstances should Uncle Sam's coercive power be substituted for free, fair, and open collective bargaining.

TAX IMMUNITY OF STATE AND MUNICIPAL BONDS

During the delivery of Mr. ELLENDER's remarks,

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to my good friend from South Carolina for a question.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Senator is willing to yield to me for an insertion in the RECORD, with the understanding that it will all be printed in the RECORD after the conclusion of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from South Carolina and to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], with the understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor, so that they may make insertions in the RECORD, to be printed following the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, there is evidence of increasing concern that the Treasury Department is on the point of flouting the will of Congress, as clearly expressed in the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959, by imposing through its regulations a tax on income from State and municipal bonds.

On June 10, 1959, at the time the conference report on H.R. 4245, the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959, was adopted, I asked the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], chairman of the Finance Committee, the following inquiry concerning this matter, and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Mr. President, I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Virginia a question about the conference report. As I understand from the report, county and municipal bonds will not be taxed under the bill. Is that correct? Is that the Senator's construction?

In response to this question, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] replied:

> That is my construction. There is a proviso that if by any chance under the bill they should be taxed, necessary steps will be taken to refund the tax.

The proviso to which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] referred appears in subparagraph 5 of section 804 of the act and provides that if it is established in any case that the application of the tax formula in the bill results in the imposition of a tax on State and municipal bonds, adjustments shall be made to the extent necessary to prevent such imposition.

The concern that the Treasury will ignore this proviso—in which concern I share—is evidenced by a resolution adopted at the 1960 annual conference of the U.S. Conference of Mayors held in Chicago on May 13, 1960; a resolution adopted by the National Association of Attorneys General at their 54th annual meeting in San Francisco on July 7, 1960; and by a resolution adopted by the Governors Conference at its 52d annual meeting at Glacier National Park on June 29, 1960. I ask unanimous consent that these resolutions be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Constitution provides, and the Supreme Court has so held, that the National Government may not impose a tax on interest from State and municipal obligations. Congress specifically adhered to the constitutional prohibition in drafting the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959, and the Treasury should not, under any circumstances, allow its lust for additional revenues to induce it to violate the Constitution and to thwart the express will of Congress.

EXHIBIT 1

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE 1960 ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS, CHICAGO, MAY 13, 1960

TAX IMMUNITY OF MUNICIPAL BONDS

Whereas the constitutional immunity of municipal bonds from Federal taxation is necessary to the preservation of the integrity of local self-government;

Whereas this immunity has been respected over the history of our country;

Whereas there have been proposals introduced in the Congress threatening the principle of this immunity;

Whereas other proposals introduced in Congress would tend to determine local policy by penalizing certain local activities by taxing bonds issued for certain purposes;

Whereas others at the Federal level have proposed that income from municipal bonds be subject to Federal taxation;

Whereas the Life Insurance Income Tax Act of 1959 specifically directed that income from State and local bonds not be taxed; and

Whereas the U.S. Conference of Mayors has for almost 30 years been in the forefront of the opposition of attempts to destroy local self-government by the imposition of Federal tax on municipal bonds: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, That the conference continue to give leadership to the effort to protect the integrity of local self-government by opposing every and all attempts to tax municipal bonds and that the Secretary of the Treasury again be requested to issue regulations under the Life Insurance Income Tax Act of 1959 to carry out the provisions of that law excluding income from State and local bonds from taxation.

RESOLUTION V. FEDERAL TAXATION OF STATE AND MUNICIPAL BOND INTEREST

Whereas by resolution adopted at its 53d annual meeting on May 7, 1959, the National Association of Attorneys General urged the 86th Congress of the United States to adopt the Senate instead of the House version of then pending H.R. 4245 insofar as it dealt with the tax consequences of the receipt of State and municipal bond interest because the Senate version conformed to the Constitution of the United States by displacing tax formulas otherwise applicable so as to assure the States and their political subdivisions the same full freedom from taxation of the interest paid on their obligations to life insurance companies as applies to such interest paid to other taxpayers; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States did enact such Senate version on the subject of State and municipal bond interest, but the U.S. Treasury has not responded to the requests of State and municipal officers to assure by regulation that the tax formulas otherwise applicable would in fact be displaced to avoid increased tax under the act solely as the result of the receipt of State and municipal bond interest; and

Whereas the Governors' conference at its 52d annual meeting on June 29, 1960, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas Federal taxation of the interest on State and municipal bonds would offend the Constitution of the United States and would impose a destructive burden on State and local financing; and

"Whereas in recognition of this constitutional principle and in a desire not to impose such burden, the Congress of the United States, in the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959 provided as a statutory exception to the taxing formula that if in any case the application of the formula would result in taxation on the interest of State and municipal bonds of the taxpayer, adjustment should be made to the extent necessary to avoid that result; and

"Whereas the Treasury Department of the United States has conceded that the formula, in the absence of the exception, would in most instances increase the tax burden of taxpayers under such act holding State or municipal bonds solely by reason of the receipt of interest on such bonds; and

"Whereas the Federal-State relations committee of the Governors' conference, sitting as part of the joint Federal-State action committee with Federal officials, has urged that the Treasury Department should recognize that such an admitted effect constitutes taxation within the meaning of the congressional exception and the constitutional prohibition and should, by regulation, provide that in any case where such increased taxation can be demonstrated, adjustment should be made by the taxpayer to prevent such increased burden; and

"Whereas any regulation which produces the result of increasing taxable income solely by reason of the receipt of State and municipal bond interest would precipitate a vexatious litigation which would unsettle the market for State and municipal bonds and produce an unseemly clash between the sovereignties of the Federal Government and the States; and

"Whereas the matter is now before the Secretary of the Treasury: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is urged to provide by regulation under the aforesaid act that in determining life insurance company taxable income thereunder, interest on State and municipal bonds should not be included in computing any item of income or deduction if the inclusion of such interest would produce a higher life insurance company taxable income than if it were not included."

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the 54th annual meeting of the National Association of Attorneys General in San Francisco, July 7, 1960, That this association joins with the Governors' conference for the reasons set forth in their resolution in urging the Secretary of the Treasury to provide by regulation under the aforesaid act that in determining life insurance company taxable income thereunder, interest on State and municipal bonds should not be included in computing any item of income or deduction if the inclusion of such interest would produce a higher life insurance company taxable income than if it were not included.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GOVERNORS' CONFERENCE, 52D ANNUAL MEETING, GLACIER NATIONAL PARK, MONT., JUNE 29, 1960

FEDERAL TAXATION OF STATE AND MUNICIPAL BOND INTEREST

FOOD FOR PEACE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want to commend to the attention of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle a column by Peter Edson in the August 9 edition of the Washington Daily News.

Mr. Edson documents what my colleagues and I have been saying—that the Eisenhower-Nixon administration—after years of fighting my food for peace bill—have finally come around to truth and light. They have been converted, even though it was an election-eve conversion.

Mr. Edson wrote that the food for peace bill "was reported out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in August 1959, after Eisenhower administration, State, Agriculture, and International Cooperation Administration officials testified they did not want a long-term program. Now, the administration has come around to it, and the new Republican platform adopted at Chicago in July also endorses it."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Edson's column be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW FOOD PLAN DEVELOPING

(By Peter Edson)

A gigantic new giveaway plan to distribute America's food surpluses through the United Nations "to help feed the hungry of the world" is being developed by the Eisenhower administration.

President Eisenhower had planned to present this idea to the Big Four meeting in Paris last May. When Russian Chairman Nikita Khrushchev blew up the summit, however, the plan was set back.

The next heard of it was in a U.S. farm policy speech Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON made at a Republican rally in Minot, N. Dak., June 20.

The Nixon speech was primarily a general preview of his own farm policy ideas. That got the most news attention.

Mr. NIXON also revealed, however, that he, Under Secretary of State C. Douglas Dillon, U.N. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, and White House Food for Peace Coordinator Don Paarlberg had devised this plan for helping to feed the world's hungry.

The Vice President did not present it as a cure-all for the farm problem or the world's problems. He described it as a cooperative effort by nations with food surpluses to share them with have-not nations, without disturbing commercial markets.

The idea of doing this through the United Nations instead of through the Big Four is the new wrinkle intended to salvage the plan. It would, in brief, involve the food surplus countries like Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Argentine, and France—also the Benelux and Scandanavian countries which have some dairy products surpluses—to pool their supplies.

Soviet Russia would even be entitled to contribute, if it has the surpluses it claims. But the great bulk would come from the United States. And distribution would be through the U.N., instead of direct.

One curious angle on this Eisenhower-Nixon plan is that Congress has had before it for more than a year a Democratic food for peace plan on which action has been stalled.

This was primarily the brainchild of Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, who has been talking about using America's food surpluses as a force for freedom since 1957.

In a St. Paul speech, December 9, 1958, Senator HUMPHREY said, "My goal is to use food for peace * * * to fulfill the Biblical mandate to feed the hungry and heal the sick." A month later, the phrase "food for peace" appeared in President Eisenhower's state of the Union message to Congress, but it was not followed up.

The next April, Senator HUMPHREY incorporated his ideas in an international food for peace bill. Fourteen Democratic Senators and Senator FRANK CARLSON, Republican of Kansas, joined Senator HUMPHREY as cosponsors.

The bill was revised and reported out by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in August 1959, after Eisenhower administration, State, Agriculture, and International Cooperation Administration officials testified they did not want a long-term program.

Now the administration has come around to it and the new Republican platform adopted at Chicago in July also endorses it. President Eisenhower made brief reference to it in his message to the special session of Congress just opened.

ENDING OF ARMS RACE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the delegates of more than 600,000 members of the Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church in their 101st annual convention approved a resolution calling for every possible effort through the United Nations by the United States toward ending the arms race and urged the establishment of a special national agency on peace and disarmament such as I proposed last January and which is a recommendation of the 1960 Democratic Party platform.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter containing the resolution and signed by Malvin H. Lundsen, president of the church, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., August 8, 1960.
The Honorable HUBERT HUMPHREY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: At its 101st annual convention, the Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church, with a membership of better than 605,000, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, we urge the Government of the United States to put forth every possible effort through the United Nations toward ending the arms race, and to continue to work toward a controlled and adequately safeguarded mutual disarmament. To this end we would favor legislation looking toward the establishment of a special agency in the National Government on peace and disarmament."

It is our hope and prayer that in your position of responsibility, you will do all you can to implement every effort for disarmament and peace.

Sincerely yours,
MALVIN H. LUNDSEN,
President, Augustana Lutheran Church.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to express my thanks to the Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church for its continued support of the United Nations, and its request for a long overdue agency in the Department of State to concentrate on proposals for a just and enduring peace.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I have concluded my presentation. If there are no further questions, under the order previously entered, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 9:30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Saturday, August 13, 1960, at 9:30 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate, August 12, 1960:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Edwin M. Martin, of Ohio, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

SENATE

SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1960

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 11, 1960)

The Senate met at 9:30 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Vice President.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, in the radiance of yet another day we turn to the altar of Thy grace, seeking a strength not our own, to make our dreams of the beautiful and the true come to earth. When the shadows of rampant evil fall upon the best laid plans for Thy children's welfare, give us to remember that so it seemed to those who in the yesterdays fought the good fight before us.

When in the tempestuous present we are tempted to view the future with bleak despair let us not forget that the pioneers of faith of every century had to find their way, as we must, by courage and trust.

Beset by bitterness and falsehood, purge our spirits of retaliation or of malice. Even in the whelming flood of hate steady us with the calm confidence that beauty endures, that goodness is regnant and that Thy other name is Love. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 12, 1960, was dispensed with.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have the regular morning hour for the transaction of routine business, the introduction of bills, and other related matters, and that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I interpose an objection to any request made by my leader, but I am constrained to do so in this particular instance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ALLOTT:

S. 3842. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange certain property in Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. 3843. A bill conferring jurisdiction upon the U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado to hear, determine, and adjudicate the claim of Mary Martinez; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas:

S. 3844. A bill for the relief of Woody W. Hackney, of Fort Worth, Tex.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHURCH:

S. 3845. A bill to amend section 334 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, relating to the apportionment of the national acreage allotment for wheat; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See the remarks of Mr. CHURCH when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938, RELATING TO APPORTIONMENT OF NATIONAL ACREAGE ALLOTMENT FOR WHEAT

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend section 334 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, relating to the apportionment of the national acreage allotment for wheat.

The purpose of the bill is to correct an injustice which resulted from a misunderstanding, by a great many wheat-growers, of the provisions governing penalties for overplanting of wheat acreage allotments for the 1958 crop year.

I am informed that many wheat farmers understood, on the basis of the explanations of the program made available them, that the only penalty for overplanting in that year would be a cash marketing penalty. Many farmers in my State did in fact overplant, in the expectation that it would be profitable for them to market the extra wheat even after paying the cash penalty. Thereafter, it was discovered that the laws and regulations administered by the Department of Agriculture made it necessary for the Department to invoke additional penalties which have resulted in the loss of wheat acreage history and allotments for these farmers.

By previous legislative action, individual farmers have been "forgiven" this portion of the penalty, but it has nevertheless been invoked against State and county allotments, so that the history and allotment penalties have been distributed to all farmers, whether or not they were in actual compliance for the 1958 crop year, in those States and counties where overplanting occurred.

When I brought this problem to the attention of the Department of Agriculture I was advised by Assistant Secretary Marvin McLain that no administrative remedy is available but that the Department recommends remedial legislation.

The bill which I am introducing incorporates the Department's recommendations. Its net effect would be to eliminate that part of the penalty for overplanting in the 1958 crop year which has resulted in a loss of wheat history and allotments to the States and counties where overplanting occurred. As I have stated, this portion of the penalty has already been eliminated, by previous legislation, insofar as it applied to individual farmers.

Since, under present law, farmers who did not overplant in 1958 are suffering losses of wheat history and allotments simply because other farmers, in the same county or State, exceeded their allotments for that year, I think the bill is just and equitable, and I hope it can be speedily enacted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3845) to amend section 334 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, relating to the apportionment of the national acreage allotment for wheat, introduced by Mr. CHURCH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MUNDT:

Periodic report by him to his constituents regarding congressional activities.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, is the pending business the bill or the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the bill, but the question before the Senate is the amendment.

WISCONSIN CITIZEN NEEDS MEDICAL CARE BILL TO ESCAPE OLD PEOPLE'S HOME

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter to me from a Wisconsin constituent telling what the enactment of an adequate health insurance bill for the aged can mean to an elderly Wisconsin couple, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SIR: When I was 18 years of age I worked on a farm but I had to bring the money home. I got married when I was 24. My wife and I worked hard to earn some money, and we raised six children. By this time, we owned an 80-acre farm, but when the depression came, we couldn't make any money. And worst of all, I got heart trouble, and the doctor advised me to sell the farm because I would never be able to do any hard work.

I had to have four operations which used up all the cash we had gotten from the farm. I cannot work at all now, and the only money I get is from some insurance. Our money would have been completely gone if it hadn't have been for the $147 social security.

If I live until November, I will be 80, and my wife will be 75. Our working days are over. We may have to go to the old people's home where they charge $120 a month. So please get the medical care bill through because we need it badly.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

"MAN BITES DOG"

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope that the editor of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will retain his well-known sense of humor when he comes to putting a heading on these brief remarks, and will entitle them "Man Bites Dog."

My reason for making that suggestion is that I intend to say some mildly rude things about a radio commentator whose name is George Herman. Recently, he made a broadcast over CBS under the title "Congress Offers Lesson in Illogic," which appears in this morning's Washington Post.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Herman's column may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OFFERS LESSON IN ILLOGIC

(By George Herman)

(The following was broadcast on August 10 by Mr. Herman, a CBS correspondent.)

There is a certain strange and dreamlike quality to many of the goings-on in Washington these days. Politics has gone through the looking glass at the conventions and has come out into some pretty strange territory which even Lewis Carroll's Red Queen might have found hard to explain. Senators JOHN KENNEDY and LYNDON JOHNSON, out of long senatorial habit, address all their remarks to the Presiding Officer of the Senate—and draw snickers from the gallery time after time as they habitually address RICHARD M. NIXON as Mr. President.

In the land of civil rights, Republican Leader DIRKSEN introduces two proposals he himself has voted against. JOSEPH CLARK, of Pennsylvania, who wearied the Democratic leadership by lengthily battling for them then, does penance now by denouncing them as politics and leading the successful move to dump them.

Senator BARRY GOLDWATER touches off another beaut all by himself, standing just outside the door to a Labor Subcommittee room. He had come to fight a bill before the subcommittee, but a glance into the room showed only three Democratic Senators present—one short of a quorum. GOLDWATER stood outside and shouted in that there was no quorum. Chairman KENNEDY shouted back out that GOLDWATER would have to take his seat to suggest the absence of a quorum—and that would have made up the quorum, so GOLDWATER stayed outside.

If you are still with us after that one, we propose to offer some relief. Specifically, to aid in finding a path through the twisted thickets of congressional oratory likely to spring up during the next 3 weeks, we offer some signposts—a glossary of all-too-familiar terms and expressions.

For example, "Let's quit playing politics around here." This can be freely translated as: For goodness sake let's forget about your bill and take up mine.

Here's another one: "Introducing this legislation would stall all work on the other important legislation before this body." That means your proposal is highly embarrassing to my party, and we are going to shove it out of sight as quickly as possible.

Another favorite is: "Personally I believe we are here to transact the Nation's business, and not to indulge in campaign antics." This is a favorite phrase of party leaders, and can be roughly translated to mean: Come on, fellas, we've only got about 3 weeks to work in and we've gotta give the voter something to show we are serious statesmen—so let's hold the political fireworks to an agreed-upon minimum.

No glossary should omit the one which goes: "The administration had 7 years and 7 months to work for this legislation and any attempt to stampede it through in the last 3 weeks is shoddy politics." This, of course, is clearly a Democrat's terminology. And translated from the Democratese, it means the Democratic leadership has refused to pass this for years, we are not going to pass it now, and throwing it up in our faces just makes us mad.

A parallel expression is this: "If the Democratic leadership would only get down to business, they could pass the entire legislative program in less than 3 weeks and we could get on with the campaign." This one, translated from the Republican, means simply: We know they are not going to pass it, but maybe we can pick up a couple of votes with this one.

There is much serious legislating to be done in the next 3 weeks. But if you are a collector of Washington jabberwocky, keep your ears open and you can pick up some rare ones in the next 20 days.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, Mr. Herman may not have been around the Senate very long, but his cynicism with respect to the membership of the Senate, Republican and Democratic alike, has in my judgment rarely been equaled. I regret to state that it is evidence of a mounting cynicism in the press with respect to everyone in public life. It was quite clear at both the Los Angeles and Chicago conventions, where various commentators, not particularly well versed in American democratic procedures or form of government, would shut off the proceedings, which presumably the American people wanted to look at on their television screens, in order to make invidious and cynical comments about the performances at both conventions by various public servants.

Certainly I usually tend to believe that he who is without sin should cast the first stone. I would be the last to suggest that any of the Members of the Senate, including myself, do not quite frequently think in terms of national politics.

After all, this is our profession. Politics is not only the art of the possible; it is essential to democratic government.

With these preliminary comments, I should like to refer to one or two of the cynical remarks in Mr. Herman's column, which I believe do a disservice to democracy in America.

In the first place, he suggests that Senator KENNEDY and Senator JOHNSON get snickers from the occupants of the galleries every time they address the Vice President's chair as "Mr. President." With respect to that I may say that these snickers have not been audible from the floor, and that it would have been very difficult for the snickers to have arisen very frequently in this regard, because the Vice President, as is his undoubted right, has very rarely been in the chair since we came back to Washington earlier this week.

I suggest further that this particular comment is full of unwarranted criticism of Senator KENNEDY and Senator JOHNSON. It indicates a continuous sitting in the chair by the Vice President, which is not in accord with the fact. I have never seen any reason why the Vice President should be expected to preside at all times. I hope that when Senator JOHNSON becomes Vice President, while he will honor us with his presence from time to time and always give us the benefit of his advice, he will be out in the country and the world doing the job which the Vice President in a modern world must do.

So I suggest that that particular comment of Mr. Herman is a bit out of order.

Then the distinguished commentator—and we always refer to everyone as distinguished in this body, and of course all Senators are distinguished Senators—undertakes to attack my good friend, the distinguished minority leader, whom I see on the floor at the moment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The minority leader is always here. The Senator said he sees the minority leader on the floor at the moment. He is always here.

Mr. CLARK. I admit that I see the minority leader on the floor very frequently. He is not always here, and neither am I. I must also admit that some of the things he does occasionally cause some consternation among some of us on this side of the aisle more often than not.

Mr. Herman undertakes to criticize the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] because the Senator from Illinois introduced two proposals against which he himself had voted. May I ask, Why should he not? Is not consistency a rather minor virtue? Was not the situation changed? Is it not wise for the minority leader to support measures, not necessarily entirely for political reasons, which he saw fit to oppose earlier this year? I see no reason for criticizing or taking a cynical approach to the distinguished Senator from Illinois because he sees fit now to take a position different from that which he took in April.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CLARK. In just a minute. Now I come to what is probably the nub of the matter, and why I am on my feet criticizing Mr. Herman. It is because Mr. Herman has undertaken to criticize me. Of course, all Senators have very thin skins. We cannot take criticism. When someone throws a barb at us, we naturally rise in righteous anger. That is why I am on my feet today.

Now I am happy to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must remind my very distinguished friend from the City of Brotherly Love that he should go back and read the wisdom of the Sage of Concord.

Mr. CLARK. Which one? There are so many of them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Did he not say that a foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of small minds?

Mr. CLARK. I think he did. It is also a minor virtue, is it not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am always glad to share both in the major and minor virtues.

Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think this is a good opportunity to make this observation: I am not so sure that we have not been a little juvenile at times in our approach to who is here and who is not. I learned, over a long period of time, that the way, finally, to get out of one's office or to get away from the Capitol, if one is to go, is to put on one's hat and say goodbye to his office staff and say, "You will see me when you see me." There are some things which have to be done with fixed firmness.

When we place so much emphasis on the fact that a person ought to be in his chair, warming it every day and every hour, it simply does not conform to realities.

Mr. CLARK. I am glad the Senator from Illinois is in accord with me in that regard. Of course, this applies equally to the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I make the point that sometimes undue and unrealistic emphasis can be placed upon one's presence for a vote or his response to a quorum call. It should not be forgotten that Senators are confronted every day with a vast variety of chores and responsibilities, many of which require conferences with people in the agencies and departments downtown, such as Army Engineers, the Pentagon, the General Services Administration, the Veterans' Administration, the Social Security Administration, and many others. In view of the unpredictability of the Senate at times they may be engaged in just such a conference in the interest of their constituents just when the bells ring, rather untimely, and make it impossible for them to return in time for a vote. I must say that a great record on all calls of the roll and quorum calls is indeed a hallmark of diligence and devotion to duty by any Member of the Senate, and to such a record he can point with pride.

That is equally true in a political campaign. It is a part of the American system. The people want to see their candidates. So I do not draw the line too fine. I trust that at some point we will exercise a rational approach.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from North Carolina first asked me to yield. After I have yielded to him, I shall yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. President, I may say that I had hoped to complete my brief remarks in 2 or 3 minutes, so that we could get back to the consideration of the bill. I hope Senators will indulge me, after I yield briefly, so that I may take my seat after I complete my remarks. Then we can resume the consideration of the pending business.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania may have adequate time in which to respond.

Mr. CLARK. The Senate is not operating on limited time. I simply want to get ahead with the minimum wage bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania be permitted to yield to me for an observation, without his losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. North Carolina contains within its borders many wise people——

Mr. CLARK. I am sure of that, and they include the distinguished Senator who is on his feet.

Mr. ERVIN. I appreciate that remark. However, I was about to remove myself from that category.

One of the wisest men we have ever had in North Carolina was Francis Garrou, who lived in the town of Valdese, in my county.

On one occasion, the people of Valdese were preparing to hold a municipal election. They saw fit to put the name of Francis Garrou on the ballot as a candidate for mayor, without his consent.

One day a cotton broker was in Mr. Garrou's mill, before the scheduled municipal election, trying to sell his cotton. Mr. Garrou was very indignant about his name having been printed upon the ballot as a candidate for mayor in the municipal election without his consent, and he said to the cotton broker that if he were elected to the office, he would not qualify.

The election was held, and after some weeks the broker returned to Valdese on another visit to sell some cotton to Mr. Garrou. He remembered the conversation he had had with Mr. Garrou the last time he was in Valdese, so he asked Mr. Garrou how the municipal election came out.

Francis Garrou said, "You know, the fools went ahead and elected me mayor."

The cotton broker then said, "Mr. Garrou, did you qualify?"

Francis Garou said, "I have been sworn in and cussed out. If that does not qualify a man for public office in the United States, I do not know what does."

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from North Carolina is quite correct. Let me make an observation about how that would be said north of the Mason-Dixon line: "You are going to have to dish it out; therefore, learn to take it."

Mr. ERVIN. I may say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I read the column this morning. I regret that I do not share the view that the Senator from Pennsylvania has changed his mind on the question of civil rights.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for his complimentary remark.

Mr. ERVIN. I was complimenting the Senators' steadfastness to civil rights rather than his intelligence, although his intelligence is very great under all other circumstances.

I do not believe the Senator from Pennsylvania is a proper subject for criticism on any ground of insincerity. The Senator from Pennsylvania and I have agreed on many propositions. On other propositions, such as civil rights, we have disagreed. However, I do not know of any Member of the Senate who, in my judgment, has undertaken to discharge the high responsibilities which devolve upon him as a Senator of the United States with more sincerity than has the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his kind and generous remarks.

I now yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wanted to ask the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania what the title of that column was. I read it in the morning newspaper.

Mr. CLARK. It is entitled "Congress Offers Lesson in Illogic." It is a reprint of a broadcast over the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Mr. GOLDWATER. By whom was it written?

Mr. CLARK. By George Herman.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wonder what his background is.

Mr. CLARK. I was rather raising that question. Perhaps Mr. Herman will tell us on CBS fairly soon.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I read the column this morning. I am very frank to say that it was difficult to make any sense out of it, as it related to the title.

Mr. CLARK. That has been my difficulty, too.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think it might have been a proper approach to say that there is some illogic in almost any session of a legislative body, not excluding this one; but I do not see any particular reason for discussing the illogic he was trying to show.

I was highly complimented to observe that the writer of the article mentioned my name, but he described me as yelling at Senator KENNEDY. Actually, I was discussing a question with him in a rather normal voice through a doorway.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator may recall that we had another one of those doorway problems in the committee a little earlier. I happened to be there. I should like to have the public record show that the Senator from Arizona always speaks in a calm, well modulated voice, without undue emotion. So far as I am aware, I have never heard him shout yet.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad the Senator bears out my recollection of both of those occasions. Although I do not mind having a columnist write critical things about me—I always say I am content so long as they spell my name correctly—yet, the other day, my wife telephoned me and said, "It is beneath your dignity ever to yell at Senator KENNEDY."

I said, "You know me better than that. I would not yell at JACK; that would be the last thing I would do."

She said she knew that, but that several of her friends had commented on the newspaper report that I had been yelling at him, and that it seems to be the accepted code.

So I am glad my colleague has placed the article in the RECORD, in case some of our colleagues missed the item in the morning newspaper.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, I think it will be well to have the article appear in the RECORD, so all Senators can see how some persons report congressional procedure.

Mr. LAUSCHE and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CLARK. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that perhaps I should be astonished that anyone would have the audacity to write that a Senator can be guilty of illogic.

Mr. CLARK. What are we here for?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I suppose this high office makes it mandatory that ordinary human beings should constantly be logical. But I am inclined to believe that at times my associates, and frequently I, myself, become prey to the human weakness of being illogical.

But I also wish to say that I think we would be ascribing to ourselves an infallibility and dignity that rightfully do not belong to us if we were to assert that we always were logical.

I have seen a great deal of illogic; probably I have been guilty of some. So I am not inclined to take the great exception to what Mr. Herman has written or to what some Senators on this floor say. Perhaps there is some truth to it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield. But, Mr. President, I hope that after I have yielded this time, my colleagues will permit me to conclude what I had hoped would be brief remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say a few words about Mr. George Herman. Since what I have to say is friendly, perhaps the most unfriendly thing I could say is that when I got up this morning and took my own breakfast, I did not have time to read his column. But regardless of what he said, I rise in his defense—without having any idea of what he said or what he wrote—because I am godfather to one of his children; he is named after me. This, in my judgment, makes Mr. Herman a man of most excellent judgment. [Laughter.]

Therefore, if all that Mr. Herman has said is that we are illogical, I would remind my colleagues that there is a saying on this floor by which we paraphrase Emerson's statement that "consistency is a jewel"; here in this Chamber I am afraid, as the Senator from Ohio has pointed out, at times consistency is no more than a semiprecious stone.

Therefore, I hope Mr. Herman will go easy on us. But no matter what he says or writes, I think he is a very fine person.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend for his ringing defense of freedom of the press.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield once more to me?

Mr. CLARK. I yield briefly to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Someone has said this world is consistent in only one thing, and that is its inconsistency. Perhaps that comment frequently applies to our procedure here; we are consistent only in our inconsistency.

Mr. SCOTT. Or Mr. President, if my colleague will yield, to permit me to make a conclusion insofar as my remarks are concerned, let me say that nothing is constant except constant change.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the part of the article which wounds me so deeply obviously has reference to me, and reads as follows:

> JOSEPH CLARK, of Pennsylvania, who wearied the Democratic leadership by lengthily battling for them then—
> For civil rights, last spring—
> does penance now by denouncing them as politics and leading the successful move to dump them.

Mr. President, from time to time I have had my differences with my good friend, the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]; but both he and I bruise easily and heal easily. We are the best of friends, and I am sure we shall continue to be so for many long years.

The thing that really upsets me is, not that it may be said that I have annoyed him from time to time, but that it is said that I have wearied him; and it is to that part of Mr. Herman's article that I take the greatest exception.

I am sure that when my friend has concluded his colloquy, he will rise to my defense, to say that although there are many things that I have done to him, that he does not like, at least I have not wearied him.

Mr. President, I am about to yield the floor.

I think there is only one sensible statement in Mr. Herman's article. It reads as follows:

> There is much serious legislating to be done in the next 3 weeks.

There certainly is. Let us go ahead with it.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXPLORATION AND COMMUNICATION IN SPACE

Mr. JAVITS obtained the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and ask unanimous consent that I may do so, and may also yield to other Senators, to permit them to make brief statements, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, as human beings we are prone to think very highly of ourselves, most of the time; and particularly along about this time of the year, every 4 years, when we can pay our respects or our lack of respects to the opposite party or to the candidates of the opposite party, we are likely to feel even more self-important than usual.

However, Mr. President, certain events of yesterday would seem to relegate all of us—parties and candidates, and even races—to the realm of the relatively unimportant. As the Senator from Illinois has suggested, we may be becoming more juvenile, as individuals, although because of what happened yesterday to us, a branch of the animal kingdom known as mankind, we are now greater than we have ever before been.

Since history began, Mr. President, the human race has been fascinated by what may lie in the space beyond the earth—way over yonder, beyond the skies. That there is something there, there has never been a doubt in the mind of anyone on earth, regardless of his religion or creed. But never before and even now we do not know what may be out there.

More recently, we have been challenged to learn what is out there and how we can get out there.

Unfortunately, we have had to be largely inspired by fear and suspicion, by the possibility of war and the threats of war, to make progress in that direction.

Certainly we want to go out into space. We want to find out what is in space. But there have been obstacles in the way.

First, we had to find out how to get out there. Then we have to learn how to navigate, once we got out there, and how to communicate in space, not only between ourselves, but possibly between the earth and other planets.

Finally, and what I think is most important to everyone concerned with this great venture, we have had to learn how to return safely to the earth.

Mr. President, the events of yesterday scored major breakthroughs in seeking solutions to all these problems in connection with getting out into space and conducting explorations in space.

Perhaps the most important of yesterday's events was the flight of the X–15 to 131,000 feet above the earth, up into the space where, according to the pilot, Maj. Robert White, there were three different shades of blue—the earth, the sky, and the deep areas beyond.

Mr President this is the highest altitude that man has ever been above earth. Yet, according to the report of Major White, it will be possible to fly this ship 50 to 100 miles higher than he went yesterday, and at a speed of 4,000 miles an hour.

It is also reported he said that if there was some way to get that ship propelled to a still greater altitude, it would be possible to navigate it in those space areas.

I certainly think this was one of the most important breakthroughs we will have to make in order to navigate in space under human guidance.

Then there was a major breakthrough in regard to communications. A balloon satellite was shot to a distance of a thousand miles above the earth and inflated, and recognizable voices came back to earth from that balloon. I heard the recording of the President's voice. I understand the majority leader also sent to the balloon a message which has returned or will return to this earth of ours.

This event is simply a prelude to intercommunication between men in space, and possibly between planets, and over distances which will make this preliminary thousand-mile distance seem like no distance whatsoever.

Then there was a third event yesterday, a very gratifying and at the same time startling event—at least it would have been startling 2 years ago—which was referred to by the good Senator from Hawaii yesterday, namely, the recovery of the capsule from the Discoverer satellite. The capsule, discharged from the satellite into space, came down in the Pacific Ocean a comparatively short distance from Hawaii—200 miles, as I understand—and, according to the morning papers, the capsule is still talking. It talked all the way down from outer space, and was talking when it was rescued from the waters of the Pacific. According to the morning papers, it is still talking on its way to Washington. It is probably talking as intelligently as some of the discussion which we occasionally hear on the Senate floor. Certainly, the language it speaks will have a more far-reaching effect, because these events of yesterday show we can go into outer space, we can navigate in outer space, we can communicate with each other from outer space, and we can return to earth safely, or we will be able to when we learn how to iron out a few details.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Just to comment on the first breakthrough the Senator was talking about, it to me is one of the most exciting developments we have had in astronautics or aeronautics. The X–15 was born out of the boost glide which was developed in Germany. There is no question this craft will fly mach 7, which will be in the neighborhood of 4,700 miles an hour. Neither is there any question that this aircraft, with proper boost, can reach as far out as Major White said, a hundred miles. Having reached that altitude and that speed, it will permit the aircraft to circle the globe at least twice and come in for a controlled landing. In fact, some of us have projected such a flight, and have found that the aircraft would have to start its landing pattern over the Philippines in order to land in New Mexico.

I have talked to the engineers who developed this craft. I have been in the craft itself. I think it is one of the greatest prospects we have. I think the breakthrough we are talking about is very, very imminent. I do not think we have to look for it 4 or 5 years from now. When they go 131,000 feet, there is no question they can go higher; and when they put in some rockets, this X–15 will be doing what the Senator this morning has been saying will be possible.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Arizona for his very valuable contribution to this discussion. I agree thoroughly that it is a matter of not very much time before far greater achievements are made. To bear that out, I point out that there were other developments yesterday which went practically unnoticed and were relegated to the inner pages of newspapers, under small headlines.

First, an Atlas missile was fired 5,000 miles to its target. A Polaris missile was fired 1,100 miles to its target. Even 1 year ago that would have been important news and would have made the front pages of newspapers. That news made page 7 of the New York Times today. It probably made the inner pages of the larger newspapers of the country.

It shows the speed with which we are traveling toward the conquest of outer space. It makes me, at least, realize how small and humble we all are, in the light of these great developments. Events that were thought miraculous yesterday are considered routine today.

All Americans, I know, are extremely proud of the accomplishments of our scientists and our fliers and the others who contributed to these great events of only yesterday.

I believe, Mr. President, this is a time when mankind, as a race rather than as individuals, should feel proud and elated, but at the same time, by the same reasoning, it is a time for great humility.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have the floor. I yield to the majority leader, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I was not aware the Senator had the floor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New York may yield to me for a brief statement, without his losing the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. I may inform the majority leader it is not necessary to ask unanimous consent. I yield to him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, first, I want to congratulate and commend the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] for the very fine statement he has made. It is characteristic of him always to put the national interest first. I have listened with pride to the observations he has made this morning.

As he has told the Senate and the country, in the past 24 hours America has achieved two notable successes in the space field. For the first time, a manmade object has been recaptured intact after being placed in orbit around the earth. Also, for the first time, we have placed in orbit a passive communications satellite and have successfully transmitted voice signals from the east coast to the west coast of the United States by bouncing them off the satellite.

These successes are especially gratifying since they come after previous failures and disappointments. Twelve times previously, the Air Force has attempted to recover a capsule from the Discoverer satellite, only to fail. The 13th attempt was successful and represents an historic milestone in achieving manned space flight.

The successful launching of the Project Echo communications satellite is an important technological achievement. Equally important, however, is the fact that scientists throughout the world have been kept advised of our plans for this launching, so that they could cooperate in experiments using the satellite.

I think that the American people and freedom loving people all over the earth should be proud of this great space experiment. There can be no question but that the day will come—and in the not too distant future—when one man or one program can be seen and heard simultaneously in every living room in the world.

These successful experiments show what American ingeunity can accomplish, if it is given the proper support. While we have a right to be gratified at these successes, there is still no room for complacency. The fact that these successes have been accomplished only after numerous failures underscores the need for continuing our efforts to forge ahead in the vital field of space.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee of the U.S. Senate, I am extremely happy to observe that since its creation, and since the creation of its predecessor, the special committee, we have all closed ranks and united, regardless of party affiliation, to see that we had an adequate program in this field. I do not recall that there ever has been a divided vote in that committee in connection either with an authorization or an appropriation matter.

Mr. KEATING and Mr. FONG addressed the Chair.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader, I should like to add a footnote.

I agree with the Senator from Texas that I know of no case in the Senate or in the House committee, during the time in which I was a member, when there has been any division on our space programs and efforts. It was my pleasure to serve on the first space committee which was set up in the House, the special committee on space exploration. At that time the majority leader was the chairman of the special committee in the Senate. Together the two committees worked out our original space legislation. The majority leader performed a great service in that connection, as did the distinguished majority leader of the House. Unanimity, and a fine spirit prevailed throughout our deliberations.

The great events of the last week bring my recollection back to some of the things which were said by the scientists in our first hearings on space exploration. It seemed little short of fantastic to listen—and, Mr. President, this was only in 1958—to the tales of what was to come. I remember well that a distinguished scientist, on the stand, told us about space capsules which would be shot into space and which would accelerate the delivery of mail from this country all over the world. He said that we could have a letter posted in the United States, and 30 or 40 minutes later have it in a post office in Britain or in Germany or in some other country.

In a semifacetious spirit I said to the witness, "When will it become possible for me, intsead of taking a plane, if I wish to go to Europe, to go down to the National Airport, step onto a launching pad, get in one of these capsules, and be shot to Europe?" With a perfectly straight face he said, "Well, Congressman, that may take as long as 12 to 14 years."

So we can expect, by 1970, if this prediction comes true, that if any of us has business around the world we can simply step into a capsule and be shot there in half an hour. I do not know how inviting a prospect this is to the Members of this body, but as we look around and see what has happened in our own space exploration work during the last few days we realize that what was fantasy of yesterday is fast becoming a reality today.

This has certainly been a very significant week for America's space program. Of course, the flight of the X–15 is not exactly in the space realm, but it was nonetheless a very great achievement. When one flies 25 miles high, many people would say that he was in space. As we learned in our hearings, scientists consider space to begin a good deal beyond that, although there is a great controversy among them as to at exactly what point space starts, and the earth's atmosphere ends.

Yesterday for the first time we retrieved an object from space in the waters of the Pacific off our 50th State, as our distinguished colleague from Hawaii has pointed out.

Today it has been announced that the United States has sent a communications balloon satellite into space, which is larger than any other manmade object ever sent into orbit. It is bouncing back the voice of President Eisenhower. It is soon to bounce back—although I understand this has not yet been done—the voice of our distinguished majority leader. While we all enjoy hearing him in this Chamber, we look forward with even greater interest to hearing his voice from the heavens.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to my friend, if my colleague will permit it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I simply wonder whether this is the first time that the majority leader has been in orbit.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, no. I find that the majority leader is very much in orbit, if being in orbit means that he is zealously active in the performance of his duties. I do not know what the distinguished Senator is going to talk about when he speaks from the heavens, but any word from him from on high will be received, I know, with great interest by all of us. I shall be looking forward to what he has to say. I know it will be said with eloquence, and it will be a great moment for the people of all of the countries which hear his words.

Mr. CARLSON rose.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my colleague permit me to yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from New York for the splendid statement he is making with regard to the progress we have made in space in the last 3, 4, or 5 years. I wonder if the Senator can inform the Senate as to the number of satellites which the United States has in the atmosphere as compared to the number the Soviet Union has at this time?

Mr. KEATING. I believe, Mr. President, that we have 15. The Russians have either two or three.

Mr. SCOTT. It is 15 to 2.

Mr. KEATING. I am informed that the Soviet Union only has two. Therefore, the total count at the present time is 15 to 2. It is still difficult to say who is ahead in the overall race for space.

When the Russians shot their first sputnik into space, there was great argument that the achievement placed Russia ahead in the race for space.

Our country has for many years had a long-range program of space exploration. Since we have 15 satellites circling the earth as compared with 2 of the Soviet's, it seems to me that we could with good reason claim that we are substantially in the lead. My impression is that we are in the lead.

Mr. CARLSON. I wish to state that I well remember, and I believe the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], and our citizens generally will recall, when we were all not only caught off our base but also off our feet by the sputnik. We were somewhat criticized for not being more active and alert in that field. I believe it is now proven that our Nation, when it determines to do something, can do it. We have done it in this instance, and I have no fear that we ever need be behind the Soviet Union or any other nation.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am grateful to my friend from Kansas for those observations. They are certainly correct.

I have additional information that in all we have sent 25 satellites into orbit, as compared to 7 sent into orbit by the Russians. Of course, the development of these complex machines is a long-range program.

It is true, of course, that right after World War II the Russians got into this field of activity at once. We delayed for years until somewhere around 1953 before we made any effort of a substantial kind in that field. A long leadtime is required, and we have cut down the projected leadtime greatly. I refer to objects such as the large balloon that was just put up and which reflected the voices of both President Eisenhower and the majority leader. I am sure 2 years ago, before these achievements which we are now discussing, if I had asked scientists about stepping into a capsule and being shot to Europe, experts would have placed the time for such an achievement far beyond 1960.

All efforts in that field have been expedited under the diligent work of our new space agency and the Department of Defense, all of which is under the authority of our President, who I am certain feels that we not only must secure priority over any other nation in the world, but we must also maintain that priority. Today in this field, as in defense, we are second to none. We must remain second to none, and that must be the primary achievement and the most important function which our executive branch and our legislative branch can by cooperative effort achieve.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I ask my friend, the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], whether it is not a fact that from the time the Russians put the first sputnik into orbit the question has been not so much who can put a satellite into orbit or what nation can put the most satellites into orbit, but rather who can control the satellite and bring it back to earth under control. Has that not always been the big question, and is not the fact that we brought one of these satellites back safely this past week the greatest achievement that has thus far been attained in that direction?

Mr. KEATING. Many would say so, I believe. The ability to bring the satellite back is extremely important. That achievement, of course, bears on the later projected plan of a man being sent into space and brought back safely.

The mechanism and equipment which are placed in satellites and the facts which they reveal to us are of the highest importance. I speak now not of military efforts, but of peacetime effort, because achievements in space are in an area from which not only our country but all nations of the world can derive valuable scientific information to stimulate the minds of men to new and even more imaginative and fruitful lines of endeavor.

We now have the ability to broadcast a radio program and have it heard in New Delhi. The majority leader, in Washington, might next year appear on TV and be seen in Hong Kong or in some other area via a space vehicle. There can be further achievements in telephonic communications by satellites and there are, of course, other great possibilities that may be derived from the exploration which is now taking place.

The mechanisms contained in our space capsules and the ability to place the satellite in space and bring it back safely, are of great significance.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to my colleague from Hawaii.

Mr. FONG. I should like to commend the Senator from New York for his intelligent and lucid discussion of this very interesting and fantastic subject. I should like to add a few remarks to the discussion.

Yesterday I commended our scientists, engineers, airmen and sailors for recovering the space capsule about 300 miles from Hawaii. In the afternoon paper I read that the United States had shot a plastic balloon into space which is whirling around at the speed of approximately 16,000 miles an hour. This is a very interesting subject for me, because I live in Honolulu, approximately 5,000 miles away, and after reading the article I could foresee myself catching an airplane, shooting up into space, tying myself to that balloon, and dropping off in Honolulu within 20 minutes. It seems such an achievement is possible, and I would like to commend all the forces that have been able to make this possible.

Mr. President, a few weeks ago, in recognition of the admission of Hawaii into the Union, the United States added another star to its flag.

Yesterday the United States put a new star in the firmament.

A plastic balloon 10 stories high, its skin half as thin as the cellophane around a package of cigarettes, our newest satellite Echo I, scored another dramatic "first" for the United States in the space race.

This was the second such "first" in 2 days, preceded 1 day earlier by the recovery of a 300-pound space capsule, to which I alluded, in the Pacific off the Hawaiian Islands.

Echo I is the largest manmade object ever put into orbit.

It is as bright as the brightest star in the Universe and seven times as bright as the North Star.

It is visible to the naked eye and, on any clear night in the next 2 weeks, at least, can be seen as far north as the United States-Canadian border and as far south as the tip of South America.

Here for those who have been tempted to relegate America to second place in scientific achievements is tangible, visible evidence of our space progress.

One can only conjecture on the reaction of those on the high seas who watch America's new star moving across the night sky, or of the desert nomads who travel by night to escape the day's heat and guide themselves by the constellations, or of the people behind the Iron and Bamboo Curtains, if their rulers dare inform them of our achievement. I feel sure of one thing, however, and that is, that Echo I will raise America's prestige everywhere.

President Eisenhower already has assured the world that such satellites as the Echo I are for peaceful purposes, and he has invited other nations to conduct communications experiments using it. At this moment, we can only dimly perceive the ultimate benefits to global telephone communications and television which Echo I portends. We can only hope it will also be an instrument to create greater understanding among the peoples of the world, thereby advancing peaceful relations.

Mr. President, all Americans can join with pride in congratulating our civilian space agency and the industry team responsible for this unique achievement. Not only have they advanced scientific knowledge; they have also elevated U.S. prestige all over the world.

Mr. President, 1960 has been a year of fantastic scientific and technological achievement for the United States. An atomic submarine traveled around the world completely submerged. We launched the first ballistic missile ever shot from beneath the ocean's surface. We recovered a manmade object from its orbit in outer space. We launched the largest and the brightest satellite ever put into orbit in outer space. We shot an intercontinental ballistic missile farther than had any other nation and landed it on target. Only yesterday, one of our test pilots rode the X–15 rocket ship to a record height of nearly 25 miles.

I am sure I have not exhausted the list of amazing accomplishments of the United States in science and technology, but what I have listed is impressive indeed. In America, it seems the miraculous is becoming commonplace.

I trust those who take delight in belittling the United States will join with the rest of us in praising our workers for their perseverance, dedication to duty, and genius. Let us all take heart and work harder than ever to see that America stays in the forefront in science and technology.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point two articles from the Washington Evening Star of last night dealing with the Echo I satellite and the X–15 flight.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Aug. 13, 1960]

X–15 PILOT CLIMBS RECORD 24 MILES—ROCKET PLANE SCORES MAN'S HIGHEST FLIGHT

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, CALIF., August 12.—The X–15 today rocketed an Air Force test pilot more than 24 miles skyward, man's highest flight yet. The new record: 131,000 feet.

Maj. Robert M. White, in the same plane that set a world speed mark of 2,196 m.p.h. last week, pointed the sleek black dart up at an angle of 51° and let its mighty twin engines roar all out until his fuel was exhausted.

The 4-minute burst vaulted him to the nearly airless edge of space, where he arced weightless for a few seconds before plummeting back.

"FANTASTIC UP HERE"

At the peak of his climb, Major White radioed back:

"This is really fantastic up here."

The old mark was 126,200 feet, nearly 24 miles, set by Capt. Iven C. Kincheloe here

September 7, 1956, in the ill-fated X–2 rocket ship. It later crashed while setting a mark of 2,094 m.p.h. Captain Kincheloe was killed in a fighter plane crash.

Records by experimental planes are unofficial. The official mark is 103,395 feet, set by Capt. Joe Jordan last December 14 in an F–104C jet.

Back on the ground, Major White said that at the peak of his climb, "I was impressed by the feeling of altitude—the height above ground. At the altitude at which I normally fly, 40,000 to 50,000 feet, I can see, oh, maybe, hundreds of square miles. This time I took in 10 times that much."

WHAT'S IT LIKE?

What's the sky like at 131,000 feet?

"It wasn't exactly night but there was a very distinct contrast—a very deep blue—your view encompasses three distinct bands—the earth, the light blue of the sky and then the very deep blue of extreme altitude. It was very impressive."

Major White said he thinks the X–15 could go higher with its present power plant.

The X–15 was dropped at 45,000 feet from a B–52 mother ship at 8:45 a.m. Major White ignited eight rocket barrels and within seconds soared out of range of ground observers with field glasses.

FLIGHT LASTS ONLY MINUTES

Minutes later the ship reappeared, a tiny dot in the vast expanse of desert sky, and came down in a spiral glide for a 200-mile-per-hour landing on the hard mud surface of Rogers Dry Lake at 8:59 a.m. Its steel skids kicked up a mile-long plume of dust on what serves as this test center's runway.

Major White's maximum speed today, compared with Joe Walker's record 2,196 miles per hour last week, was 1,700 miles per hour. In setting his speed record Mr. Walker, ace test pilot for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, climbed to 78,000 feet, then went into a shallow dive to become the fastest human.

Major White reserved all his power for the zooming climb.

At 8:52 a.m., Major White radioed that he was passing 126,200 feet—the old record—and still climbing. One minute later he radioed he was back at 125,000 and descending.

As the X–15 dove earthward, at about 40,000 feet there was a series of unusually thunderous sonic booms—about five. Two were really sharp, sounding like cannons. Some may have come from the X–15's chase planes.

The X–15, when an engine three times more powerful is installed later this year, is expected to go 4,000 miles per hour to altitudes between 50 and 100 miles.

Major White, 36, and Mr. Walker, 39, have been trading off on the development flights.

This was Major White's fourth time at the controls. He has nearly 5,000 hours of flight time, including 52 wartime missions, and spent time in German prison camps after his Mustang fighter was shot down.

ECHO I BOUNCES CLEAR MESSAGE BY PRESIDENT—INFLATED SPHERE OPENS NEW ERA IN COMMUNICATION

CAPE CANAVERAL, FLA., August 12.—The United States sent a giant communications satellite into orbit high above the earth today and quickly signaled its success by bouncing a message from President Eisenhower across the Nation.

The new space messenger, a balloon high as a 10-story building, was rocketed up from this missile test center at 5:39 a.m. (e.d.t.).

A little over 2 hours later the National Aeronautics and Space Administration announced it was successfully in orbit.

Then at 9:10 a.m. (e.d.t.), less than 4 hours after launching, the recorded message from the President was played back at a news conference in Washington.

The message came back loud and clear when received at Holmdel, N.J., after being sent from Goldstone, Calif.

TEXT OF MESSAGE

It said:

"This is President Eisenhower speaking.

"It is a great personal satisfaction to participate in this first experiment in communications involving the use of a satellite balloon known as Echo.

"This is one more significant step in the U.S. program of space research and exploration.

"The program is being carried forward vigorously by the United States for peaceful purposes for the benefit of all mankind.

"The satellite balloon which has reflected these words may be used freely by any nation for similar experiments in its own interests.

"Information necessary to prepare for such participation was widely distributed some weeks ago.

"The United States will continue to make freely available to the world the scientific information acquired from this and other experiments in its program of space exploration."

SIGHTED ON PACIFIC COAST

The recording was broadcast to the satellite on its first sweep around the earth.

T. Keith Glennan, NASA Administrator, described the Echo launching as "well nigh perfect."

The fact that the satellite was in successful orbit had been confirmed by both telemetry and visual sighting.

Observers on the Pacific coast reported that in the early morning darkness it shone some seven times brighter than the North Star.

Mr. Glennan gave the new satellite the name of Echo I.

John W. Townsend, NASA's Assistant Director for Space Sciences, said the first reported sighting of the new satellite was from Woomera, Australia.

MARYLAND HEARS SIGNALS

A radio blackout prevented planned contact earlier with an observing station in South Africa.

The next positive contact was at Goldstone, where the satellite was picked up optically and by radio signals. Shortly thereafter a station at Blossom Point, Md., picked up tracking signals from tiny transmitters attached to the balloon.

Mr. Glennan and his deputy, Hugh L. Dryden, went to the White House to play for the President a tape recording of his message. They were obviously elated over the performance.

Dr. Abe Silverstein, director of NASA's space flight program, said Echo I is in orbit between the altitudes of 1,018 and 1,160 miles. The exact time of orbit is 121.6 minutes, or less than 2 minutes off the planned time of 2 hours.

William J. O'Sullivan, designer of the satellite, said it will be visible all night, not merely at dusk or dawn, for the next couple of weeks.

Mr. O'Sullivan, head of the space vehicles group at the Langley Research Center at Hampton, Va., explained that the satellite is high enough and so inclined in its orbit that it will remain in continuous sunlight. However, it will be difficult to see in daytime because of the brightness of the sky.

Mr. O'Sullivan said Echo I is as bright as the star Vega, brightest star in the sky.

LIFETIME OF 1 YEAR SEEN

Mr. Townsend said the satellite should be visible on four passes over the United States tonight. He forecast a lifetime of about 1 year before such factors as air drag and the effects of solar radiation bring the balloon down.

Micrometeorite punctures, allowing escape of some of the gas that inflated the balloon after it reached orbit level, may also affect it.

Scientists are a bit worried too about whether and how much the sphere may be deflated as it runs through the dark spaces later.

Dr. Silverstein disclosed that other radio relay experiments are under way in addition to those involving Goldstone and Holmdel.

The Air Force is bouncing signals by means of Echo I to Millstone, N.H., and Collins Radio Co. is experimenting similarly between Texas and Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

BIG DISTANCES POSSIBLE

Dr. Silverstein said Echo I could just as easily relay signals between New Jersey and London as between New Jersey and California.

He added that if such a satellite is placed high enough, it could be used for transmission one-third the distance around the earth.

NASA said the satellite's speed at apogee of 1,160 miles is 15,442 miles an hour, while its speed at the low point of the orbit, 1,018 miles above the earth, is 15,884 miles an hour. These speeds are within 30 miles an hour of what was planned for the big balloon.

The 100-foot sphere was designed to prove the feasibility of using satellites for worldwide telephone, radio and television systems.

The big ball is the largest, but not the heaviest satellite ever sent aloft.

Attempts early Tuesday and Wednesday to orbit the big balloon were postponed because of technical problems with the booster rocket. The first effort to launch an Echo satellite failed last May 13 because of a malfunction of small helium jets designed to help control the flight of the Thor-Delta.

The main experiment will be exchanges of signals and messages between Bell Telephone's Holmdel, N.J., laboratories and NASA's tracking station at Goldstone, Calif. These two stations warmed up for the try last week by successfully communicating via the moon.

NASA described the launching as a first step in the use of passive satellites for faster, more reliable and cheaper communications. Echo I is called passive because it was designed to reflect rather than transmit radio waves.

Here is what happened as the balloon inflated:

At an altitude of about 1,000 miles, a small explosive charge split a magnesium container and ejected a bundle of plastic sheeting. Pockets of air trapped in the balloon began inflating it in the vacuum of space. Gases produced by 30 pounds of sublimating powders blossomed the sphere to its full size.

Inflated, the sphere weighs 137.4 pounds. Its plastic skin is .0005-inch thick—about half the thickness of the plastic wrapping on a cigarette package.

The launching was timed so Echo I would remain in continuous sunlight for about 2 weeks. After that, the satellite's orbit and the earth's rotation about the sun would be such that the balloon would be in the earth's shadow. Once out of the sun's warmth, the gases inside would revert to a solid state. The sphere would become misshapen and perhaps collapse. Even if it collapsed, it would continue to orbit until dragged down and burned by atmospheric friction.

The satellite was aimed at a course that would take it over all sections of the world between 47° north and south latitudes. This 7,500-mile-wide band includes most of the populated areas of the world except Canada, Alaska and Northern Europe.

ECHO I VOICE IMPRESSES PRESIDENT

President Eisenhower, beaming and smiling, listened today to his own voice bounced back from Echo I, the U.S. balloon satellite.

"Fine—I'm delighted," he said in comment on success of the experiment.

Mr. Eisenhower May 4 had made a recording to be used in the experiment. This was beamed to the balloon and the reflected signals picked up in an "Echo" recording.

U.S. space officials took the recording to the White House and played it for Mr. Eisenhower during a meeting of the National Security Council.

T. Keith Glennan, head of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, said the President's voice came through so loud and clear that Mr. Eisenhower at first seemed not to realize it had been sent to the satellite and back.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I note that the Senator from New York said he did not know what it was that the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] had said in his message which was broadcast via the Echo satellite. The Senator from Texas is the chairman of the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. I am fortunate to have before me the text of his statement which was broadcast from Echo I. I should like to read it into the RECORD. It consists of only three short paragraphs. Senator JOHNSON of Texas said:

The American people and freedom-loving people all over the world should be proud of this great space experiment. There can be no question but the day will come and in the not too distant future when one man, one program can be seen and heard simultaneously in every living room of the world.

Let us all continue to work to see that these new means of communication replace suspicion with understanding, hostility and isolation with cooperation, and ignorance with free exchange of knowledge.

The Congress sends its congratulations to all those who have made this possible.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, that is a fine message, and it certainly should be placed in the RECORD.

I might add, while we are on the subject, that it is worthy of note that the successful recovery of the capsule of the Discoverer satellite provides an illustration of the wisdom of the action taken by Congress in increasing the 1961 appropriations for this project. We increased it $15.1 million, as requested in the President's budget in January, to $50 million. Fortunately the administration now plans to use the additional $35 million provided by Congress. This shows the wisdom of having made these additional funds available, funds which are making it possible for us to move ahead more rapidly. All of us are certainly happy that we are making such progress.

Mr. KEATING. I am very happy the distinguished Senator from Connecticut has given us the benefit of the statement of our majority leader from outer space. I was also very much interested in the comments of our distinguished friend from Hawaii [Mr. FONG]. It is my hope that those who are in charge of our space projects will give very serious thought to having the voice of my distinguished friend from Hawaii bounced off a satellite and received on radio sets all over the world.

I was in the Far East a short time after he made a trip there. I know what a remarkable job he has done for our country throughout the world. In my opinion it would be a splendid thing for us and for the people of Asia and for the peoples of the whole world to hear U.S. Senator HIRAM FONG speaking for America from outer space, in connection with our historic and extremely successful space research programs.

We must always remember that this world is made up of a great many different kinds of people and that language—even more than space—is a barrier we must contend with. I say this now in no disparagement whatever of the very eloquent words of our distinguished friend from Texas. The words "living room" which were used in his message are unknown by probably more millions in this world than those who are familiar with the words and their very common meaning to us.

To sum up, it seems to me very important that we endeavor to strengthen through our space exploration, not only our military position, but also our position idealistically with regard to other nations of the world, as has been so eloquently expressed in the words of President Eisenhower and in the words of the majority leader, from outer space. I hope that next year we will be able to hear in this same way from the distinguished senior Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. FONG. I thank the distinguished Senator from New York for his very complimentary remarks. I rather relish the idea of having my voice sounded out of space. I look forward to the day when the Senator and I will be able to glide through space and drop off somewhere in Asia.

Mr. KEATING. I thank my friend. I am very grateful to my colleague from New York for yielding me much more time than I had anticipated taking.

I think the news of this morning has been wonderful and encouraging, and I know it is reassuring to all Americans.

Our efforts to conquer space are going forward at an astoundingly rapid pace. We are making progress and this is just the beginning.

What the future holds, no one knows. But, one thing is certain, the dedicated efforts of America's scientists backed by the vigorous and enthusiastic support of the American people make it absolutely clear that the United States will play a very large role in the space age—an age which is just beginning and which will greatly affect the lives of every person alive.

Mr. President, I salute the ingenuity and ability of the many American scientists who have made Echo I, the balloon satellite now orbiting the world, the earth, and the many satellites which came before it. I want today to give special recognition to the man in charge of this project, Dr. John Robinson Pierce.

I ask unanimous consent that a very excellent column about this very brilliant and engaging space researcher which appeared in this morning's New York Times be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 13, 1960]

SATELLITE SCIENTIST: JOHN ROBINSON PIERCE

"Woomera has it," cried the loudspeakers early yesterday at the Bell Telephone Laboratories in Holmdel, N.J. A skinny 125-pound scientist with sandy, receding hair gulped his coffee and doughnut and started jumping up and down, his spectacles jiggling on his nose. Recovering he picked up a phone and called his wife. "It's in orbit," he told her. Word that Woomera, a satellite-tracking station in Australia, had picked up Echo I meant the triumph of a concept that first dawned in the mind of Dr. John Robinson Pierce more than 6 years ago.

In 1954, 3 years before the Russians orbited the first manmade satellite, Dr. Pierce began thinking about the possibility of using a satellite as a communications-relaying device.

His first concrete proposals for satellite communications were published in 1955 in the journal Jet Propulsion. Late in 1958 he learned that the National Aeronautics and Space Administration was experimenting with the manufacture of large balloon satellites. But the agency was not thinking in terms of a communications satellite. What it sought was a device to measure air resistance.

PROUD OF ASSOCIATE

Dr. Pierce, who is director of research in communications principles for Bell Telephone, changed the whole concept of the project. Early last year he and Dr. Rudolph Kompfner, director of electronic research at Bell, drew up plans that were approved and work on the project was begun.

Dr. Kompfner, an Austrian physicist who had invented the traveling wave tube, was brought to Bell largely through the efforts of Dr. Pierce.

"It's one of the things I'm proudest of," Dr. Pierce said yesterday.

He stayed on at Holmdel until Echo I was sighted by Goldstone, a west coast station. He waited and heard the President's message come booming back. Then he drove 35 miles to his home on McMane Avenue, Berkeley Heights, N.J. After resting briefly he went out to paint the garage.

By that time Government officials and scientists were acclaiming the feat. Dr. William O. Baker, vice president in charge of research at Bell, called it the most practical exploitation of space technology yet achieved.

Dr. Pierce was more restrained. Echo I was "something of practical importance," he conceded, and it put the United States ahead of the Soviet Union in this field. Space communication is vastly more important to the United States than to the Russians, he said.

Our transocean message traffic is heavier and since oversea radio communication is vastly more difficult than overland, it is natural that we should lead Russia in devising a relay satellite, he explained.

QUOTES THOREAU

It was not necessary to copy the Russians in everything, he added, recalling Thoreau's observation in "Walden":

"If a man does not keep pace with his companions perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer. Let him step to the music which he hears, however measured or far away."

"Maybe we are listening to another drummer," Dr. Pierce said.

He was born in Des Moines, Iowa, March 27, 1910, the son of a wholesale milliner, John Star Pierce, who now lives in Pasadena. The family retired to California. John attended Woodrow Wilson High School in Long Beach. Good marks in chemistry and mathematics prompted him to enter California Institute of Technology.

"I wanted to be a chemical engineer but 1 year at Cal Tech convinced me I was no good at chemistry," he said. Then I thought I'd be an aeronautical engineer. But I got bored drawing rivets.

He went over to electronics. He stayed on at Cal Tech for 3 years of postgraduate work and after getting his doctor of philosophy in 1936 he accepted a job offer from Bell in New York.

Throughout his years at Bell, Dr. Pierce specialized in work on electronic tubes and microwave research. In World War II he concentrated on development of electronic devices for military use. He holds 55 patents for inventions in electronic tubes and communication circuits.

His most important contribution was a reflex klystron, a type of microwave tube used in radar. "I made one by accident," he recalled yesterday. "While working on an amplifier I applied the voltage and made an oscillator."

Under the pseudonym J. J. Coupling, Dr. Pierce has written seven science fiction articles. The first, written during his high school days, concerned the capture and carrying away of the Woolworth Building by a space ship.

He is also the author of three technical books and coauthor with Edward E. David, Jr., director of visual and acoustics research at Bell, of "Man's World of Sound," a history of experimentation in acoustics research.

Dr. Pierce, is married to Martha Peacock, a New York social worker. They have two children, John Jeremy Pierce, 18, a student at the University of Missouri, and Elizabeth Anne Pierce, 15.

His only recreation is reading. Back in California he built and flew gliders but gave it up after five persons he knew were killed in glider accidents.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I shall yield to the Senator from Wisconsin in a moment. Before doing so I should like to add a word myself on the space developments which have been commentated on so very eloquently by a number of Senators, led by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and by my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING].

This is a source of great gratification to us all, of course, as they have so properly stated, and it marks a real triumph for American technical skill and American scientific effort.

I do not feel that any American will wish to be smug about this fact. What we are doing, in the finest sense, is trying to assure all mankind of greater opportunities and our country's true leadership toward the enfranchisement of man and an increase of its limitless horizons, for which we have been known throughout our history.

I say that for this reason. The Senate ratified, the other day, the Antarctic Treaty, which, it seems to me, was most significant, historically, in charting a course for us in respect to international action. It involved our sovereignty, or our claims of imposing sovereignty, upon unexplored areas, which is very apposite to our discussion about outer space.

I hope very much that we take our leadership in this field, which has been commented upon so eloquently today, in that same spirit, knowing that the use of it for the greatest benefit of mankind will represent the use of it for the greatest benefit of the people of the United States, and that we may redouble, simply by virtue of this assertion of scientific preeminence, our efforts in the United Nations to attain some kind of internationalization of outer space, which we have so very proudly put in the process of attainment through our ratification of the Antarctic Treaty.

This is the way in which man has to go in these new frontiers. These achievements should not be used as a threat to anyone, but as a blessing for all mankind.

I add that as, I think, a necessary footnote to the splendid tributes which have been paid to American scientific effort today.

Finally, this achievement also demonstrates what a crash effort in terms of national will, and in terms of money, can mean.

I hope we will remember this fact in other respects; as, for example, in the triumph of the ideas of freedom, in winning the cold war—that it takes money, concentration of effort, and skilled means in order to attain so great an objective as this; and that we will not hear the counsels of timidity when it comes to breaking the frontier of man's mind, to the same effect, with the same vigor, and tremendously gratifying success with which we have been enabled to break the frontiers of the material world.

I thank my colleague for his indulgence. I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am grateful to the distinguished Senator from New York. I join in the fine ideas which have been set forth here this morning in relation to the distinguished Senator from Hawaii. From the very beginning of his service in the Senate, he has demonstrated a friendliness and understanding which has added, let us say, to the level headedness of all of us.

I am grateful, indeed, for the fine words which have been attributed to him.

Also, yesterday was, as has been stated so eloquently by the two distinguished Senators from New York, a big day for Uncle Sam and the world. We have again demonstrated our know-how. The four great accomplishments of yesterday mark yesterday as a day for celebration almost as important as the Fourth of July, if you please.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, before the discussion on space is terminated, I should like to join with other Senators in the suggestion that the voice of the distinguished senior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. FONG] be broadcast to the world. I can think of few things which would be more revealing to the world as to the splendor of our free society than to have his voice, with his background, he coming from the newest State in the Union, broadcast to all the world. I hope that will happen.

TRIBUTE TO CAPT. EDWARD A. ANDERSON, MEDICAL CORPS, U.S. NAVY

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, we have thrilled in the Senate today with praises for the performance of the world's largest, most visible satellite, the communications relay, Echo the first.

What we have in mind, of course, is not just the satellite itself. We are paying tribute to the minds of men, their talents and their devotion, their dedication to our Government's purpose to serve all mankind.

I join in all this praise; and it is my privilege today to pay further tribute to men in the service of our Government. Their product does not soar into outer space—it is confined to our little State of Rhode Island. It is not world shaking—it is only lifesaving. But it is in the same pattern of service to mankind; and, I repeat, it is a privilege to present this tribute at the same hour that we so properly and so proudly echo the praises of all American men of science and service.

On June 8, 1960, my State of Rhode Island reported its first case of polio this year. A month later—on Saturday, July 9—the newspapers carried the headlines, "Rhode Island's 33 Polio Cases Termed Moderate Epidemic."

The advent of the Salk vaccine may have robbed dread polio of something of its terror. But human memories of the past, and shared concern for each individual case of the present, are enough to call for marshaling every medical means and method to meet any polio threat.

Rhode Island cases have risen to 79, but now with 1 case only reported in a week the situation is termed "encouraging," though conservative authorities withhold any rosier estimate. There has been no panic. The people of Rhode Island have responded in concerted and orderly manner to protect themselves and their neighbors by mass inoculation.

The calmness of the people in large measure has been due to the able and adequate clinics and treatment available everywhere. Perhaps much of the calmness and the extent of the immunization was due to a new method of inoculation—the hypospray injector. This is simple, more rapid, and just as efficient as the classical syringe and needle—and apparently the "jet" does not conjure up the old fears of the "shot lines."

Rhode Island became acquainted with the jet injector because it became acquainted with its exponent—Capt. Edward A. Anderson of the Medical Corps of the U.S. Navy, senior medical officer at our Quonset Point Naval Air Station.

On Wednesday evening, August 10, at the hands of grateful Rhode Island citizens, Captain Anderson received the Gold Medal of Honor of the U.S. Volunteer Life Savings Corps. It is one of several presentations and citations that the captain has received—to say nothing of the prayerful appreciation in the hearts of all Rhode Island.

We honor him for his volunteer work in administering more than 110,000 shots of Salk vaccine in our State through these fateful weeks. Captain Anderson has made "hypospray" a household word in our State.

On just 1 day—July 14—in just one free clinic, Dr. Anderson and his crew inoculated 11,108 individuals. July 14 was a rainy day—with torrential rains. It poured all day long—yet all day long the people waited in a line the length of 2 city blocks—waited in the rain—11,108 of them.

The previous record for mass inoculations in a single day was 9,500. That was for an epidemic in Africa—and the doctor there was Captain Anderson.

July 14 was almost an anniversary for the doctor. On July 16, 1938, he was commissioned a lieutenant in the Medical Corps of the U.S. Navy. That followed upon his graduation from the University of Iowa School of Medicine. This son of Iowa was then assigned to California—and next to Hawaii. December 7, 1941, found him junior medical officer on the U.S.S. Oklahoma—doomed to be sunk on that day of perfidy.

For extremely meritorious service that day, Lieutenant Anderson is entitled to the Ribbon for Navy Unit Commendation awarded the naval hospital at Pearl Harbor.

Service around the world followed until June 15, 1959, found him returning to the Quonset Point Naval Airbase in Rhode Island as senior medical officer. I say, "returning" because for 6 months in 1943 he had a term at Quonset, long enough to form an attachment for our State. Dr. Anderson was given temporary additional duty with the International Cooperation Administration. For them he so fought to halt a yellow fever epidemic in Sudan, Africa, as to be awarded a letter of commendation with ribbon and medal pendant by the Secretary of the Navy.

Let me quote from that citation:

Fighting to halt a yellow fever epidemic in Sudan, Africa, Captain Anderson was responsible for saving the lives of numerous Sudanese by his mass inoculation program. Through his effectiveness in organizing and operating the inoculation units, he provided the necessary leadership to the professional medical people of the Sudan so that they could carry on with their own program. Captain Anderson's marked professional ability and inspiring devotion to duty were in keeping with the highest traditions of the U.S. naval service.

Further awards to Captain Anderson are the American Defense Service Medal, Fleet Clasp; the Asiatic-Pacific Campaign Medal; the European-African Middle Eastern Campaign Medal; American Campaign Medal; World War Two Victory Medal; Navy Occupation Service Medal, Europe Clasp; and the National Defense Service Medal.

Thousands and thousands of the new little friends of Captain Anderson are too young to understand what all those decorations mean. But he can have no commendation more precious than the confidence his gentleness inspired in them—nor citation greater than the gratitude that goes out to him from all of us of Rhode Island.

It is a gratitude that goes to all his five-man crew of Navy assistants. They helped to run clinics in every part of the State of Rhode Island. Let me name these men: Lts. (jg.) Roy Tandy, Adrien Lee, Donald A. Cusick, R. P. Rasmussen, and Donald C. McGuire.

To speak of these men and their senior let me borrow a sentence from the citation of the Secretary of the Navy: "Their professional ability and inspiring devotion to duty were in keeping with the highest traditions of the U.S. naval service."

We add the names of all these to the illustrious performance of all the medical men of Rhode Island, the nurses, the hospitals, the clinics, the newspapers, radio and television stations, the public officials and countless individuals who gave a demonstration of community concern and cooperation not surpassed in my recollection.

I speak for all those who have been the beneficiaries of the skill, devotion, and labors dedicated to serve in the critical period we have experienced.

Their service is an immortal chapter in the history of Rhode Island.

It is written in our hearts.

COMMENDATION OF J. EDGAR HOOVER

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I received a letter today from Laurel E. Kapke, secretary-treasurer of the Wisconsin Chapter of the FBI National Academy Associates. He enclosed the text of a resolution of the Wisconsin Chapter of the FBI National Academy Associates commending J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Among other things, Mr. Kapke said:

I am sure you will be interested in this action taken by our organization, reflecting the high esteem in which Mr. Hoover is held by the association, for his contribution to law enforcement.

I observed the other day, when someone inquired about what would happen to J. Edgar Hoover in the new administration, that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] said that if he were elected President, he would keep Mr. Hoover on the job. That is good news. I believe the country really respects statements of that kind, because such a position goes to the very essence of maintaining good government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter and resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN FBI
NATIONAL ACADEMY ASSOCIATION,
August 10, 1960.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MR. WILEY: Enclosed is a copy of a resolution of the Wisconsin Chapter of the FBI National Academy Associates, commending Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

I am sure you will be interested in this action taken by our organization, reflecting the high esteem in which Mr. Hoover is held by the association, for his contribution to law enforcement.

Respectfully submitted.

FBI NATIONAL ACADEMY ASSOCIATES RESOLUTION OF WISCONSIN CHAPTER, MARINETTE, WIS., JUNE 22–24, 1960

Whereas, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, recognized a need for professionalizing law enforcement by making available to the Nation's police officers up-to-date training in basic law-enforcement techniques and by keeping them abreast of rapidly developing new ideas in the field; and

Whereas he realized the desirability of training police administrators and instructors throughout the Nation in a practically run, comprehensive course of instruction so that these men could, in turn, pass on their findings to the officers in their departments throughout the Nation; and

Whereas in order to implement his ideas in this respect, he directed his associates in the Federal Bureau of Investigation to set up the training facilities and gather together the best available instructors in each field of police science; and

Whereas since July 29, 1935, when the first class of instruction of FBI National Academy was convened at Washington, D.C., there have been 3,878 carefully selected officers complete the 12-week training period, and then return to their communities to pass on their new-found information; and

Whereas the net results have been to vastly improve the standards of law enforcement throughout this country and abroad, promote cooperation between law-enforcement agencies, no matter how widely separated, professionalize the Nation's corps of peace officers, and effectively combat the hordes of criminals preying on the citizens of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Wisconsin Chapter of the FBI National Academy Associates, meeting in Marinette, Wis., June 22–24, 1960, at their 18th annual retraining session, That the Honorable J. Edgar Hoover is to be heartily congratulated and sincerely thanked on this, the 25th anniversary of the FBI National Academy; be it further

Resolved, That we in the Wisconsin chapter, on our own behalf and on behalf of the citizens of Wisconsin, who with their counterparts throughout the United States are the ultimate beneficiaries, do heartily congratulate Mr. Hoover personally for his farsightedness in causing to be established the finest police training academy in the world, and thank him and the many men and women of the FBI who have contributed their talents and efforts; and be it further

Resolved, that Mr. Hoover be commended by the Wisconsin Chapter of the FBI National Academy Associates for the preeminent position which he and the FBI have earned in the field of law enforcement training, this commendation being coupled with the sincere hope and good wishes for many more fruitful years of service to these United States and their citizens; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Attorney General of the United States, and the Governor of Wisconsin; and the chapter secretary is so instructed on this 24th day of June 1960.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am most desirous to proceed with a speech I desire to make on the minimum wage bill and to make some observations as to what has been advertised in the press as a war of nerves in respect to the bill. Before doing so, I should like to accommodate the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who has an appointment he desires to keep. I yield to him for 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. I appreciate very much the courtesy of my friend, the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. President, since the Senate reconvened we have heard a great deal about civil rights. This morning, I desire to propose a procedure by which at least some civil-rights legislation could be enacted at this session without in any way obstructing the work of the Senate on other measures. I must say this idea was suggested to some degree yesterday by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]; but I should like to elaborate upon it.

I believe the minimum enactment of civil-rights legislation can be accomplished if the Democratic leadership, and the majority party, will give their firm support and their united strength to at least a small portion of the civil-rights platform; which was adopted at the Democratic National Convention, was approved by their candidates for President and Vice President, and is part of the platform upon which their party must run.

Only last Tuesday, August 9, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the minority leader, offered on behalf of the minority a minimum civil rights proposal. The first section offered by him would provide statutory authority to continue the voluntary efforts to secure equal rights in employment for Negroes and all other groups, in connection with Government contracts. Thus far, this work has been undertaken by an informal committee under the leadership of Vice President NIXON.

The second section offered by the minority leader, would provide technical assistance to school districts which are attempting to desegregate their schools under the mandate of the Supreme Court in the Brown case.

These proposals were considered and debated at length this year, at the time when the civil rights bill proposed by President Eisenhower was before the Congress.

Yet, Mr. President, when this minimum proposal was made on last Tuesday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the minority leader, the Democratic majority quickly moved to lay the bill on the table—thus cutting off debate and killing, at least for a time, the civil rights proposals made by the Senator from Illinois on behalf of the minority.

Mr. President, 52 members of the majority voted then to kill that proposed legislation by laying it on the table, including the majority party's candidates for President and for Vice President. Four members of the majority party joined with 24 members of the minority, the Republican Party, in voting against the motion and therefore to support these civil rights provisions.

The press seems to have approved rather uncritically the argument advanced by the Democratic majority—namely, that the proposed civil-rights legislation should not be allowed to obstruct congressional action on other important measures. I think that both the press and the Democratic leadership should go further and look more deeply into this issue.

I now propose a method—suggested yesterday by the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]—which I believe could assure the passage of at least the very minimum civil-rights proposal made last Tuesday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], on behalf of the Republican minority. It is a method by which the Democratic majority and its leadership can assure to the country their united support of their party's platform, adopted at Los Angeles.

So I propose the following: Let the two proposals which were laid on the table last Tuesday be brought again before the Senate. Let the majority join with the Republican minority in the motion to place those proposals on the calendar, and let them join in a vote to bring up, by motion, those proposals for Senate consideration and for a vote.

Then, after reasonable time for debate—and I do not believe it would need to be very long, for I consider that they were debated at length earlier this year—let the majority, including its leaders, join in a petition to invoke cloture. And let them join in supporting, by their votes, a motion to invoke cloture. If that is done, these two proposals could quickly be voted on.

I know that many Senators on both sides of the aisle have faithfully and consistently supported measures to give equal rights to all our citizens. I do not in any way detract from their support. Yet, it is a fact that civil-rights steps have been taken by President Eisenhower in all these fields. It is a fact that the 1957 civil rights bill came before the Senate because the then Republican leader, Senator Knowland of California, moved that the bill be placed on the calendar rather than sent to committee, where it would have died. It is also a fact that the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the Senator from New York [Mr JAVITS] insisted that the majority leader, the Senator from Texas, agree that a civil rights bill be brought before the Senate for consideration in February of this year.

My proposal offers a sensible way to secure a vote on the proposed civil rights legislation without incurring the charge that it is obstructing the other work of the Senate at this session. My proposal offers a way—and I wish to make this point very clear—to test the position of the majority party on the glowing promises made in its civil rights platform adopted at Los Angeles. My proposal offers a way to test the position of the leadership of the majority party.

As I have said, my proposal is a way by which the Senate can say to the country that equal rights measures for all citizens are important—as important as the other measures before us, and, I believe, actually more important than some of the other measures we shall have to consider at this session.

I offer this proposal as a precise way by which we can test the willingness of the Senate, and certainly the willingness of the majority, to act upon minimum civil rights legislation—and to do so in such a way that it cannot be said—as it is now said—that our consideration of, and our action on, such proposed legislation would obstruct the other work of the Senate.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has just uttered what I consider to be historic words. They are exactly what I, myself, was going to say in discussing the so-called war of nerves. Indeed, what he said was in substance what I said on yesterday, although perhaps the emphasis which I gave to what was being done on the majority side by a small minority was lost in the shuffle.

Mr. President, I should like to identify myself with, and join in, the specific statement the Senator from Kentucky has made regarding the idea which I was trying to place before the Senate, and which the Senator from Kentucky has so well placed before the Senate this morning. Indeed, one of the gratifying aspects of this legislative body is that we can proceed in partnership, as a team, as a corps.

I now repeat part of the statement I made on yesterday:

> In the final analysis the showdown here will be on cloture for that is the only way, apparently, in which the unfinished business on civil rights can be dealt with on equal terms with the other major measures before us, as it deserves to be.

So, Mr. President, regardless of whatever the press may write—and that is its privilege—let us understand very clearly what the present suggestion is. In this connection, I am unable to find adequate words in which to express to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] how grateful I am to him for his presentation of it at this time. He comes from a border State where the people understand both sides of this question. I thank him most sincerely for placing this matter in focus.

Regardless of whatever the press may write about the war of nerves, let it be very clearly understood just what we are faced with here on the floor. It is not a war of nerves; it is only a dignified and honorable effort to place civil rights measures on a parity with other measures.

The Senate has now seen that in this body there are Senators who—regardless of their views on other questions—feel that the moment a civil rights measure is mentioned, all other procedure here must stop until that subject, one which they regard as a devil, is exorcised. That is their privilege, of course. But it is not the view of our party, which, through its representatives in both this Chamber and the other Chamber, has gone on record in favor of the enactment of civil rights legislation.

There are available in this Chamber an overwhelming number of votes in favor of invoking cloture in connection with the further consideration here of civil rights measures. Certainly that is the way to deal with this subject.

There is an old saying that once the cat has been shot, everyone understands what is going on, and will proceed accordingly.

Mr. President, it is absolutely inconceivable that a small minority of the Members of this body can block Senate action on important measures in which so many persons sincerely believe. I refer to measures such as the minimum-wage bill, the bill for medical care for the aged, and other important measures. Certainly, that small minority in this body will not be able to block Senate action on those matters unless we permit it to do so.

Mr. President, is a "war of nerves" being conducted when some Senators indulge in their own weakness, their own unwillingness to use the means available here in order to bring about what a majority is determined to bring about under the Constitution, and even under our own rules?

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. I want to compliment my good friend, the Senator from Kentucky, upon his brief and very incisive suggestion concerning this matter. He and I worked together on the platform committee in Chicago for a week, and a large part of that time was devoted to this very question of civil rights.

The bill which he proposes should be taken up again is a very modest approach to this subject, and one which really should not excite anyone very much, because it is a just and reasonable bill.

I think he has rendered a real service in pointing out a way in which it can be done without disrupting the business of this particular session. I wish to associate myself with him in the proposal, and assure him I will do what I can to support his leadership in that connection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Yesterday, as I listened here in the Senate to my colleague from New York engaging in the debate, I thought about this matter. The idea, I must say, came in large part from him, although I had given some thought to it before. It does seem to me that the majority—and they have been pretty much supported by the press in this regard—has the idea that to introduce any civil rights proposals would in some way obstruct the legislation which must be passed in this session. I think we are all realistic enough to realize that no large program dealing with civil rights will be passed in this session.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator will permit me to interject, I could not agree more. I have never said anything more than that what we should confine ourselves to is this limited amount of unfinished business.

Mr. COOPER. I think we all agree that to labor this question could obstruct some of the necessary things that must be done. On the other hand, I would never agree that bills which deal with purely economic matters, important as they are, are more important than an issue which goes to the very constitutional, moral, and ethical rights of the people of this country.

We have to be realistic as to what can be done. But this smokescreen which has been put up should not be allowed to hide the facts. The idea that we cannot even look at minimum civil rights proposals because doing so might obstruct the work of the Senate should not be allowed to become fastened upon the Senate or the public at large.

That is why I have joined my friend from New York in proposing what I consider a precise method by which we could enact minimum civil rights legislation, legislation which has already been discussed at length this year, legislation about which I cannot believe there is a great deal of controversy. But while it is minimum civil rights legislation, if enacted it would at least tell the country that the Republican Party means what it says about its civil rights plank; and I think it would show the people of the country that the majority party and its leaders mean what they say about their plank. So far they have taken a position which denies their platform.

My suggestion is that we take this matter up, and have a day or two on it—it has been discussed before for weeks—and then let good faith be tested. Let a cloture petition be filed, and let it be voted on. Then we will find out what the position of the parties is on this question, about which there has been a good deal of skirmishing and, I may say, evasion.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. Just so the record on this point may be complete, I think it should be noted that the two points we are talking about simply cover legislation to give statutory authority to the existing Nixon committee in connection with preventing discrimination in Government contract employment, on the one hand; and the other is to give assistance to those States, where they need it, if they are trying to comply with the Supreme Court decision. It is a very simple matter. That is all there is to it. I think it should be made clear that is all we are talking about. This would be evidence of good faith by both parties, whose planks go much further than this, that they mean what they say about legislation for extension of civil rights.

Mr. JAVITS. Why would it not be just as noteworthy to say that the claimed fear of civil rights legislation would be an excellent excuse for those who oppose the minimum wage bill, for example, to drag it out, claiming they have to keep it going because civil rights legislation may come in? For myself, I would be fully prepared to commit myself, based upon what we have just been discussing, namely, a proper way in which to proceed, to offer no amendment on the minimum wage bill which relates to civil rights. I have no doubt other Members feel the same way, so we will get on with the business before us, and there will be a redemption of good faith on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my friend from New York for having cleared the air, so to speak. The Republicans have been charged with putting up a smokescreen, and we have been charged with delaying this session of the Congress by prolonging debate on what to some of us is one of the most important bills in the economic field to come before the Congress, a matter that any one of us would have to agree would require 3 weeks in the normal process of a properly run session of the Senate. But I am impressed by the majority's insistence that they want to get along with things. I am at a loss to understand why they do not want to take up civil rights, for example, because they say it is something new. It is not new. The Senator, who is a member of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, knows full well the majority is pressing for passage out of that committee of a bill which is just as important as the minimum wage bill. While I have different views on that bill from the Senator from New York, he knows that when the common situs bill hits the floor, there are going to be another 4 or 5 or 6 days of debate on that bill. So I fail to understand the reluctance on the other side to let civil rights be introduced in the session when at the same time they are allowing to come up a bill which can be just as controversial, and which, I may say, will have civil rights amendments attached to it before we get through, and rightly so, may I say.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KEATING. I associate myself with the proposal made by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], which he has suggested to us in his usually constructive fashion, and which has been joined in by the distinguished Senators from Connecticut and New York.

I am prepared completely to commit myself to such a program. It has always been my contention that, realistically, we could not expect, in this short session, to enact anything more than the proposal advanced by our distinguished minority leader relating to these two items which have been the subject of great debate here, and which need no further debate at all, but on which we might well have a day or two of additional debate.

After a day or two, as the Senator from Kentucky pointed out, certainly an effort should be made to invoke cloture on the debate, so that we can get to a vote on these two important proposals.

I think it is pertinent at this point to invite attention to the column written by Mr. George Herman in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald, which has already been the subject of comment. Parenthetically, I wish to commend Mr. Herman for his column. It is an excellent piece of work. He is a very fine correspondent. He knows what he is writing about.

This is one illustration to which he refers as an example of what is really behind the words which are uttered on this floor. He says that when someone says, "Introducing this legislation would stall all work on the other important legislation before this body," this really means that "your proposal is highly embarrassing to my party, and we are going to shove it out of sight just as quickly as possible."

That is an extremely pertinent observation. I hope that when such a move is made by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, or by the Senator from New York, or by other Senators, such a proposal of such a limited character will not be shoved out of sight but that instead we shall be permitted to work our will, after a reasonable debate on these very modest proposals which have been made.

The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and I endeavored to put into legislative form the provisions of the Democratic platform on this subject. It is not our belief that that proposal realistically can be enacted in this session, because while it contains the two proposals to which we have been referring it also contains other matter, which of course goes very much further but which has not been fully discussed in the Senate, as have these two specific recommendations contained in the President's messages to Congress time and time again.

I think the Senator from Kentucky has pointed the way to a method in an orderly and efficient manner of bringing this matter to a vote. I hope the majority—particularly the majority leadership—will cooperate to that end.

I thank my friend.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues for their support in joining in this discussion. I should like to round it off in the following way, and then I shall yield to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

There are two things which are necessary, Mr. President. No. 1, these declarations on our side now in the process of being made. No. 2, some indication of cooperation from the other side.

Mr. President, that was the purpose of my offering a bill and inviting cosponsorship from those on the other side with whom we have been traditionally associated in regard to civil rights legislation. Mr. President, that offer is still wide open.

When we see that happening, when we begin to get some cosponsorship from the other side, even with regard to these very elementary two measures which have been discussed this morning by the Senator from Kentucky and my other colleagues, that will be the signal that we intend to come to some very definite resolution of this matter. Until that happens, Mr. President, let it be clear that we are not delaying consideration of the minimum wage bill or of anything else. We have had our vote. We had it last Tuesday. I did not press the matter yesterday on the second reading of my own bill. We have no intention of pressing it until such time as the minimum wage bill is acted on.

Mr. President, coupling that with the proposal made this morning by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] which is based upon my own views, as expressed yesterday, and in which I thoroughly join, as have my colleagues from New York and Connecticut, the path is perfectly clear. I hope very much it will be very clear and understandable to the country. Perhaps it is our fault for not having made it as clear as it has now been made. It is clear now.

I repeat, the proposal for civil rights legislation is that we proceed with these two measures incorporated in the bill of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], have a short debate, seek to impose cloture, and then have both sides in an overwhelming majority join in imposing cloture, to make this the earnest business of this session.

Mr. President, even the leading exponent of civil rights legislation has asked for only one additional measure, as I mentioned before, which is the limited opportunity for the Attorney General to sue in school desegregation cases. That is the only thing which has been specified.

Second, I certainly have no intention of doing anything with respect to the minimum wage bill which will in any way involve a civil rights discussion. I am in favor of having the bill passed. My speech this morning, which was issued to the press hours ago, is a plea in support of the bill, on which I signed the majority report. I think my reputation in the Senate and elsewhere demonstrates that I would not want to embarrass or to hamper anything I am as much in favor of as I am in favor of this proposal.

Mr. President, I now yield to my colleague from Ohio.

CONGRESSIONAL PROSPECTS

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two editorials which were published on August 7 and August 9 of this year in the Dayton Daily News. The first is entitled "Constructive Output Still Possible for Congress," and the other is entitled "Opportunities, Temptations Face Reconvening Congress."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Dayton Daily News, Aug. 9, 1960]

CONSTRUCTIVE OUTPUT STILL POSSIBLE FOR CONGRESS

President Eisenhower's message to Congress could lay the groundwork for a constructive session. All depends upon whether the President and both parties in Congress decide to put the national interest above politics.

Mr. Eisenhower's message could be taken as a point of departure for either path.

Certainly it had political overtones. Mr. Eisenhower spoke for the record on national defense. In putting forward a 21-point domestic program for serious action at a bobtailed session he was trying to put the Democrats on a spot.

Yet there remains a chance for Congress, with White House cooperation, to get done some things necesary for the health of the Nation and the peace of the planet.

Defense: The Nation needs urgently to step up its arms spending. The President now agrees to use impounded funds previously appropriated over his protests.

He says he may ask also for some new funds. There is no assurance that what he finally requests will be adequate to the gathering global challenge. Democrats should try to work with him, however irritated they may be by his claims to invulnerability for America's present defense.

Foreign aid: The President merits bipartisan support for his plea for full restoration of earlier House cuts. His proposals for Latin American aid and U.S. initiative toward a United Nations food-for-peace program are praiseworthy. As usual, the question is: Will action on the scale proposed ($600 million for Latin America; food for peace undetermined) get the job done?

Education, health, welfare: The President seems ready to soften his opposition to Federal action he once viewed as verging on socialism. Whether effective programs can get by his definition of reckless spending is not yet clear. Reasonable accommodation on both sides could produce results in an area in which action is badly needed.

Agriculture, civil rights: These issues cannot profitably be dealt with in a short session. They are complex, controversial and lodged too far back in the legislative pipeline. Mr. Eisenhower's insistence on action now was either unrealistic or political.

In the course of the session a certain amount of jockeying for partisan advantage is inevitable. But the Nation's interest will be served if Congress and the White House are as flexible as possible. If each makes the best record it can, in a genuine try for constructive output, there will be plenty of time left to apportion the bouquets and the brickbats.

[From the Dayton Daily News, Aug. 7, 1960]

OPPORTUNITIES, TEMPTATIONS FACE RECONVENING CONGRESS

The unfinished part of the congressional session (Senate tomorrow, House August 15) will be in all respects unusual, in some unique.

Although this is not the first late-summer session in a presidential year, the only other within easy memory was in 1948.

Without precedent is a session in which five of the top six men in the presidential campaign have conspicuous roles in the Senate. Both presidential candidates (NIXON and KENNEDY), one vice presidential nominee (JOHNSON), and both party chairmen (MORTON and JACKSON) will be directly on stage.

The other vice presidential candidate (Henry Cabot Lodge, himself an ex-Senator) will be conducting business at the United Nations that could affect the course of Congress.

Waiting in the White House to act on bills coming up from Congress is President Dwight D. Eisenhower, who has promised to campaign ardently for the Nixon-Lodge ticket.

In their dual roles all these men are presented with great temptations and equally great opportunities. They can serve their country by buckling down to unfinished legislative business. Or they can try to serve their political fortunes by cynical maneuvering.

If Congress is conscientious, it will stay clear of legislation that couldn't possibly be shaped up in an abbreviated session. In this class fall civil rights and farm legislation.

Wisdom of reopening the defense budget can be questioned. There is urgent need for stepped up arms spending. The case for supplementary appropriations depends on the amount of funds already in hand which the administration has declined to turn loose. This figure has not yet been ascertained.

Foreign aid appropriations are critical. Bipartisan action is needed to restore cuts voted by the House before it quit for the conventions.

Social legislation could become a casualty of political jockeying. Genuinely needed are a liberalized housing program, a plan for medical care for the aged, and increased Federal aid to education. These needs can be met in ways that are not fiscally reckless. The opportunity will be lost if the Democrats try for bread and circuses or if President Eisenhower persists in the view that Government action in these fields verges on socialism.

The specific issues before Congress are less important than the spirit in which the leaders approach them. Senator EVERETT DIRKSEN, Republican, of Illinois, has said: "It'll be the most political session you ever heard of. It's inevitable."

Is it? There are factors working against the prediction of the minority leader. For one thing, voters will be on the lookout for obvious political shenanigans. For another, they will be taking the personal measure of the candidates. For still another, each presidential candidate knows that, if he makes it to the White House, he will have to work closely with the Senate.

Conscience could be—at all events should be—a sobering factor. After all, Senators and Congressmen are coming together to serve the Nation in a time of unexampled danger.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to make at the outset one point which I believe was made last night rather late, which I think deserves to be made again.

I believe there are many Republican Members who favor a material increase in the minimum wage, and that the opposition to this bill and the large number of amendments which are being offered come from both Democrats and Republicans, many of whom are opposed to the bill.

It should not for a moment go out to the country that the Republicans as such are opposed to an increase in the minimum wage or—and I feel it proper to repeat what was said last night—that the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], who has himself so definitely rebutted any such idea last night, is the leader of the Republicans in his perfectly sincere opposition to an increase.

On the contrary, the administration favors a substantial increase in the minimum wage, and an expansion in coverage, including the coverage of retail and service employees not now covered. Whatever difference there may be between the administration's ideas as to increasing the minimum wage to $1.15 an hour and covering additional employees in excess of 3 million, as compared with the bill before the Senate, which would grant additional coverage to an estimated 4,971,000 and would raise the minimum wage over a period of years to $1.25, is a difference in degree and not a difference in principle. Hence, it should be clear that the administration is on the side of those who favor a bill of this type.

Indeed, the bill which has come to us from the House of Representatives is pretty much representative of the administration's position. I trust, therefore, that no effort will be made to put out to the country the idea that the Republican Party is opposed to an increase in the minimum wage or to the extension of coverage to a part of those workers not now covered. This is very important, since it is very clear that votes on both sides of the aisle will be needed to keep the bill adequate and to get it passed.

While this bill, which I generally support, would raise the minimum wage for presently covered employees to $1.25 over a period of 3 years, and for employees to be newly covered over a period of 4 years, it recognizes, in the $1.25 rate, the new level of the cost of living as well as the standard of living in the United States, and it is a further recognition of our national policy of mass production and mass consumption, recognizing that the two must move forward in step to keep our economy in balance.

As a representative of the most populous and economically strongest State in the Union, I feel the bill also will serve another vital purpose. It will tend to more nearly equalize conditions for the retention of enterprise and for the attraction of new enterprise between States like my own State of New York and other States which have profited in this respect from lower than appropriate wage scales.

It will be noted that while the basic increase to the $1.25 per hour level had been provided in the committee bill, practically every doubt in terms of coverage for businesses having an equity to be excluded or to be covered only in part has been resolved in favor of such businesses. Hence, only less than one-fourth of the approximately 20 million wage and salaried workers in the country available for minimum wage coverage who are not presently covered will be covered by the bill.

My reasons for favoring this measure are the following:

First. It represents recognition of the increase in the cost of living and of the improvement in the standard of living which our productivity can afford.

Second. It will tend to equalize competition between the States for the retention of enterprises and the attraction of new enterprises—a matter of vital importance to States like New York.

Third. It will put a stronger base under the national economy and will not materially increase the price level.

Fourth. It will not have a significant effect on wage levels in establishments which, prior to the increase, paid no one less than the new minimum and, accordingly, will not contribute to inflation.

Fifth. It will not tend materially to reduce total employment.

Sixth. The effect of this minimum wage increase will not be materially to change the ability of American manufacturers to compete with foreign producers.

Seventh. It will tend to raise the wage level within States, even among employees not covered by the new minimum wage, due to the competitive factor. This is a highly desirable result in view of the unfair and uneconomically low wage scales which prevail in much of such employment—in laundries, restaurants and similar places—and it will, of course, have this beneficial result in retail and service enterprises whose employees are to be newly covered under this bill.

I wish to make brief reference to each of these reasons.

First. The economic basis for the bill is very clear. A survey by the Department of Labor shows that in June 1959, 41 percent of the covered workers in 13 of the low-wage industries were paid less than $1.25 an hour. Yet since the last minimum wage increase in 1956, productivity gains are estimated at an overall 15 percent, consumer prices have risen by 10 percent and average hourly earnings in manufacturing, in construction and in wholesale trade have increased not less than 20 percent. Hence the wage gap between workers who must rely on the minimum wage and those who receive the wages prevailing in industry generally has widened very materially in that period, and the $1 an hour minimum has fallen unfairly behind the economic parade and needs to be brought abreast of it. As to workers not now covered, the $1.25 minimum at 40 hours per week will hardly produce even the barest minimum for a family of two which is considered by the New York City Department of Welfare to be the minimum budget for health and safety. Even for single persons the new minimum will not even meet a normal low income budget generally in most States.

Second. Major inequities have arisen among the States in the retention of business and competition for business by virtue of the existing low minimum wage, considering present economic conditions. This is shown by the figures in particular States with low wage levels which, when added to other favorable considerations, like climate and cheaper transportation, are drawing away business, from the larger industrial States. This is a situation which can be made more equitable through an increase in the minimum wage.

I call to the attention of my colleagues the eloquent speech of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] on this subject last night, which illustrated markedly how true is this particular reason which I, coming from New York, have for favoring this bill.

Third. The national economy will be materially helped because 3,600,000 Americans now covered by the act are earning at less than a recognized minimum subsistence budget because of the low minimum wage. Among those to be newly covered, more than half of the workers in the retail trades are estimated to be earning less than $1.25 an hour with more than 1 out of 4 earning less than $1 an hour and more than 1 out of 10 earning less than 75 cents an hour.

Just think of the absolute basic minimum which that represents in terms of employment in this country—$32 a week.

On this basis, even minimum living requirement for a single individual cannot be covered. This is certainly damaging to the national economy and cannot be justified in the terms of the national productivity and propriety.

The 1956 experience suggests that a moderate increase in the minimum wage would have no significant effect on price levels.

A general rise in the Wholesale Price Index began about the time of enactment of the $1 minimum wage, but examination of price changes for products of low wage industries indicates that employers of many low wage industries were not aided in adjusting to the minimum wage by price increases for their products.

There was no general pattern of increases in prices of products of low wage industries. This is shown by a tabulation of changes, between January 1956 and January 1958, in the wholesale prices of 143 products of 12 low wage industries, which in 1955 accounted for one-tenth of all workers paid less than $1.

Fourth. There is no evidence that an increase in the minimum wage has a significant effect on wage levels in establishments which, prior to the increase, paid no one less than the new minimum. A large proportion, perhaps the majority, of covered workers who are paid at or near $1 an hour are employed in establishments where that rate is paid to most employees. These include both unskilled and semiskilled workers. Most of them are experienced workers and there is no evidence that their age distribution differs from that of workers in higher wage plants.

Most of these workers are employed in establishments in nonmetropolitan areas, largely in the South. In the communities in which they are employed wages generally are low. This results from the availability of surplus labor and the poor bargaining position of employees, not the characteristics of the employees themselves. Other employees in the same occupations and industries, who work in establishments in other regions or in large cities, are paid wages far in excess of the minimum rate.

Mr. President, it strikes me that this is one of the most eloquent arguments for this bill.

Fifth. It will be recalled that an increase to the $1 minimum wage, effective March 1, 1956, represented a rise of one-third in the then minimum wage, while the present increase of 25 cents represents only a 25-percent increase.

We have a summary of experience with that previous increase in 1956.

Based upon the experience reported by the Department of Labor in its report for the year 1959, submitted under section 4(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, we find the following conclusion:

> Thus, the effects of the minimum wage on unemployment were not sufficiently large to be discernible in overall estimates of unemployment.

Also, according to other studies by the Department of Labor, the increase in 1956 did not result in an increase in hourly earnings of high paid workers in proportion to the increase in earnings of workers previously paid less than $1 an hour.

Sixth. The effect of the increased minimum wage will not materially change the ability of American manufacturers to compete with foreign producers in imports or exports. The Secretary of Labor testified exactly to that effect before the Subcommittee on Labor Standards of the House Committee on Education and Labor on April 21, 1960. He there stated:

> Undoubtedly the question of foreign competition, foreign imports, is a greater problem today than it ever has been and it certainly is of concern to American business; but I was addressing myself to what I thought was your question—would a moderate increase affect this importation problem? I do not think so. Our costs of manufacture, Mr. Chairman, are much higher and I am glad they are from the point of view of the standard of living of our people.

The seventh point, that is, the competitive factor, is self-explanatory in view of the very low wage levels prevailing in retail and service industries in many States and the way in which State minimum wage laws, where there are such laws, have tended to accept and freeze rather than materially improve these minimums. These low rates under State laws are shown in the tables under appendix B of the Senate hearings on this bill at pages 57 through 62. It is especially to be noted in the list of 22 States with no minimum wage standard whatever in, for example, retail trade, an area of such major intrastate employment. It represents 7 million out of approximately 20 million employees, who are not covered by the Federal minimum wage law. The coverage of these employees within States with no such laws is relatively slim. For example, it is estimated that not more than 4 million such workers have been covered by such minimum wage laws, and since 1945 not more than one-fifth of the 20 million that I have mentioned.

My own State of New York has just adopted a statewide $1 minimum wage law effective October 1, 1960, again proving itself one of the most advanced States in the Nation in dealing with working people.

I should like to conclude upon this note in respect of my presentation on the minimum wage bill. While every effort is being made to make us believe that there may be a slowdown on the minimum wage debate because some people are afraid that someone may propose civil rights legislation—I have already stated my position in this respect with regard to the minimum wage law, and therefore see no reason for anyone entertaining any fear on that score. But let us be realistic about deeply felt economic views of their own held by opponents of this bill or the economic interests of low-wage States.

In short, let us not have ourselves blinded by what may be a very interesting pyrotechnical discussion on the floor as to the real verities of the economics of the minimum wage. There are some low-wage States which may not be anxious to see this advantage in attracting business diluted. I use the word "advantage" advisedly. It is an advantage which I believe, and which I think the majority of Congress believes, is not in the national interest and the whole national prosperity.

I say that because I think it is a very necessary corollary to what we are talking about. While I express full respect for those who may oppose the bill for one reason or another, I think we ought to consider very carefully the economic interest which is also a policy interest in the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I must take slight exception to what the Senator from New York has just said. I want to make it perfectly clear that there are Senators who are deeply concerned about the constitutional implications in this approach. I do not think Senators who have engaged in the debate thus far are trying to hold wages down in their States.

My own State of Arizona has the highest wage rates in the United States. Our retail average is slightly above the national average. Our industrial rate is, I believe, the eighth in the Nation, and is only a few cents below that of Michigan, which is supposed to have the best rate, but which does not.

So I wish to make it perfectly clear that my objections to the bill are basic objections. I do not believe the Federal Government has any place at all in regulating wages in intrastate commerce. I believe the application of the commerce clause can conceivably give the Federal Government that right. It has been recognized by the courts and by Congress. But I fear the bill goes far beyond that. I believe it gets into the control of intrastate business. I do not believe the Senator from New York himself feels that that is a proper role for the Federal Government to play.

I do not believe, either, that the fact that a State has or has not a minimum wage law in any way affects what the wage structure of that State should be. What the proponents of the measure seem to forget is that the law of supply and demand enters into the picture; that the competition in the labor field enters into it. Sometimes it is not possible to get people to work for $1.50 or $2; but there are always people who are willing to start new business in this country on a shoestring, and there are always people who are willing to work for them during the periods when the employers cannot pay $1, $1.25, or $1.50.

So this subject, with me—and I am sure with others who have been engaged in this field—is not based upon the fact that we want to keep wages down. I offer my own business as an example. I will put it up against any comparable business in the United States, so far as working conditions, wages, and hours are concerned. To me, this is a matter relating basically to a constitutional question. It is on that ground that I am fighting the bill. I forget all about the $1.25, the $1.50, the $2, or whatever amount is decided upon. The point I want to make perfectly clear is that the Senator from Arizona does not object to the bill because he wants to have low wage rates in Arizona. We do not have low wage rates in Arizona.

I object to the bill on the ground that I do not want the Federal Government to come into my State, telling our merchants, our retailers, our service-industry people, and our farmers, how they shall run their business. It is as simple as that.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I agree with the statement of the Senator from Arizona. I thoroughly accept, because he is a man of great honor, and we all know that, everything which he says about this matter. I think it would be very helpful if the opponents of the measure did exactly what the Senator from Arizona is doing; namely, to state precisely the basis of their own position, especially in terms of the question of wage rates within their own States. I think this would have a very helpful effect upon getting some equalization in terms of the Nation even without regard to the bill.

I know that the Senator from Arizona is a very enlightened employer. I know that quite apart from our work in the Senate. I compliment him on it. We disagree in terms of the bill, on a fundamental question of policy. I believe that in measures affecting commerce, which is the definition used in the Labor Relations Act—all three of the acts—jurisdiction in interstate commerce, under the Constitution, is affected; and faced with the problems which the minimum wage is designed to meet, we do have a right to place a basic floor under the wage structure, in my opinion, to which even new business should be compelled to repair, because it is the basic subsistence minimum.

I could not agree more heartily with the Senator from Arizona that it would be a perfectly valid argument, in terms of the bill and in terms of my own position on the bill, to argue the economics which have been argued so eloquently by him in terms of whether the bill will or will not create unemployment; in terms of how it will affect the national price level.

I address myself in terms of how it will affect the opportunity or capability of American producers to compete with foreign producers, and also in terms of what it will do to persons who engage in new business.

So while we may differ, I may say to the Senator from Arizona, on the question we have to decide, I certainly wish to express all respect for what I myself know, quite apart from our work in the Senate, to be bona fide in the Senator's position.

When I said what I did, I expressed the hope that Senators from States having low wage scales—not States like Arizona—make their stand and explain why is it not right to do something on a national level to correct the imbalance upon States like my own, the New England States, and other States throughout the Nation, which are seeing a good deal of business which they feel they should be sharing going to other areas because of low wage levels.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not believe any of us can argue with what the Senator from New York has said about Congress having the power to regulate in the field of interstate commerce. It has been held by the courts, time and again, that the Constitution charges Congress with that responsibility. I am not concerned about the company which is engaged in interstate commerce. If Congress wants to regulate and establish minimum wages in that particular area, I do not think we can say we do not have the power or the right to do so.

What I am saying is that the Federal Government has no right or no power to regulate intrastate commerce; nor has it any right to usurp the powers of the States and to establish minimum wages in intrastate business.

The Senator from New York refers to the fact that in the labor-management acts we find the phrase "activities affecting commerce." We do. But I suggest to the Senator that while I do not have the exact language with me, that is a very well defined limitation on the powers of Congress. It applies to problems which would affect or cause strikes. I do not believe it has any bearing upon commerce at all. In fact, it cannot be argued that wages, whether high or low, restrict commerce. The language to which I object is entirely different. It is "activities affecting commerce." The language in the Kennedy bill goes far afield. In fact, the courts have never ruled on language like this. We can only guess what its effect might be.

"Activities affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for or distribution of goods in commerce.

As the Senator from New York knows, the junior Senator from Arizona is not a lawyer. But I do not think one has to be a lawyer to imagine some of the things this provision might cover.

For instance, a man who digs potatoes which will move in interstate commerce could certainly be considered as being engaged in an activity affecting commerce. The man who sweeps the floor in a factory which is engaged in manufacturing goods that will move in interstate commerce, even though he himself does nothing to affect interstate commerce, would, under this definition, be engaged in interstate commerce. That is the point with which I am so vitally concerned—this new definition of "activity affecting commerce," which in no way is comparable to the "activity affecting commerce" clause under the Taft-Hartley Act. There is the area about which we find ourselves arguing. In fact, I cannot even get the sponsor of the bill to tell me what this part of it will do and what it will not do.

I suggest that if the proponents of the measure want to stop a great deal of the opposition to it, they remove this part of it; and if they want to have in the bill an "activity affecting commerce" clause, let them consider one such as the one in the Taft-Hartley Act, which I may say the Supreme Court has held is the widest possible definition of regulation of commerce.

But I feel that this part of the pending bill goes far beyond that, even though there has not been a court decision in regard to this particular part of the bill. Certainly we do not want the Federal Government to regulate intrastate business. This definition goes so far that, under it, the Federal Government could even regulate the customers who come into the stores—could even regulate every facet of the business, including choice and price; under this part of the bill the Federal Government could even have the right to regulate everything in the field of intrastate commerce. That is our concern.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, certainly the Constitution gives the Congress the right to regulate only interstate commerce, not intrastate commerce. Therefore, if we include in the bill words that are too strong, the courts will rule they are unconstitutional. On the other hand, if we include in the bill language which does not constitute unconstitutionality, the courts will still tell us exactly what is the purview of any definition we use.

So I do not think we are talking here about regulating customers or anything of the sort, because all that is not germane to our debate.

But I repeat that the term "industry affecting commerce" is used in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, and is defined there, in somewhat more detail—as, indeed, it is in the pending bill—as "any activity, business, or industry in commerce"—those are the important words—"or in which a labor dispute would hinder or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce."

The definition used in the pending bill is, as has been stated, found in section 3(s), as follows:

> (s) "Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

I point out to the Senator that the only missing words, as compared with those included in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, are "hinder or obstruct." Obviously, Mr. President, a minimum wage could not "hinder or obstruct." Therefore, this definition comes as close as possible, as regards dealing with the subject on which we are now legislating, to the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, which we passed not long ago.

I believe, as a lawyer, and although I think I am a competent lawyer, I realize full well, I hasten to add, that there are nine lawyers on the Supreme Court bench——

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will yield, let me say that is exactly what we are afraid of. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. I understand.

But I am referring to the argument that we are trying to do something unconstitutional. Of course, we are not; and even if we were to try to do so, we could not succeed in doing anything unconstitutional.

But that does not necessarily mean that every employee described in the committee report, every one whom we think will be affected by the bill, actually will be affected by it. I have little doubt that in connection with this matter, as in connection with the original minimum wage law, there will be litigation in regard to the extension of coverage. Indeed, I think that is a good thing. If we were to try here on the floor to specify in detail in regard to every category, on the theory that that was what the courts wanted or what we wanted, we would become involved in great difficulties.

In short, I believe this measure is constitutional. And, assuming that it is passed and is enacted into law, I think the courts will, without question, test the specific areas of applicability of the bill—and quite properly so—to individual employers and employees, regardless of what may be set forth in our report.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But I point out that our concern is that the courts would hold this measure constitutional, in view of the decisions the courts already have made under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

I have never been able to understand why the proponents of the bill want to change the definition contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended. That definition of commerce has been satisfactory. It has been rather narrow. It has been adjudged by the courts.

I do not see why the proponents of the pending bill even attempt to widen that interpretation, inasmuch as its widening would, in effect, destroy some of the rights of the States.

Of course, we could argue indefinitely about this particular part of the bill. But I believe it is unconstitutional. I believe it will affect the States. The Senator from New York feels that it will not.

Again, I have the disadvantage of being a layman who is arguing with a lawyer. But millions of businessmen in the country who are not lawyers will be looking at this measure, and will share my fears that the Federal Government is now trying to get some new "gimmick" applied to them.

If all that the proponents of the bill want is to extend the coverage and increase the minimum wage, I suggest that could be done without arousing the fears of those in the country who will come under this measure.

In fact, by means of this measure the onus is now proposed to be put on the employers, not on the employees.

Frankly, throughout the debate on the bill I have been at a loss to understand why the proponents want to go so far afield, so far into what we call the new frontier.

As an aside, I may say to my good friend that this morning I discovered the source of the new frontier. I found in my library a book with the title "The New Frontier"; and I wonder whether the Senator from New York can guess by whom it was written. It was written by Henry Wallace. So we now have a real wizard behind the new frontier; and tonight I shall read his book, and shall see how much of it is included in the philosophy of the proponents of the pending bill.

Mr. JAVITS. Of course, Mr. President, to discuss this matter on the floor of the Senate with the Senator from Arizona is a little bit less expensive than to discuss it with him in his office. [Laughter.]

But I think the RECORD should be clear. Therefore, I state that I think the businessmen are entitled to have guidelines, without having to obtain the advice of a lawyer. And I think the committee report does just that. I think it states the outermost limits of the coverage. So it is relatively riskless to rely on the report, in terms of the amount and the extent of the coverage.

I was saying—and I have no doubt that this is so—that regardless of what we consider the ambit of coverage when we pass the bill, the courts may yet disagree with us, and may cut it down.

I thank my colleague.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, at this point I should like to make a brief comment.

Mr. JAVITS. Then I yield the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to say now, in order to have some continuity——

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield briefly to me?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, some well-meaning persons argue that since the concept "affecting commerce" is found in the National Labor Relations Act, and has been held constitutional, the same concept would be equally constitutional in the wage-hour law. We believe that for the following reasons, this argument is not sound, and that to use the concept "affecting commerce" as a basis for determining the scope of Federal regulation of peacetime wages and hours is of dubious constitutional validity.

The National Labor Relations Act defines "affecting commerce," in section 2(7), as meaning "in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce, or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce."

This definition makes it clear that Congress was directing its regulatory efforts at labor disputes which burden or obstruct the free flow of goods in interstate commerce. This is confirmed by the declaration of policy in section 1 of the act, which states it to be the policy of the United States to "eliminate the causes of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce." And indeed it may be conceded that labor disputes, with their accompanying elements of strikes, picketing, and boycotts, do in fact hamper, impede, and obstruct the free flow of goods in commerce. This is true even in cases where interstate commerce is not directly involved, but is only affected.

The situation with respect to wages and hours, however, is totally different. If an industry simply affects interstate commerce, rather than being directly in it, then—whether its wages are high or low, and whether its hours are long or short—there is no effect upon interstate commerce. The proponents of S. 3758 virtually concede this, because in defining "activity affecting commerce," they have made no effort to incorporate the thought of eliminating obstructions or impediments to interstate commerce.

In the Jones & Laughlin case, 301 U.S. 1, in which the U.S. Supreme Court held valid the "affecting commerce" concept in the National Labor Relations Act, Chief Justice Hughes said, at page 31, with reference to the act's definition of "affecting commerce":

> This definition is one of exclusion as well as inclusion. The grant of authority to the Board does not purport to extend to the relationship between all industrial employees and employers. Its terms do not impose collective bargaining upon all industry regardless of effects upon interstate or foreign commerce. It purports to reach only what may be deemed to burden or obstruct that commerce and, thus qualified, it must be construed as contemplating the exercise of control within constitutional bounds. It is a familiar principle that acts which directly burden or obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, or its free flow, are within the reach of the congressional power.

His opinion then abounds with references to burdens and obstructions to commerce, thus demonstrating that the underlying basis for the Court's conclusion, upholding the constitutionality of the "affecting commerce" concept, was that the act thereby sought to eliminate such burdens and obstructions to commerce.

But in the field of wages and hours, where the entire purpose of regulation is simply to eliminate the competition in interstate commerce of goods produced under substandard labor conditions, the concept of "affecting commerce" has no place. It does not contemplate the removal of obstructions or burdens to interstate commerce and is not in any way an appropriate means to the end of regulating interstate commerce. Accordingly, grave doubts arise as to its constitutionality.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] has the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I had intended to suggest the absence of a quorum. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, with the understanding that he will not lose the floor?

THE NEED FOR BIPARTISAN ACTION ON THE NUCLEAR TEST BAN

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on May 12 I rose in the Senate to speak for the first time on the question of the nuclear test ban.

I did so, as I pointed out, because of a gnawing conviction that the moratorium was wrong, that the Communists were not abiding by it, that it increased the danger of war rather than diminished it, and that it might ultimately cost us our freedom.

I did so not because I am opposed to a test ban, but precisely because I favor a ban—a realistic and graduated ban that takes effect in stages, as methods of detection for various categories of tests are developed.

I rise now to remind the Senate that on October 31 we shall have observed an honor moratorium on nuclear weapon tests of all kinds for exactly 2 years.

I remind my colleagues that there is no assurance the Kremlin has observed a corresponding moratorium, that on the basis of their past record and of Khrushchev's boasts about "unbelievable" new weapons, there is every reason to believe the Soviets have in fact engaged in clandestine testing, that, in all probability, we have lost 2 years of our precious lead in nuclear technology.

Finally, I wish to remind the Senate that if the Soviet scientists who developed the A-bomb, the H-bomb, and the sputnik were to score a major technological breakthrough in the field of nuclear weapons, we might very well find ourselves confronted with a choice between annihilation and surrender.

I remind the Senate of these things with all the earnestness and urgency at my command. When I spoke on May 12, there was no general feeling of crisis. There was, on the contrary, a widespread conviction that the scheduled summit meeting in Paris might usher in a period of gradually improved relations. But in the light of the Kremlin's berserk behavior since Paris, there is today—I think we can all agree—little room for optimism or wishful thinking about Soviet intentions.

In the space of some 90 days, Khrushchev has disrupted the summit conference, walked out on the Geneva Disarmament Conference, shot down the American RB–47 plane over the high seas, threatened all-out nuclear war over Cuba and the Congo, and sent menacing notes to our allies in Europe and Asia.

The only thing the Kremlin has not disrupted in the marathon test ban conference in Geneva. Here, after 2 years of agonizing negotiations, the Kremlin has, within the past fortnight, at last specified the number of onsite inspections it would permit if a test ban treaty were concluded. It would permit all of three such inspections per annum. That is ridiculous.

The American delegate, Ambassador Wadsworth, replied with indignation that this would make a mockery of inspection, that it would permit the inspection of less than 1 percent of the questionable seismographic phenomena which occur each year in the territory of the Soviet Union.

But meanwhile, the test ban negotiations go on and on—and the United States continues to observe the honor moratorium which has come to be accepted as a condition of these negotiations.

Why have the Soviets not walked out of the test ban conference when they have walked out of everything else? Why do they maintain the pretense of negotiation in this one field when in virtually every other field negotiation has given way to vituperation and missile-rattling?

I believe there can be only one answer to these questions: At the same time as it threatens nuclear war over the U–2, the RB–47, the Congo and Cuba, the Kremlin considers it of paramount importance that the United States be held to its voluntary moratorium on the testing of nuclear weapons.

More than ever before, it is now apparent that the protracted negotiations in Geneva are part of the conflict strategy of the Soviet Union, that their central purpose in the Soviet scheme of things is to immobilize the West, technologically, psychologically, and militarily—to create a condition of international hysteria which would restrict or prevent the possibility of Western reaction to Soviet aggression.

I believe that our voluntary moratorium made sense insofar as it involved the abandonment of all tests that contaminate the atmosphere. But I also believe that it was a grave error in judgment to extend the moratorium to tests in outer space and underground which do not contaminate the atmosphere, for which methods of detection have not been perfected and may not be perfected for many years, and which, in the opinion of our military experts, are essential to the maintenance of our technological superiority.

The moratorium was an error in judgment, whichever way you look at it.

To those who are distrustful of Soviet intentions, it was automatically suspect because it rested our security as a nation on nothing more substantial than the assumption that the Kremlin would abide by its word of honor.

But even from the standpoint of those who are more trustful of Soviet intentions and who consider a test ban treaty "the be all and end all" of foreign policy, the moratorium was wrong. The moratorium, in effect, has constituted a test ban without inspection of any kind. Before the negotiations had even commenced, in other words, we had, whether we realized this or not, conceded to the Kremlin everything it was demanding.

Once we had thus stripped ourselves of all bargaining power, what possible motivation could there then have been for the Kremlin to negotiate in good faith or to offer genuine concessions in an effort to arrive at an agreement?

In embarking on the moratorium and in its participation in the test ban negotiations, the administration has been motivated by genuine good will and by an honest desire for peaceful coexistence. I am sure that no one disputes this. I would even be prepared to concede that this display of good will and sincerity may have had certain propaganda advantages. But this demonstration of trustfulness in the face of deceit and of good will in the face of nuclear blackmail has, in my opinion long ago outlived any usefulness it may have had. It has now become a total liability. It is now—let us make no mistake about it—being construed as a manifestation of weakness which encourages the Kremlin to further arrogance and nuclear blackmail.

At his press conference on Wednesday, August 10, President Eisenhower suggested that the continued lack of progress in the test ban talks in Geneva might require the United States to resume underground tests of nuclear weapons. "When we come to the place that progress is not possible," said the President, "then we have to take care of ourselves."

According to the article in the New York Times, the administration's hopes that Moscow would eventually agree to a treaty with adequate controls, were severely jolted by Mr. Tsarapkin's ludicrous proposal, to which I have referred, that the West be accorded three onsite inspections annually in the territory of the Soviet Union.

I welcome the President's statement. On at least two occasions in the past, however, there have been hints that we might resume underground testing—followed by faithful adherence to the moratorium. It is my hope that the President this time will carry out the action at which his statement hinted without further delay. The 2 years of stalling and tergiversation at Geneva are enough to demonstrate our own good will and the dishonesty and trickery of the Communists. Another 6 months of hopeless negotiations would add absolutely nothing to this demonstration—while it would further impede our weapons development program and weaken our overall position vis-a-vis the Soviets.

Without repudiation of its previous position, the administration could, with all justification, say that the present world situation combined with the Soviet's lack of good faith in Geneva, make it necessary, after 2 years of patient striving for an agreement, to reexamine our position. In my own opinion, the Kremlin's provocative and belligerent attitude, including its repeated threats of nuclear war, not merely justify such an examination—they imperatively demand it.

There is only one way to respond to the crisis which the Kremlin has provoked and which Khrushchev is apparently fanning with demonic glee. We must not merely tell the Soviets that we plan to stand firm, but we must, without delay, take certain concrete measures calculated to persuade the Kremlin that we mean what we say.

The buildup of our conventional forces and the acceleration of our missile program, while essential for the future, have little meaning for the present. There are, however, several things we can do that would have a world of meaning for the present.

First. We can commit ourselves to the immediate resumption of underground nuclear testing, with primary emphasis on the development of tactical nuclear weapons.

Second. We can announce that we plan to make nuclear weapons, both tactical and strategic, available to our NATO allies, upon their request, and in proportion to the capabilities and their contribution to NATO manpower.

Third. We could simultaneously set up a nuclear weapons training program for our NATO allies.

Fourth. We could call for the reorganization of NATO land forces on a nuclear basis, as tactical nuclear weapons are supplied to them.

I can think of no measures available to us that would do more to persuade the Kremlin of the firmness of our resolve or do more to restore the balance of power in Europe.

The Kremlin might fume and bluster and perhaps even threaten to arm its satellites with nuclear weapons. But the memories of the uprising in Hungary, Poland and East Germany are far too fresh to permit anything quite so radical. On the contrary, there is every reason to believe that by providing nuclear weapons to our NATO allies we would further stimulate dissension within the Communist bloc and within the Kremlin by encouraging demands from Red China and from the East European satellites which the Kremlin cannot possibly accept.

The measure I have proposed should not be taken in isolation, but as parts of a broader integrated nuclear policy. In my speech of May 12 I suggested the outline of such a policy. I wish to repeat my proposals in full here, because I feel that they have all the more validity and a hundredfold more urgency in the light of the frightening developments since that time.

First. We should say frankly to the Soviets that when we speak of a system of adequate inspection, we do not mean a system based 99 percent on trust and 1 percent on inspection. The one truly effective way of policing a ban on all categories of tests would be the acceptance of the principle of complete openness by both sides. We, therefore, propose a test ban based on President Eisenhower's open skies proposal, plus unlimited right of ground inspection, and policed in each country by a stated number of aircraft and inspection teams enjoying complete freedom of movement.

Second. If the Soviets do not accept our proposal for a complete test ban based on open skies and unlimited right of inspection, we propose, as an alternative, an immediate ban on all tests that contaminate the atmosphere. We point out that an agreement on this simple but basic proposal would respect the opinions of mankind, would be easily monitored, and would at the same time, pave the way for further and broader agreements.

Third. If the Soviets, in turn, reject our proposal for world-wide ban on "dirty" tests, we announce that we ourselves will voluntarily observe a moratorium on such tests. We express the hope that the Soviets will also observe such a voluntary moratorium in the absence of a formal agreement—but we warn that, if there is ever conclusive evidence that the Soviets have resumed such tests, then we may have to reconsider our own position.

Fourth. We announce our willingness to extend the ban to other categories of tests, if, as, and when enforcible methods of inspection are developed.

Fifth. We announce that we plan to resume tests immediately in space and underground.

Sixth. We commit ourselves, with testing again possible, to an all-out program of nuclear weapons development, conceived on a scale that will not merely maintain our lead over the Soviets but will increase it from year to year. This program must be continuous. We must not again rest on our laurels—as we have done under both Democratic and Republican administrations—when we reach the next technological plateau.

Seventh. We declare our intention first, to embark on a so-called plowshare program—that is a program of research on hydrological and geographic engineering and on other peaceful uses of nuclear explosions; second, to appropriate $100 million for this program of research; third, to use our underground weapons test program, insofar as this can be done, to further our plowshare program; fourth, to disseminate freely all information resulting from this program.

Eighth. We act immediately on the President's suggestion of February 3 that we arm our NATO allies with nuclear weapons. Nothing would do more to reinvigorate NATO or to persuade its member nations of the seriousness of our intentions.

Ninth. We commit ourselves publicly to announce all tests.

Tenth. Recognizing the fact that nuclear physics is not an American monopoly, that Italian, Hungarian, German, Danish, and other scientists all played an important role in the development of the atom and hydrogen bombs, we call for and offer to participate in a joint NATO effort in nuclear weapons development. Such an enterprise would not be designed to replace our own facilities, but to cooperate competitively with them. Nothing would do more to tighten our alliance and to challenge the Russians. The existence of such NATO-wide research facility would also add to our leverage in pressing the Kremlin for openness.

There is nothing partisan about my criticism or my proposals—for the simple reason that the leaders of both parties have from the beginning endorsed the moratorium and have, in general, supported the President's nuclear policy.

On May 29, President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Macmillan announced from Camp David that if a treaty banning detectable tests could be worked out, they would be prepared to observe a continuing moratorium on undetectable underground tests while a research program on improved methods of detection was carried forward.

The candidates of the Democratic Party immediately announced that, if they were elected, they would honor such a moratorium, even though it did not have the force of a treaty. Vice President NIXON, it was assumed as a matter of course, would also faithfully respect any agreement made by the President.

I can think of no measure that would more inspire the admiration of the free world and the dismay of our enemies than a similar demonstration of bipartisan unity in the difficult reappraisal of nuclear policy which Soviet conduct has forced upon us, and which must be carried out promptly—not after the elections, but today.

According to the New York Times article to which I have referred—and here I quote:

> There would be considerable sympathy among influential Democrats on Capitol Hill for any administration move to resume tests. At the same time there is considerable doubt among these Democrats that the administration, in the midst of a political campaign, will be willing to take such a potentially unpopular step.

I appeal to the leaders of my own party to take the issue out of partisan politics and out of the election campaign by making it clear that the renewal of nuclear underground testing would have their unconditional support.

I can think of no more important service that President Eisenhower could render in the closing days of his administration than to take the initiative in asking such a reappraisal in consultation with the leaders of both parties.

I am as certain as I have ever been of anything that, given the facts, the overwhelming majority of the American people and of the other free peoples would understand and approve such action.

They would look upon it as a legitimate and proper response to Khrushchev's insults and provocations and nuclear threats.

They would regard it as an essential measure of self-defense at a time of crisis—which it, in fact, is.

They would realize, I am certain, that by increasing the deterrent power of the free world, we simultaneously increase the chances of peace.

I respectfully but urgently address these thoughts to President Eisenhower and to the candidates of both political parties.

Since I prepared this statement, several things have happened which require comment.

The New York Times of yesterday, Friday, August 12, for example, reported that, in the continuing negotiations at Geneva, the Soviet Union and the United States have agreed that the projected worldwide control system to ban nuclear tests should be fully operational within 6 years after a treaty is ratified. This worldwide control system, as it has been discussed in the past, involves the establishment of 180 monitoring stations, 21 of them in the territory of the Soviet Union.

In the August 11 session at Geneva the Soviet delegation took the stand that 15 control stations would be adequate in the territory of the Soviet Union. Their timetable for the installation of the control system, in addition, allowed 4 years for the establishment of the first stage, 1 year more than the West's timetable for stage one.

Ambassador Wadsworth took exception to the Soviet position on these points, but he nevertheless stated that the differences between the plans appear to be negotiable.

Mr. A. M. Rosenthal, in the same issue of the New York Times, reported there is still a basic division within the so-called Committee of Principals between those who favor a test ban treaty, apparently on the terms of the Camp David agreement of March 29, and those who fear that such an agreement would prevent the development of nuclear weapons which are essential to our survival. The Committee of Principals, as I am sure all of you know, is composed of the Secretaries of State and Defense, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, the head of the CIA, and the scientific and security advisers to the President. Mr. Rosenthal said that the outcome of the struggle within the Committee of Principals will have a considerable effect on the Geneva test ban negotiations.

Mr. President, as I see it there are two dangers, and I do not know which one to fear the most, because they both add up to the same thing in the end.

The first danger is that despite President Eisenhower's words this week, the Soviets will make some meaningless concessions to the Western point of view, which will again arouse hopes and encourage us to continue these interminable negotiations. The Soviets, of course, welcome every delay, as Mr. A. M. Rosenthal pointed out in his article in the August 12 New York Times. "They are delighted," said Mr. Rosenthal, "with the uncontrolled moratorium and quite confident that in world public opinion the United States has not yet forced them into either accepting a commitment or halting their pleas for one."

The danger is, in short, that the present moratorium—which, in honesty, should be described as a test ban without inspection—will be continued indefinitely and justified on the basis of the carrot which is kept dangling in front of our noses, although the free world donkey never seems to come any closer to it.

The second danger is that, if, after the Soviets have taxed our patience to the breaking point, we should take a firm position, the Kremlin, rather than accepting the breakup of the conference, will negotiate some kind of agreement that seems to come fairly close to Western terms, let us say 15 control stations in the Soviet Union instead of 21, as they proposed on August 12; 12 on-site inspections per annum instead of the 20 which the West has requested; and 6 years for the establishment of the full monitoring system, with the first stage to be established within 4 years, again as the Soviets proposed on August 11.

If such an agrement were reached, it would, unless we revise our position, automatically commit the administration to the Camp David formula of March 29. This called for a moratorium on undetectable underground tests as a supplement to the treaty, although not a part of it.

The net effect of such an agreement would be the same as an indefinite prolongation of the present moratorium. For all practical purposes, we would have a ban without inspection on undetectable underground tests.

If we enter into such an agreement, it would be a total abandonment of common sense and logic; it would be a confirmation of the ancient adage that "whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

In my speech of May 12 I pointed out that even if the Russians employ no techniques to muffle their explosions and reduce their seismic impact, and even if they agree to the installation of 21 monitoring stations and 20 on-site inspections per annum, as we proposed, this would only enable us to detect explosions in excess of 20 kilotons, or the equivalent of 20,000 tons of TNT. This was the size of the Hiroshima bomb.

I pointed out that a nuclear explosion could be muffled, or decoupled by setting it off inside a large spherical underground cavern; and that this could reduce the seismic reading of an explosion by a factor of 300. This means that a Hiroshima bomb would register only as a 70-ton explosion. I pointed out, too, that Dr. Hans Bethe, the President's chief scientific adviser on the test ban, had informed the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy that, if the Russians were to attempt to conceal explosions by employing the decoupling technique, it would require a network of 200 robot seismic stations, in addition to the 21 manned stations, to enable us to detect the explosion of a Hiroshima size bomb.

I pointed out that tests of 20 kilotons magnitude more than covers the entire projected spectrum of tactical nuclear weapons, and that, even with today's technology, tests of far less than 20 kilotons magnitude could be used to design improved weapon systems covering virtually the entire nuclear and thermonuclear spectrums.

Even if the Russians were to accept 21 manned stations in their territory and 20 on-site inspections per annum, it would provide us with a detection capability far inferior to that suggested by Dr. Hans Bethe—a capability that would not even be adequate to detect tests of much more than 20 kilotons magnitude. Let us make a further hypothetical concession: even assuming that the Soviets did agree to a monitoring system that enabled us to detect any test in excess of the Hiroshima size bomb—what conceivable purpose would this serve, if it left the Kremlin free to conduct tests of bombs of slightly smaller magnitude? This would leave them free to do just about all the testing their hearts desired. In return for such a meaningless agreement, they could, under the terms of the Camp David formula, tie us down—in my opinion indefinitely—to a continuing moratorium on undetectable tests.

Mr. President, the Camp David formula, although it was inspired by good will and a desire for compromise, represented a complete abandonment of the basic principle which has guided our approach to negotiations—the principle that there can be no disarmament in any sphere without an adequate system of inspection.

Is it unreasonable to suggest that the administration now review this position in the light of all that has happened since Camp David? Is it unreasonable to urge that the President return to his statement of February 23, as the basic formula for a test ban treaty?

Is it unreasonable to ask those members of the Committee of Principals to support the Camp David formula what assurance they can give the American people that the Kremlin has honored the moratorium on undetectable tests to date and will continue to do so?

Mr. President, again I say that I believe that our survival as a free nation is at stake. I appeal to all of my colleagues to give this problem their immediate and earnest attention.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point two articles which appeared in the New York Times for July 31. The first article reports that heads of the Atomic Energy Commission and of the Department of Defense have once again strongly urged the resumption of underground tests for the purpose of developing radically new kinds of warheads. The second article reports on the nature and range of the nuclear weapons we have tested prior to the moratorium of October 31, 1958, and it gives some hint of the sensational progress that was being made at the time our weapons tests were suspended.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AEC SEEKS BOMB TESTS TO DEVELOP NEW WARHEAD

(By John W. Finney)

WASHINGTON, July 30.—Officials of the Atomic Energy Commission are convinced that further atomic testing would result in dramatic improvements in warheads for ballistic missiles, including a cluster of warheads for a single missile.

The technical advances to be gained by further testing—either by this country or the Soviet Union—are being stressed with increasing urgency within the administration as the test ban talks in Geneva drag on.

Thus far in the debates within the administration, the technical-military reasons for resumption of tests have been outweighed by the psychological and diplomatic advantages of a ban.

However, AEC and Defense Department officials are now urging that greater weight be placed on the military need for improved weapons.

OFFICIALS ARE UNEASY

In the private debates, Commission and Defense officials have expressed increasing uneasiness over the situation that has existed since November, 1958, when the nuclear powers announced a suspension of atomic tests.

Although there is no evidence that the Soviet Union has been conducting clandestine atomic tests, these officials are arguing that from the standpoint of national security and on the basis of the past Soviet record in keeping international pledges, the precautionary assumption must be made that the Soviet Union is carrying out secret weapons tests.

On the basis of extensive analysis of the fallout of Soviet tests, officials are convinced that the United States now possesses a decided superiority in nuclear weapons technology. This superiority, however, could vanish in a 4-year period, AEC officials say, if the Soviet Union carries out secret tests, while the United States refrains from testing.

As Commission officials point out, nearly 2 of these 4 years have now passed.

The argument is also being advanced that further testing is becoming necessary to maintain the Nation's nuclear striking strength in the unending battle between offensive and defensive weapons.

At present, partly because of the intensive test series conducted just prior to the moratorium, the United States has adequate warheads for all its ballistic missiles—ranging from the several-megaton warhead for the Atlas and Titan ICBM's to the half-megaton warhead for the Navy's Polaris missile. The ability of these missiles to reach their target—and thus the entire nuclear deterrence balance—could be upset, however, if the Soviet Union developed defensive weapons against ballistic missiles.

On the basis of past statements by Premier Khrushchev, some prominent administration officials believe that the Soviet Union, like the United States is developing such an anti-missile missile.

It is for this reason that emphasis is now being laid on the likelihood that further testing would permit development of more sophisticated, lighter warheads that could be packed in clusters in the nose of a ballistic missile and carry in total the same destructive punch as one warhead.

The tracking, identification and destruction of one incoming ballistic missile warhead already poses one of the greatest technological challenges ever undertaken by weaponeers. Knocking down a cluster of warheads, coming in like a spray of buckshot, would seem to pose an almost insuperable defensive problem, at least by present technology.

Commission officials and scientists believe that such clusters of strategic-size warheads could be developed through testing small devices underground and then extrapolating up to the larger sized weapons. Thus there would be no necessity to conduct any larger, above-surface tests that would contaminate the atmosphere with further fallout.

COUNSEL IS DIVIDED

In the past the administration has received divided counsel from its scientific advisers on the necessity of further tests and the feasibility of developing large weapons from small underground tests.

Within the President's Science Advisory Committee, for example, there have been influential voices arguing that there was no military need for further tests and that the advantages that the Soviet Union might gain by clandestine testing were not sufficient to justify the risk of detection.

There are reliable indications that thus far these voices, rather than those of the AEC, have had the ear of President Eisenhower. This situation, however, is likely to change with the new administration, regardless of which candidate wins.

As a fellow Californian, John A. McCone, Chairman of the Commission, already has a close working relationship with Vice President NIXON and could be expected to exert an influential voice in a Republican administration.

Mr. McCone's concern over an indefinite moratorium on tests are shared in large measure by influential Democrats on the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy such as Senators CLINTON P. ANDERSON, of New Mexico, ALBERT GORE, of Tennessee, and HENRY M. JACKSON, of Washington. These men could be expected to have ready access to the White House if Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY were elected.

AEC LIFTS VEIL ON A-TEST POWER—DECLASSIFIES DATA SHOWING RANGE FROM FIFTEEN ONE-HUNDREDTHS TON UP TO 15 MEGATONS

(By Bill Becker)

SANTA MONICA, CALIF., July 30.—The United States has set off at least one test hydrogen explosion with a power equal to 15 million tons of TNT.

It has also refined its nuclear capability to the point where one atomic test yielded a power equivalent to fifteen one-hundredths of a ton of TNT.

These extremes were disclosed in a table declassified this week by the Atomic Energy Commission. For the first time, the intensity of 98 atomic tests was specified. But the yield of 71 other U.S. tests remained secret.

The release of the information through the Rand Corp. was viewed by some authorities as a move to prompt the Soviet Union to release similar details of its atomic tests.

POLICING APPLICATION

In an accompanying study by Rand scientists pointed out that principles learned from tests since 1951 were applicable to the policing of any nuclear test ban that might be agreed upon.

Heretofore, strict security had guarded test results since the original blast in New Mexico on July 16, 1945. The table listed that tower detonation as yielding the equivalent of 19,300 tons of TNT.

The table showed these highs and lows:

The greatest explosion was the Bravo shot in Operation Castle on February 28, 1954, at the Pacific Proving Ground. The yield was 15 megatons (or 15 million tons).

Another hydrogen blast, which did away with an entire island in the Pacific on October 31, 1952, was pegged at 14 megatons. It was detonated just 20 feet above the surface.

Another Pacific hydrogen test on May 20, 1956, was listed as within "megaton range." This was the Nation's first airdropped hydrogen bomb. Numerous other Pacific test yields since then remained secret.

The power of two rocket shots over the Pacific in August of 1958 likewise was undisclosed. Their burst heights were given as 252,000 and 141,000 feet.

The last test at Nevada before the present moratorium produced the little blast of fifteen one-hundredths of a ton, on October 30, 1958. This was the culmination of a series in which all reported yields were less than 6,000 tons, except for a 19,200-ton, underground shot.

DATA ON 169 TESTS

The table, virtually complete as to time, place and general shock, included data for 169 tests. It was compiled by Dr. Gerald W. Johnson of the University of California's Lawrence Radiation Laboratory at Livermore, Calif.

It was released as part of a research memorandum on "Probing the Earth with Nuclear Explosions," prepared by Prof. Frank Press of the California Institute of Technology and David Griggs of the University of California at Los Angeles. Both are consultants to Rand, a nonprofit research corporation that had been asked by the AEC for advice on its Plowshare project. This is the plan for nuclear blasting of a harbor at Cape Thompson, Alaska.

The scientists suggested that installation of seismographic equipment for the Alaska project would be helpful in determing how a nuclear test ban could best be policed.

The program, they said in their summary, might well lead to improvement in detection techniques required to make a network of seismic stations worthy of more confidence as an arms control device

RECHECK URGED

The scientists urged seismologists to use the table to recheck their records. They implied much more data could become clear to observers, given the actual source-strength, time and location of the explosions, something that can never be done for earthquakes.

The table listed balloon shots ranging in intensity from seventeen one-hundredths of a ton to 6,000 tons. One device was exploded from a balloon at 86,000 feet. Many of the Pacific shots were on barges.

The strongest shots at the Nevada test range were given at a 74,300-ton balloon experiment of July 3, 1957, and a 60,000-ton air drop on June 4, 1953.

The nominal A-bomb, which was dropped on Hiroshima, had a power equivalent of 20,000 tons of TNT.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, if Congress were permitted to act in an intelligent manner at this time, Congress would content itself with passing the appropriation bills necessary to keep the Government functioning and would leave the consideration of the pending bill and all other controversial matters to the action of the Congress which is destined to convene in January.

The Members of Congress—that is, the Members of both Houses—have been engaged in legislative activities since January 7 of this year, and by reason thereof ought to be able at this time to give their attention to other matters. This Congress should not be required to legislate under existing conditions because its Members have been attempting to run in what one may call high legislative gear ever since January. By reason of that fact, they are, to a considerable extent, exhausted by their previous labors.

In the second place, this is no time for Congress to be attempting to act upon bills which may affect the way of life of this Nation, because of the heightened political tensions which prevail in Washington in a year in which each of the major parties is bending every effort to have its choice for President chosen for the White House. As a consequence of this second factor, Members of Congress are being compelled to legislate under circumstances in which they are likely to be subjected to the temptation to substitute the welfare of their political party for that of the Nation.

Moreover, we are being compelled to act upon a bill of crucial importance under circumstances which generate a considerable amount of impatience, or at least are calculated to engender a considerable amount of impatience, among the advocates of the bill, who have convinced themselves of its desirability, and who wish to go about other pursuits. So notwithstanding the fact that the committee which reported the bill to the Senate began hearings on the bill on May 7, 1959, and did not complete action thereon until June 27, 1960, a period of 13 months and 20 days, some of the advocates of the bill are demanding that those of us who did not have the privilege of serving on that committee, or ascertaining the contents of the bill and its implications, should not be allowed to spend more than 2 or 3 days considering a bill of this magnitude.

For these reasons, it would be wise for Congress to postpone the further consideration of this bill and the consideration of all other bills, except the appropriation bills which are necessary to the continued operation of the Government, until the beginning of the next Congress, in January, when these bills can be considered by Senators and by Members of the House of Representatives who have had some rest from their legislative duties. At that time the bills could be considered by Members who will be free from political tensions and in consequence free from the temptation to succumb to what they conceive to be the political advantage of their parties, rather than the welfare of their country. At that time we could also legislate not only in an atmosphere free from such tensions and temptations, but also in an atmosphere in which patience would prevail and adequate consideration could be given to all the implications of the bill which affects the Nation so vitally.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the able and distinguished junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], with the understanding that in doing so I shall not lose the privilege of the floor, and with the further understanding that his remarks will be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

In accordance with the order, Mr. FULBRIGHT'S remarks will be found in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. ERVIN.

[At this point Mr. ERVIN yielded to several Senators, whose remarks appear at the conclusion of Mr. ERVIN'S speech.]

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, when I yielded to Senators I was saying that if the Senate were permitted to act in an intelligent fashion in this presidential election year, it would leave the consideration of the pending bill to the Congress which is destined to convene in January, and thus free itself from an attempt to legislate in a hurry, from the impatience of those who demand speedy action on this important measure, from any danger of succumbing to the political temptations that permeate Washington at this time, and from the possibility that Members of the Senate may be charged with placing political considerations above the welfare of their country with respect to the proposed legislation. The country has endured since 1789 without this bill, and could do so until January.

I realize, however, that under the peculiar circumstances now existing this cannot be done. This makes it all the more imperative that the Senate shall give adequate consideration to a bill of the momentous consequences of the pending bill and to the philosophy which prompts the advocacy of the bill by its proponents.

Mr. President, I have always supported the Fair Labor Standards Act in its present form, because it is restricted by its terms to workers engaged in interstate commerce, or in the production of goods for interstate commerce. I have also advocated the enactment of minimum wage laws by the States for workers engaged in intrastate activities.

In legislating in this particular field, as envisioned in the terms of the pending bill, we might as well recognize that the bill marks the initial effort to have Congress take over the regulation of hours of labor and working conditions and wages for all employees in all businesses, regardless of whether those businesses have any direct relation to interstate commerce or are related exclusively to intrastate commerce.

I have much serious concern for the proposed legislation, and I have given serious consideration to its implications. I have arrived at the deliberate conclusion that there is a question which underlies this bill that must be faced by us in voting on the bill. That question is of transcendent importance, an importance far beyond the question of hours of labor or the question of minimum wages.

We received by inheritance a goodly land, with the soundest system of government and the soundest system of economy ever known to any men on the face of the earth. We must preserve these things.

I am given pause, in my study of the bill, by a wise statement attributed to a man who once sat upon the Supreme Court of the United States by another great judge, who once sat with rare distinction upon one of the court of appeals of the United States. Judge Learned Hand attributed this statement, in substance, to Justice Brandeis:

> The States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only society in which personality can exist.

I have an abiding conviction of the absolute truth of the assertion attributed to Justice Brandeis by Judge Learned Hand. We have seen during recent years a continued centralization of power in Washington.

I am convinced that the States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding political surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only society in which and the only government under which personality can survive. This conviction gives me pause in my approach to the pending bill.

I am glad that the able and distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts is on the floor, because I wish to refer to a statement he made in the presentation of the bill. He is quoted at page 16174 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as having said:

> There is no merit to the argument that the bill changes the balance between State and Federal authority.

I take issue with that statement. At the present time, the States have the power to regulate the fields covered by the bill.

Incidentally, we are told by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] that the enactment of the bill is only one step, but an essential step, forward as we cross this frontier to grasp the high opportunities which face the Nation.

I construe that remark to imply that this bill is the first step in carrying out the philosophy that the Federal Government should have the power to regulate the minimum wages and working conditions of employees in industries, not only directly connected with interstate commerce, and not only directly connected with the production of goods for interstate commerce, but in all industries regardless of whether they be local or interstate.

I cannot agree with the proposition that the bill does not involve a change in the balance between State and Federal authority. At the present time, 28 States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, have minimum wage laws of one kind or another. Those States include the following: Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Hawaii, Idaho, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, Wyoming, North Dakota, Oregon, Washington, Wisconsin, Arizona, Kentucky, Illinois, Arkansas, South Dakota, and my own State of North Carolina, whose legislature adopted a minimum wage law providing for a minimum wage, with some specified exceptions, of 75 cents for all workers engaged in any local business employing six or more workers.

We know that under recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court may hold, if the pending bill is passed, and other statutes are adopted, carrying out the philosophy of the advocates of the bill, that the enactments by Congress supersede, under the doctrine of preemption, all of the laws of the 28 States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico now existing in this field. Moreover, the Court may hold not only that the enactments by Congress will have that result, but also they will prevent these States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any other States, from enacting any laws of this kind in the future.

Indeed, the bill and the philosophy which underlies it, and any other legislative provisions based on such philosophy are actually designed to destroy the balance between the States and the Federal Government in this field by giving the Federal Government exclusive jurisdiction of it.

Before I come to a discussion of the bill itself, I wish to say that the decisions upholding the constitutionality of the Fair Labor Standards Act do not sustain the constitutionality of the provisions of the pending bill. This is true because the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Overnight Motor Transportation Company v. Missel, which is reported in 361 U.S. 572, makes the constitutionality of the Fair Labor Standards Act dependent upon the fact that its provisions are confined to workers engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce. Therefore, the Fair Labor Standards Act in its present form was sustained as constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States because the regulations contained in the act had a direct relation to interstate commerce; and Congress is permitted, by the Constitution, to regulate interstate commerce.

With reference to another argument on this point, it is true that the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, or, as it is technically known, the National Labor Relations Act, as set forth in subsection 7 of section 152 of title 29, use the term "affecting commerce." However, the decisions under the Taft-Hartley Act likewise have no relation to this term as it is used in the pending bill. This is so because the pending bill provides, in effect, that the definition of the term "affecting commerce" in the Taft-Hartley Act has no application to the provisions of the pending bill.

I say that because the bill gives an entirely different definition to the term "affecting commerce" from that employed in the Taft-Hartley law.

I call attention, first, to the term "affecting commerce" as used in subsection 7 of section 152 of title 29, United States Code:

> The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

In upholding the constitutionality of this term as used in the Taft-Hartley Act, Chief Justice Hughes said, in the Jones and Laughlin case, 301 U.S. 1:

> This definition is one of exclusion as well as inclusion. The grant of authority to the Board does not purport to extend to the relationship between all industrial employees and employers. Its terms do not impose collective bargaining upon all industry regardless of effects upon interstate or foreign commerce. It purports to reach only what may be deemed to burden or obstruct that commerce and, thus qualified, it must be construed as contemplating the exercise of control within constitutional bounds. It is a familiar principle that acts which directly burden or obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, or its free flow, are within the reach of the congressional power.

Mr. President, that makes it very clear that the phrase "affecting commerce," as used in the Taft-Hartley Act, refers only to actions which directly burden or obstruct interstate or foreign commerce or its free flow.

As I have already observed, the definition of the term "affecting commerce," as used in the Taft-Hartley Act, has no application whatever to the provisions of the pending bill.

To sustain this observation, I now read from the pending bill words which appear at the bottom of page 3, in line 25, and at the top of page 4, in lines 1, 2, and 3:

> (s) "Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

So we can see something of the breadth and the uncertainty which would be introduced into the law by means of the use of this definition, when we take it in its broadest sense. Instead of confining it to interstate or foreign commerce or matters burdening or obstructing such commerce or the free flow of such commerce, the bill provides for regulation based upon any activities "necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce."

It might well be argued that in order to have interstate commerce in plow points, it is necessary to have someone use the plow points, and that therefore the use of plow points in a State other than that of their manufacture is necessary to commerce, because if they are not used they would not be manufactured and shipped in interstate commerce. So we begin with a definition so broad that no human being can envision the outermost bounds of the activities embraced within that definition or the lengths to which regulations under it can be carried.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes, Mr. President; I am glad to yield to the able and distinguished senior Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Let me say that I have been glad to hear the presentation made by the Senator from North Carolina in pointing out the difference between the definition contained in the National Labor Relations Act and the one contained in the pending bill, as regards the words "affecting commerce." If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me to do so, I should like to refer briefly to that part of his presentation.

The Senator from North Carolina said that the definition of the words "affecting commerce," as set forth in the National Labor Relations Act, is as follows:

> In commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

Let me ask this question of the Senator from North Carolina: The National Labor Relations Act contemplated a procedure under which—if possible—labor disputes would not be permitted to grow to a point where interstate commerce was impeded or obstructed. Is there a casual connection between the purpose of the National Labor Relations Act and the definition, contained in that act, of the words "affecting commerce"? By that, I mean the definition which states that it shall be considered commerce only if it burdens or obstructs commerce or prevents the free flow of commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. That is the interpretation the Supreme Court placed upon the quotation just referred to; the Court did that in the Jones and Laughlin case.

There is no relationship between the words "affecting commerce," as used in the Taft-Hartley Act, and those words as used in this bill, because the Taft-Hartley Act, in the one case, and the pending bill, in the other, give entirely different definitions of those words.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Then, Mr. President, if I correctly understand the Senator from North Carolina, there is a direct relationship between the purpose of the National Labor Relations Act and the definition of the words "affecting commerce."

Mr. ERVIN. Yes; the Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct, because when Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act, it was attempting by means of that definition to delimit—and it did successfully delimit—the scope and the extent of the law to workers who are engaged in interstate commerce—that is to say, those engaged in the actual transmission of goods or communications—and workers engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce, which is quite a far cry from a bill which undertakes to regulate sales or the persons making sales entirely within the bounds of a State—as in the case of this particular bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Now directing the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the definition of the words "affecting commerce," as set forth in the pending bill, we observe that the definition is as follows:

(s) "Activity affecting commerce" includes any activity, business, or industry in commerce or necessary to commerce or to the production of goods for, or the distribution of goods in, commerce.

Will the Senator from North Carolina point out his understanding of why there is no relationship between the purpose of the pending bill and the definition given the words "affecting commerce"?

Mr. ERVIN. Because if it were enacted into law, and if its constitutionality were sustained, the pending bill would carry the regulation of commerce far beyond the field of interstate commerce, and into the field of intrastate commerce. In other words it would carry the regulations prescribed by the bill into what are essentially local activities which the courts in times past have held are not interstate commerce at all.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What is the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina as to the validity of the statement that there was an effect in the Taft-Hartley bill to regulate activities which impeded the flow of commerce? In the bill pending before the Senate there is no impediment or obstruction required. The bill operates upon a static condition within the State.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct. The proponents of the bill undertake to give a meaning to this very obscure term, by putting within the coverage of the bill certain establishments which are engaged solely in local activities and which do not have any direct relationship whatever to interstate commerce. They make the coverage of the bill as to retailers dependent solely upon the volume of business done, regardless of whether that business is done in goods manufactured within the borders of the State and regardless of whether that volume consists of sales made solely to the citizens of the State. This clearly shows that the bill is designed to extend the term "affecting commerce" to what are solely local activities.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is, after the words "affecting commerce" were supposedly defined, the promoters of the bill found it necessary to give an example of what would be covered by saying any business doing a $1 million volume of trade.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. I also call attention to subsection (3) of the section from which the definition is taken, as set forth on lines 18, 19, and 20, on page 4, which has no relation whatever to any kind of interstate commerce. This provision of the bill brings under its coverage street, suburban, interurban electric railways and trolleys and motorbus carriers, even though their operations are restricted solely to localities in a State.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator from North Carolina give me an opinion of what the situation would be with regard to retail and service establishments if the limitation of a $1 million business was not written into subparagraph (1)? That is, let us say the bill read, "any such enterprise which has one or more retail or service establishments." If the language ended there, what businesses would be covered?

Mr. ERVIN. If the figure "$1 million" were cut out, the provisions of the bill would cover all retail and service establishments having employees. If the philosophy of the proponents of this bill prevails, the figure "$1 million" will soon be reduced or cut out. And this despite the fact that the law has been stated as follows, and I read from 15 Corpus Juris Secundum on Commerce, section 26, page 301:

The local sale of goods after they have been brought into the State from another State and come to rest there is not a transaction in interstate commerce.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That is, if there were excluded from the bill the clause "if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $1 million," then the bill would cover every shoeshop, every shoeshining establishment, and every type of business within the country?

Mr. ERVIN. Absolutely; and even with the "$1 million" in the bill, it would cover retail businesses and service establishments, which under the law as it has always been interpreted have been held to be essentially matters of intrastate commerce.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the $1 million condition which the bill declares must exist to make the operator amenable to the law were reduced to $500,000, many more operations would then be encompassed within the provisions of the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. The "$1 million" limitation is just the first station on the line to which the philosophy which underlies this bill leads.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I would like to have the Senator discuss a bit further the statement that "this is the first station on the line."

Mr. ERVIN. This is the first station on the line to which the philosophy which underlies this bill leads.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What is the philosophy?

Mr. ERVIN. The philosophy of those who propose legislation of this character is that the power which the States have to regulate the relations between employers and employees, even in what are essentially local activities, should be taken from them and vested in a centralized Federal Government in the city of Washington.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator give consideration to this question? Will the enactment of this bill take jurisdiction away from the States in the fields in which they are now operating?

Mr. ERVIN. It undoubtedly will. Indeed, the only reason given for the enactment of this bill is that the States are not exercising their legal power wisely in the view of the proponents of the bill. There is no question about that, and I should like to discuss that point a little later.

We have received a goodly inheritance. That inheritance consists of a system of government which came out of the experience of mankind in his search for a way in which he could rule himself without losing his liberty and without losing the right to act as a free agent. I quoted the statement which Judge Learned Hand attributed to Judge Brandeis, that the States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only society in which personality can survive.

I think the Founding Fathers knew the truth of that statement. They were wise men. They had studied the experience of the past, and they created this Government in the light of their study of the experience of mankind in searching for a way in which he might be governed without losing his liberty. I think that is reflected clearly in the Constitution.

Let us consider for a moment the kind of government that was created by the Constitution, and then consider the reasons which prompted the Founding Fathers to create that kind of government. In the first place, it is well to remember that the Thirteen Original States were in existence some 13 years, If I remember correctly, before the United States came into existence.

Virtually every one of those 13 States had suffered much at the hands of the English Government, a government which was far removed from their people. So when the people of those 13 States came to write their State constitutions, before the Constitution of the United States was ever envisaged by them, virtually every State did the same thing my State of North Carolina did. Each put into its constitution a statement to the effect that the State had the right to regulate and to manage its own internal affairs. The people did that because they had learned something by experience. They had learned that there is nothing more dangerous to the right of people to be free human beings than for people to be subjected to a centralized government or a government far removed from the people it governs. So these 13 States which created the United States were very particular to set out in their State constitutions that the States should have the power to regulate their internal affairs.

Those principles were in being when the Constitution was adopted, and were retained after the Constitution was adopted. The men who met in Philadelphia in 1787 and drafted the Constitution of the United States took particular pains to separate the powers of government between the Federal Government on the one hand and the State governments on the other hand. They established, by a written constitution, a national government which they intended to have no powers whatever except those delegated to it by the written Constitution. They provided for the reservation by the States or by the people of all powers not delegated by that written constitution to the Federal Government nor prohibited by it to the States.

This provision was expressly incorporated in the 10th amendment, because some of the States refused to ratify the Constitution until they were assured that this reservation would be expressly set forth. The 10th amendment, as the Senator from Ohio so well knows, provides in express words:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

In the Constitution the Founding Fathers expressly granted to the Congress of the United States the power to regulate interstate commerce; that is, commerce among the States. Let us consider for a moment what constitutes interstate commerce. I read from 11 American Jurisprudence, the article on commerce, section 4, on page 8:

The phrase "among the several States," as used in the constitutional provision above quoted, and the term "interstate commerce" distinguish between commerce which concerns more States than one and that commerce which is confined within one State and does not affect other States. The distinguishing feature and indispensable element of interstate commerce is importation into one State from another. Such commerce, however, is not confined to transportation among the States, but comprehends all commercial intercourse between different States and all the component parts of that intercourse.

This bill has no proper relation to interstate commerce, because it undertakes to regulate conditions in commerce which are confined to one State. All of the specific cases enumerated in the bill after the broad definition relate to businesses which are engaged in commercial dealings within a State.

This is an effort, as I have said, to give to the Federal Government the power to regulate what are purely local activities notwithstanding the fact that they constitute intrastate commerce and are beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, if the Constitution is to be interpreted as it has always been interpreted.

While the Constitution gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States, it reserves to the States the power to regulate intrastate commerce. I wish to read from 15 Corpus Juris Secundum, the article on commerce, section 10, page 266.

A State has an inherent and reserved right to regulate its local, domestic, and internal commerce. The only limitations on this right are that it must be exercised in a manner not interfering with, or placing a burden on, interstate commerce, and that it is subject to such regulation of interstate commerce as Congress properly may and does make in order to regulate and protect interstate commerce. Within these limits, the power of a State to control and regulate its purely internal commerce is full, complete, plenary, unrestricted by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and free of the dominion of Congress.

Under all of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States antedating the last 25 years, there would be no doubt of the fact that sales made by retailers within the bounds of a State, even of goods which had been imported from other States for that purpose, constituted intrastate commerce subject to regulation by the State alone.

The same observation applies to service establishments operated solely within the bounds of the State. The same observation applies to railroads, because the Supreme Court of the United States held in a number of cases that logging roads which began and terminated in a State were engaged in intrastate commerce and not in interstate commerce.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ERVIN. I will yield in just a moment. I should like to make a further point on the rules of law.

I read from 11 American Jurisprudence, the article on commerce, section 8, page 10:

The constitutional provision which confers upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes" grants all of the authority which the United States has over commerce. The respective powers of Congress and the States under this provision are divided into three fields: (1) That in which the authority of Congress is exclusive; (2) that in which the power of the State is exclusive; and (3) that in which the State may act in the absence of legislation by Congress.

Under the decisions antedating 25 years ago it was held with absolute clarity that a local retailing business, a local service establishment, a local transportation system, and all other local activities, constituted intrastate commerce, subject to regulation by the State. If those decisions still have any validity, virtually everything covered by pages 4 and 5 of the bill are activities which fall within one of the three sections of the statement I have just read, namely, section (2), the field in which the power of the State is exclusive.

For that reason there is grave doubt about the constitutionality of the provisions of the bill, which clearly on their face are attempts to transfer from State regulation to the regulation of Congress activities which in times past have always been held to fall within the area in which the power of the State is exclusive.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from North Carolina has uttered words which reaffirm his declaration that in the absence of the limitation of businesses doing a volume of $1 million, the language of the definition comprehends all activities, and if it comprehends all activities, it comprehends what the Constitution contemplated as being an activity exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State; is that not correct?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes; the bill would cover all retail and service establishments, even though all of their activities were local. The same answer would apply with respect to laundries, and cleaning establishments, and establishments engaged in repairing of clothing, and operating local systems of transportation.

If the $250,000 limitation were removed from subsection 5, on page 5, the bill would cover every filling station in which people are employed, even though all sales are made within the State in which the station is located.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator has pointed out three conditions, any one of which may prevail. Those conditions are first areas of activity in which the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction, under the traditional definition of "interstate commerce"; second, areas of activity in which the State has sole jurisdiction; third, areas of activity in which the State has jurisdiction in the absence of action by the Federal Congress.

Is it not a fact that when the Constitution was adopted, the writers and adopters of it knew of the jealous views of the States with respect to being free from central domination, and therefore they agreed that the Federal Government is best equipped to exercise jurisdiction over commerce crossing State lines, but that State governments are best equipped to handle commerce within the States, and therefore it should be left to the States?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Ohio has expressed the concept of the Founding Fathers in as accurate a fashion as it can possibly be stated.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In effect, they said "those things which the States cannot conveniently and effectively handle, we shall turn over to the Federal Government. Those things which occur within our borders and which have no relationship to foreign nations, to sister States, or to the Indian tribes, we shall handle domestically within the State."

Mr. ERVIN. Exactly.

Mr. LAUSCHE. May I have the opinion of the Senator from North Carolina as to what would happen to that basic philosophy should we attempt to exercise control by the Federal Government over intrastate business as well as interstate?

Mr. ERVIN. It would mean that the Federal Government had swallowed up the States.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That was the fear of the States when they said to the Federal Government, "We will adopt this Constitution, but beware of any efforts to begin intruding in our sovereign and dignified right to control our domestic and intrastate affairs."

Mr. ERVIN. When they took that position, they had in mind an indisputable truth, taught by history in every generation in which mankind has sought to govern himself or in which mankind has been governed by others. That truth is this: No civilization can long survive when unlimited power is concentrated in any hands whatsoever. So the Founding Fathers divided the powers of government. They would not concentrate them. This bill is an embodiment of the philosophy that all governmental powers relating to minimum wages and hours of labor shall be concentrated in Washington and that the States shall be deprived of any power over these things.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator express an opinion on this statement? Is it not a fact that there are at least two vital problems connected with the bill that must be approached separately and distinguished from each other? One, the general effect of any attempt to fix a minimum wage for those working in interstate commerce, and, second, the usurpation by the Federal Government of a power that historically, traditionally, and by the terms of the Constitution, at least up until 25 years ago, was admittedly a domestic matter to be handled by the States?

Mr. ERVIN. I believe the Senator has put his finger on the crucial questions which confront us here. One question is whether the bill is constitutional. Another is whether it is wise if it be constitutional. If it be constitutional, is it a practical thing to do? Is it practical to centralize this power in Washington? Are Members of Congress so much wiser than State legislators, that they possess a competency which the States legislators do not have to legislate in this field?

Another question arises. Is it wise to take from local government power necessary to control the affairs of the locality simply because Congress may think the local government may have acted unwisely in the field covered by such power?

If we are to have government at any level, we must allow those who legislate to make choices. Are we going to rob people of the States of their power to legislate in State legislatures because they might choose to act foolishly instead of wisely? If we should deprive people of the right to make a choice between what is wise and what is foolish, then we would rob them of all liberty whatsoever.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator is fully informed as to the creation, growth, and fall of governments. Would the Senator care to discuss what has happened in the past to centralized governments that began with supposedly a benevolent, merciful, and benign attitude?

Mr. ERVIN. I believe the Senator from Ohio is more competent than is the Senator from North Carolina to discuss that question; I should like to discuss a little further the question which the Senator from Ohio has raised with reference to robbing the States of power to regulate this field.

Even if we assume that the Supreme Court of the United States will disregard the obvious intent of the Founding Fathers when it passes on the provisions of this bill, and stretch the definition of "interstate commerce" to the utmost bounds advocated by the proponents of this bill, we would still have a situation falling in the third classification of the statement I have read, namely, the field in which the State may act in the absence of legislation by Congress. In the light of the fact that 28 States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico have already acted in this field, the argument that this bill does not undertake to alter the balance between Federal and State authority is absolutely without validity.

There is a disease called "Potomac fever," which sometimes afflicts a Senator or a Congressman. A victim of this disease suffers under the delusion that the people who sent him to Washington to legislate on the national scene do not have sufficient intelligence to attend to their own business on the local level. As a consequence, he wants to transfer all local governmental powers to the Federal Government.

I was struck yesterday by the argument of some of our brethren who asserted in substance—not specifically, but in substance—that when the people of a State elect a man to the U.S. Senate, they act wisely and elect a wise man to represent them in the Senate; whereas, when these same people choose men to represent them in the State legislature, they act foolishly and choose incompetent men to represent them in the State legislature. That is a queer theory. I do not accept it. I believe there is a great deal more wisdom on the local level in respect to local problems than in Washington, and I have always believed that. Certainly nothing I have seen or heard since I have come on the Washington scene has altered my conviction on that point.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does that mean to imply that all of us in the Senate are richly endowed with wisdom, and that those in the State legislatures are dull and unwise people?

Mr. ERVIN. That argument was voiced on the floor of the Senate, and it left me with the impression that some of the advocates of the bill entertain that opinion. This is true because the only reason they give for the passage of the bill is their contention that the State legislatures have not exercised wisely the power which they have in this field. The proponents of the bill assign this as a reason for depriving the States of their power and transferring it to the Federal Government. I do not believe that people necessarily exercise wisdom when they elect Senators and necessarily lose that wisdom when they elect people to represent them in their State legislature, events which may occur in the same election, on the same ballot.

When all is said, the only reason given for the bill is that some States have not passed wage and hour laws, and other States have not exercised their power in passing such laws in the same manner in which the proponents of the bill would have exercised it had they been acting for such States. But Congress does not always act wisely. This assertion finds proof in the fact that Congress has permitted the national debt to rise to $290 billion.

As a general rule, the States do not exhibit any such financial irresponsibility. For this reason, I think we can still believe that perhaps there is some wisdom left on the local level. I certainly affirm that is the case in respect to North Carolina. The North Carolina Legislature in its recent session adopted a minimum wage law, providing a minimum wage of 75 cents an hour in most industries. Undoubtedly, as experience under the law is acquired, the State will establish a higher minimum wage.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator has stated that we are spending money and transferring the obligation of paying it back to our grandchildren and to our great-grandchildren, and that we have already spent that heritage.

Mr. ERVIN. We have certainly put a tremendous mortgage on every child's future. Every child born in the United States finds himself burdened at birth with a per capita share of the national debt amounting to over $1,600.

I wish to discuss the motives which prompted the Founding Fathers to divide the powers of government between the Federal Government on the national level and the State on the local level.

Before I get to that point, however, I wish to go back to the question of whether the Senate and the House, acting as Congress, possess more wisdom than State legislatures in this field. I believe I can cite one instance which shows the incompetency of Congress in legislating in a related field. It arises out of the Taft-Hartley Act, which is also in the field of employer-employee relations.

I have never heard of a State legislature that did not believe the old maxim of law, which is so sound and so necessary to any system of justice worthy of the name, that is, that there is no wrong without a legal remedy. Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act and with it created two situations in which wrongs were denied remedies. One of these situations still exists. Under the act no one can sue for an injunction to prevent an unfair labor practice except the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

So when Congress adopted the Taft-Hartley law—and that provision is still in the law—it stipulated that a man who suffers a wrong involving an unfair labor practice has no remedy unless the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board sees fit to invoke the remedy in his behalf. Moreover, for many years the National Labor Relations Board refused to entertain jurisdiction of many controversies arising under the Taft-Hartley Act which the National Labor Relations Board considered too insignificant for it to deal with, notwithstanding they were of vital importance to the persons involved in them. As the result of that refusal to take jurisdiction, what was called the no man's land in labor laws arose.

As a result of the action of the National Labor Relation Board in refusing to take jurisdiction and of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that under the doctrine of preemption the Taft-Hartley Act prevailed over State laws, the State courts were denied jurisdiction even in labor controversies not covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. Congress changed that the last time it amended the Taft-Hartley Labor Act. However, the fact still remains that under the Taft-Hartley law, which was enacted by Congress, not by a State legislature, there are still situations where people possess rights which they cannot vindicate and suffer wrongs which they cannot redress.

I agree with what Prof. Sylvester Petro states on this point on page 298 of his book entitled "Power Unlimited—The Corruption of Union Leadership":

> The best laws in the world are not worth a tinker's dam if the persons hurt by unlawful conduct cannot count upon immediate and direct access to the courts and immediate relief from the courts.

I say that when it enacts a law under which men suffer legal wrongs without means of redress, or possess legal rights which they cannot vindicate, Congress demonstrates at least a partial incompetency to legislate wisely.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator feel that the language of the bill, as I heard stated earlier today, is wider or broader language than that of the Taft-Hartley Act, so far as coverage is concerned, so far as "affecting commerce" is concerned? Does he believe that our interpretation in the bill is broader than the language of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes, because under the Taft-Hartley Act the definition of "affecting commerce" is an entirely different definition. It is restricted to matters in commerce and matters obstructing commerce. The Supreme Court held in the Jones and Laughlin case that the Taft-Hartley Act covered only activities which directly affected interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator from North Carolina know of any area which is covered in the bill which is not also covered by the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ERVIN. Certainly; many activities which are covered in the bill are not covered by Taft-Hartley.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am talking about retail stores.

Mr. ERVIN. I say that the bill covers many enterprises, in subsection 1, which are not covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would not the Senator say that retail stores are covered, down to a very low figure, by the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ERVIN. Not unless they have a direct effect upon interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator know how the National Labor Relations Board defined that language? It set an arbitrary figure. Originally it was $50,000; now it is up to $250,000. Originally they said it applied to any business doing $50,000 worth of business. Now it applies to any business doing $250,000 worth of business. We have set the figure at $1 million. So what is affected?

Mr. ERVIN. Not unless the activities directly bear upon interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not believe the National Labor Relations Board has ever put the question to a test, but businesses down to a very low figure are covered by the definition in the Taft-Hartley Act.

I may say to the Senator that I know of no area which is covered in the bill, which, if there should be a labor dispute in those industries, would not be covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. ERVIN. Will the Senator tell me what he means by "activities necessary to the distribution of goods in interstate commerce" or "in commerce"?

Mr. KENNEDY. I should say the definition we have attempted to develop in the bill is somewhat different from the Taft-Hartley definition, because we are not talking about obstructing commerce; we are not talking about leading or tending to lead to a labor dispute.

On the other hand, while the thrust of our definition goes in a somewhat different direction, my point is that I do not believe it really broadens the jurisdiction of the Federal Government in interstate commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will answer my question and tell me what those words mean, I may agree with him. But until he does, I shall have to disagree with him.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. ERVIN. What does the phrase "activity necessary to the distribution of goods in interstate commerce" mean?

Mr. KENNEDY. We are talking about an employee who is carrying on a function in a store—let us say a retail store—which is necessary to the distribution of goods in commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. In other words, if he sells me a suit of clothes, then he is under the language of the bill? That is considered an activity?

Mr. KENNEDY. I should say that if he sold the Senator a suit of clothes, and the store did an annual business of $1 million, the store would come within the meaning of the language of the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Even though the clothes may have been manufactured in the State in which I bought them?

Mr. KENNEDY. All the material in the clothes?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. And the Senator lives within the State?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the company is doing a business of $1 million, it is assumed, within the $1 million definition, that there is a sufficient crossing of State lines.

Mr. ERVIN. There is no magic in the figure "$1 million."

Mr. KENNEDY. Let us consider the same company. Does the Senator believe that if there is a strike in the company he describes, the National Labor Relations Board would not have jurisdiction?

Mr. ERVIN. It is quite conceivable that the situation might be such that the Board would not have jurisdiction, because the activities of the company might not have any direct impact upon interstate commerce or its flow.

Mr. KENNEDY. All I can say is that the National Labor Relations Board has assumed total jurisdiction in all disputes in the retail trade in companies having a dollar value $750,000 less than the figure proposed in the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. I am not in possession of all the cases. But I believe the Senator from Massachusetts is wrong because the National Labor Relations Board has no jurisdiction unless the case involves activities which directly affect interstate commerce or the flow of goods in interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. But the Board has used that dollar figure for its definition.

Mr. ERVIN. I wish the Senator would tell me to what activity he refers.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have attempted to do so. The Senator from North Carolina gave me an example. I should say that filling out a bill for an across-State activity would be affecting interstate commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is getting into interstate commerce when he talks about filling out a bill. When a man sells me a suit of clothes which his company received in interstate commerce, is that an activity which affects interstate commerce?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. ERVIN. Can the Senator from Massachusetts tell me what is covered by the pending bill if the dollar figures are eliminated?

Mr. KENNEDY. I should say it would be a matter for a definition by the courts as to what is covered by the bill—what is and what is not interstate commerce; and what is in interstate commerce, if the dollar exemption does not apply. If we passed a bill using the definition we now have, and having no dollar exemption figure, then I should say it would be, as it is in other cases, a matter for the courts to decide.

Mr. ERVIN. There is no magic in figures. Here we might use the figure $1,000. That would not affect the power of the States.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the Senator suggest that the language is unwise or that it is unconstitutional?

Mr. ERVIN. I suggest there is a grave doubt about its constitutionality. I say it is exceedingly unwise for Congress to enact a law which, if it is constitutional at all would take away from the States the power to regulate what are essentially local interests.

Mr. KENNEDY. It seems to me there is a legitimate area for dispute as to whether the language is wise or not. However, I must say it is difficult for me to accept the view that it is unconstitutional, even though I am impressed, as always, by the argument of the Senator from North Carolina.

I think the coverage which I have seen in the Labor-Management Act of 1959, under the Taft-Hartley Act, and under the other statutes of the Federal Government, does not indicate that we are breaking new ground in extending the power of the Federal Government. It may be unwise for us to go at this particular time into this particular field; but I cannot accept the view that it is unconstitutional to do so.

Mr. ERVIN. I make no absolute pronouncements on its constitutionality. I simply say that if the decisions which prevailed in the United States up to 25 years ago were applied to this bill, the courts would not take more than 15 minutes to adjudge it unconstitutional. I realize that since that time there have been men appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States who are convinced that all the major governmental powers ought to be centralized in Washington. In consequence, the Court has handed down some decisions which are hard to reconcile with the prior decisions, and are even hard to reconcile with the term "interstate commerce."

I cannot speculate about what the courts will say about the language of the bill, so I shall not say, as a dogmatic opinion, that it is unconstitutional. I simply say that I believe the bill is absolutely inconsistent with the intent of the Founding Fathers, when they divided the powers of the Government between the Federal Government, on the national level, and the States, on the local level.

I say, further, that I think it is unwise for us to assume that we possess more wisdom than the legislatures of the 50 States, and that, therefore, we should deprive them of the right to legislate in this field, either wholly or in part.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am certain the Senator from North Carolina is aware of the fact that a good many States have no minimum wage laws.

Mr. ERVIN. I am aware of that fact. I am also aware of the fact that 28 of the 50 States, and the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, have minimum wage laws of one kind or another.

I am aware, further, of the fact that the legislature of my State of North Carolina, at the last session, passed a minimum wage law. I am convinced that when North Carolina has had enough experience under the law, it will increase the coverage of the act and will also increase the minimum wage.

I am also convinced of the fact that the North Carolina Legislature is far better acquainted with the conditions prevailing in North Carolina, and is far more competent to legislate on this subject with respect to North Carolina, than the able and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and myself and the other 98 Senators and 437 Representatives combined.

Mr. KENNEDY. Can the Senator from North Carolina tell me how much the minimum wage in North Carolina is?

Mr. ERVIN. Seventy-five cents.

Mr. KENNEDY. Seventy-five cents?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I take it that 75 cents is an unsatisfactory wage in an industry which does a total business of $1 million. I consider a minimum wage of 75 cents an hour for a 40-hour week a substandard wage in either North Carolina, Massachusetts, or any other State of the Union. And because many States do not make an effort to enact any minimum wage law, much less one calling for 75 cents an hour, I believe that it is the responsibility of the Federal Government to take action in the areas which are in interstate commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Massachusetts has a conviction in his own capacity which I respect most highly, but which I do not share, because I think the North Carolina Legislature is more competent to legislate for local North Carolina industry than is the Senator from Massachusetts, as I have said, or myself or any of the other 98 Members of the Senate or any of the 437 Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KENNEDY. But the Senator from North Carolina knows that on a minimum wage of 75 cents an hour it is rather difficult for a single person to support himself. The cost of living does not vary so much from State to State that anyone can live on a very luxurious scale when being paid 75 cents an hour.

As a practical matter, the difficulty the State legislatures meet is the one which the Senate and the House of Representatives meet. The people we are helping by means of this bill do not in most cases know anything about the bill. They have not read about it; they are not informed about it; they do not have in Washington representatives who tell them about it. Therefore, they are not informed about it, and they are unable to bring influence to bear on the State legislatures.

But the lobbyists who represent the businesses which are affected by this bill are "on top of" every State legislature. Therefore, when an effort is made to have a decent minimum wage bill enacted by the 50 State legislatures, which are subject to having so many pressures and so much influence brought to bear, just as such pressure and such influence can be brought to bear on the Congress—there is nothing illegal about it, but it is a fact—I think we end up by being faced with the fact that 20 States have no minimum wage law at all, and many of the States have minimum wage laws which date back to 1915. In one State, the minimum wage for laundry workers is 30 cents an hour.

I say that workers should receive at least $1 an hour, when they are employed by a business which does a total annual business of more than $1 million.

Mr. ERVIN. But where my position differs most essentially from that of the Senator from Massachusetts is that when it is proposed that Congress shall rob the States of a power which they undoubtedly possess under the Constitution, even if we attempt to do so under the assumption that these matters are not exclusively local matters, but when the power under consideration is one which the States undoubtedly possess under the Constitution, and which they can exercise until Congress robs them of it, I think the preservation of that power in the States is of more importance to the country than is the correction on the Federal Government level of what may be conceived unwise exercise of such power by the States.

The Senator from Massachusetts assumes that the State legislatures are more susceptible to improper lobbying than are the Members of the U.S. Congress.

Mr. KENNEDY. I said there was nothing illegal about it. I simply said I recognize the difficulty connected with getting such a bill passed by the U.S. Congress, and I also recognize that it would be extremely difficult to have a bill which provided a decent minimum wage enacted by the legislature of each one of the 50 States; in fact, the facts show that would be an impossible job.

I do not say there is anything improper with the lobbying in either North Carolina or any other State.

Mr. ERVIN. But when the Senator from Massachusetts makes that point, he is making the point that the Federal Congress is more competent to legislate in this field than are the State legislatures.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from North Carolina can state my position as he views it, if he chooses to do so. But I am saying, in stating my own position, that decent, nationwide minimum wage laws have not been passed by all the States, in their own capacities. If the Senator from North Carolina will look at the figures which are set forth in our report, I do not think he can reach any other conclusion.

As a pragmatic matter, some of the States have no minimum wage law at all, and some of the States have minimum wage laws which provide for extremely low minimum wages.

So in an area in which Congress clearly has responsibility, I believe the best thing to do is to have Congress legislate.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Massachusetts says, in effect, that the legislatures of the various States have not acted wisely in this field, in his opinion, and that therefore Congress should take from the States the power which they heretofore have possessed throughout the entire history of our Nation. The Senator from Massachusetts says Congress should take that power from the States because of the failure of the State legislatures to exercise this power wisely.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me state clearly that I think it is true that the State legislatures have failed to pass minimum wage laws which call for a sufficiently high minimum wage. I state that very definitely. I do not think it is possible to read the committee's hearings and reach any other conclusion.

Mr. ERVIN. But if that philosophy were carried to its ultimate extreme, then the people at the local level should be deprived of any and all the power which they have, if they do not exercise it wisely.

Mr. KENNEDY. No; I simply say to the Senator from North Carolina that I think the employees of any business of the size to which we have been referring—a business which does a business of $1 million or more—should receive a minimum wage of at least $1 an hour. That is what all the argument is about.

I hope the Senator from North Carolina will not attempt to put me in a position of engaging in conflict with the Legislature of North Carolina. I have sufficient other problems. [Laughter.]

I only say that I think we should pass a law which provides a sufficiently high minimum wage, because the State legislatures have not done so.

Mr. ERVIN. But I repeat that I think the North Carolina Legislature is more competent than is the Senator from Massachusetts, or myself, or the other 98 Senators, or the 437 Members of the House of Representatives to know what are the actual conditions in North Carolina and to know what the remedies for those conditions should be.

But regardless of that, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in this respect: I do not think that some of the State legislatures have passed adequate minimum-wage laws. I do not think they have passed adequate laws in many other fields in which they are allowed to legislate. But I believe it is essential to the preservation of the kind of government our forefathers established when they wrote the Constitution to have Congress restrict itself to dealing with what are national matters, and to allow the States to regulate local matters. I believe that very definitely, because, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I share in full measure the statement, attributed to Justice Brandeis by Judge Learned Hand, that the States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only kind of society in which personality can exist. I believe that very firmly and very definitely. And I believe this bill transfers to the Federal Government powers which the Founding Fathers thought should be exercised by the States, and which in my judgment can be more wisely exercised by the States than they can by the National Government.

I have served in a State legislative body, and I have seen lobbyists there. I have also served in the Congress, and I have seen lobbyists here. I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that the lobbying which goes on here is intensified about 10,000 times, as compared with that done in respect to the State legislature in which I served; and I suggest that one reason why many persons want to have governmental power centralized in Washington is to enable them to bring upon one legislative body pressure which they are unable to bring upon 50 legislative bodies.

Mr. KENNEDY. I say to the Senator from North Carolina that it is sufficiently difficult to do the job here, let alone try to have it done in all 50 of the State legislatures.

I certainly hope we are not talking about any elaborate attempts to seize power from the States.

We are talking about seeing to it that no one who works in such large industries is paid less than $1 an hour.

I have served for 14 years on the Labor Committee, and I have listened to employers in those areas say they would be ruined if they had to pay their employees $1 an hour. But I do not believe it. And neither do I believe that the State governments would be ruined or destroyed if the Federal Government, through its Congress, were to provide, by means of the proposed law now before us, for the payment of a minimum wage of at least $1 an hour.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has much more confidence in the wisdom of the national legislative bodies than I do. I regret that I cannot share his view on that point. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Massachusetts does not tell me that the philosophy which lies back of this bill is going to be content to stop with a limitation of $1 million gross product; does he?

Mr. KENNEDY. As the Senator knows, this bill is stepped up over a 4-year period, but since the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted 22 years ago, there has been a gradual effort to extend the coverage of the minimum wage. I share that view because what we are talking about is a minimum standard of living. So I would say to the Senator that, within the limits of constitutionality and not causing unemployment as a result of an excessive increase beyond an increase in productivity, this step should be taken. I think there is a definite point which checks us from spreading the minimum wage beyond the point where it would be beneficial, and, instead, would become harmful. But I would certainly favor an increase in the minimum wage within those two limitations.

Mr. ERVIN. It would be highly desirable, from the standpoint of the Senator, would it not, to extend it to every area it might possibly be extended to?

Mr. KENNEDY. What did the Senator say?

Mr. ERVIN. It would be highly desirable, from the standpoint of the Senator, would it not, to extend it to every area it might possibly be extended to, taking into consideration constitutional and economic limitations?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator we have brought to the floor of the Senate a bill which is quite clear. It has a cutoff of $1 million on laundries, and it does provide for a 4-year step-up.

Mr. ERVIN. But is not the most important thing in the bill, from the viewpoint of the Senator from Massachusetts, the fact that it changes the foundation on which the Fair Labor Standards Act rests from that affecting workers engaged in interstate commerce or in producing goods to be transported in interstate commerce?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, it is not the most important. The most important is that we are extending the coverage to 5 million people to start them at a minimum of $1. The Senator may use his own interpretation, but I do not accept the view that it is the chief purpose.

Mr. ERVIN. But the bill does that, does it not?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me so that I may ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Arizona so he may propound one or more interrogatories to the Senator from Massachusetts without my losing the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Massachusetts, a question. We have been discussing this afternoon, or, I should say, the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Ohio have been discussing, a constitutional question; but because the Senator from Massachusetts in his colloquy has injected into the discussion a question of economics, I should like to call his attention to what Mr. Meany said in testifying before the committee. He said:

> Well, this is a field where you've got to make a little progress. It is quite obvious that the minimum standard, the minimum yearly wage required for what we call a decent, normal standard of living is still going to be far above what this $1.25 will bring.
> In fact, the minimum is $4,200, isn't it?

Mr. Ruttenberg interjected to say, "$4,600."

Arithmetic will show that this is $2.25 an hour. I am wondering, because the Senator from Massachusetts had said we should provide a decent, normal standard of living for all the people employed in the country, why we have not made the figure $2.25 to comply with Mr. Meany's suggested figure.

Mr. KENNEDY. The majority leader has just pointed out to me that we are having very great difficulty trying to get coverage for a $1.25 an hour. I do not think we would get anywhere in trying to pass a minimum wage extension that would be self-defeating or that would cause massive unemployment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator agrees with what Mr. Meany says, and I think he is right in keeping the limitation to a dollar and a quarter, but why do we fool the people by telling them that a dollar and a quarter is going to solve their problems, when Mr. Meany says the minimum wage should be $2.25?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think it will help solve their problems. If they are getting 75 cents or 85 cents an hour, it will help solve their problems if they get a dollar and a quarter an hour. It is not going to solve all their problems; it will help solve their problems.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I disagree with the Senator, because there is an assurance given that we are going to help the people, but they are not going to get what Mr. Meany says they should.

Mr. KENNEDY. That does not bother me if we are making progress, but the Senator from Arizona does not want to make progress.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is wrong——

Mr. KENNEDY. No; I do not think I am wrong. I do not think there is any doubt that the Senator from Arizona is against the Federal Government legislating in this field and providing a minimum wage. I am not saying the Senator is against a decent wage being paid, but he would leave it to the company involved and not permit the Federal Government to legislate in this field.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator has expressed my philosophy, but I do recognize the Congress' right to legislate in the field of interstate commerce, and our concern today, as it has been in the last 3 days, is that the bill before us will get the Federal Government more into intrastate business than it is in today. I bring the matter of economics into the question of the minimum wage only because the Senator from Massachusetts injected it. I do not think I argued once the matter of amount, whether it be $1, $1.25, or whatever it is; but I do think it is unfair to the people who are going to receive this wage to tell them that it is going to solve their problems. I think it is going to add to their problems. I asked the Senator why we did not put $2.25 in the bill. I knew what his answer would be, because he is a practical man, but I call to the attention of the American people that it would take $2.25 an hour if we are to take Mr. Meany's figures as what is necessary for a decent, honest standard of living.

Mr. KENNEDY. I merely point out that if one is getting 75 cents or 80 cents an hour, he would like to get $1.25. The Senator would like it, too, all the constitutional arguments or the power of Federal Government aside. I do not think there is any question of constitutionality involved at all, nor is there any question of its desirability. We are not talking about a constitutional argument. This is not a constitutional argument. This is an economic argument. The employers who are going to be affected do not want to pay this amount.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I disagree with the Senator. No matter what laws we pass, we are going to find people who do not want to pay a decent wage, we are going to find people who do not like to pay taxes, we are going to find people who are against anything like that. But the great majority of the people of this country want to pay a living wage. However, they do not want the Federal Government to so unbalance the cost of labor that the recipient of the new minimum wage is going to be hurt because of uncalled-for price increases caused by the imbalance created by the wage structure.

Mr. KENNEDY. There is no doubt that the highly organized unions get wage increases every year or two. Their wages go constantly up, but the people at the bottom of the ladder, working in these establishments, fall behind. So inflation is not going to be caused by providing for a minimum wage of $1 and stepping it up to $1.25 in 4 years. There is no doubt that the highly organized people have received wage increases, but the unorganized people have not participated. It has been the highly organized unions that have gotten the wages increases, but these people did not get them; and if we do not provide for them, they are going to fall behind further.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The wage differential must be maintained, and I have said on the floor I think it is the duty of the union leaders to maintain the wage differential. I think it is essential to our economic structure.

Mr. KENNEDY. These people are not organized.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Just a minute. If we, by Federal fiat, raise the minimum scale, we raise the entire scale, and it will probably result in destroying the differential. If we destroy the differential, we tend to destroy initiative, which is a very essential part of the economic picture. I would not be worried about an increase from $1 to $1.25. I would not be worried about the economic effect of that increase. I think I would agree with Mr. Meany that it might mean a price increase of 1 percent, or possibly less.

When we get to the question of adjusting the differential scale, the man who is now making $2.50 may feel that there is a very great spread between his ability and the ability of the worker who is getting the minimum, perhaps even more than the difference between $1.25 and $2.50. His wage may go up to $3, and the wage of the man making $3 may go up to $3.50 or $3.75. Then we add the total to the price cost in this country, and we see the inflation. That is my position.

Mr. KENNEDY. Would the Senator vote to repeal the present minimum wage law?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The present minimum wage law?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; I would vote to repeal it.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is opposed to that?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am opposed in principle to the Federal Government engaging in the control of wages of people in intrastate business. At the present time I do not think the law goes that far. I think the Senator's bill would. I would have to vote against the bill for that reason.

The Senator knows my philosophy in this entire field. I do not think this is a matter which should be controlled by the Federal Government, even though I recognize that the Federal Government has the right and the power under the Constitution to do so.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator from Arizona that I noticed in Mr. Meany's testimony he said:

> Average industrial earnings today are $2.21 an hour. That's about 80 cents an hour more than they were in 1949, when the 75-cent minimum wage law was enacted. Over the last 9 years, therefore, the average industrial wage has gone up more than three times as much as the Federal minimum wage.

I think the point is that we are really behind. We are really talking about the people at the bottom of the economic ladder. I do not think this bill will cause State governments to collapse. I do not think it will undermine the Constitution. I do not think it will cause a sharp increase in inflationary pressures to raise the wages of these people to $1, and, over a 4-year period, to $1.25.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is the reason we stand on the floor of the Senate debating. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks it will not do these things, while the Senator from Arizona has the feeling it will.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Arizona has led a very effective fight against this bill on this occasion, as he did in 1956. He is consistent.

I feel that we ought to try to settle the matter. If we cannot get a good bill now, we ought to know about it. We should not try to keep doing this all the time. I think we ought to pass the bill at this time. I think we ought to have the issue settled.

Mr. GOLDWATER. There is no question in my mind that the minimum wage bill will be passed.

Mr. KENNEDY. There is a question.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think I have told the Senator that several times. I think the bill should be changed before it goes to the other body. To that end, I am directing my efforts, although I have a different basic philosophy on the entire matter.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not wish to be personal about it, but I think there is a tendency to wrap up this argument in very eloquent constitutional terms, when actually what is at stake is the question of whether these employers who are involved want to pay a decent wage. That is really what is involved. All of the constitutional arguments to the contrary notwithstanding, that is what stands before us in the Senate on this occasion.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I disagree with the Senator.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, since I have the floor, I wish to say I disagree most emphatically with the Senator from Massachusetts.

I am not opposed to having anybody receive a dollar an hour or a dollar and a quarter an hour, but I am deeply concerned about the transferring of governmental regulation from the State level to the Federal level. That is a matter which concerns me. I am not trying to keep any employer from paying any kind of a wage to anybody, but I am greatly concerned about transfer to the Federal Government of powers which rightly belong to the States.

The Senator from Massachusetts may disagree with me, but I am as sincere in this statement as I have been in anything I have ever said in all the days I have lived.

I think that this bill is another indication of the trend to concentrate all governmental power, or virtually all governmental power, in Washington. This trend, if continued, will destroy our Government which was ordained by the Constitution to be an indestructible union composed of indestructible States.

The point that I am making, whether rightly or wrongly, is made very sincerely. My opposition to the bill is based on the fact that I think the problem involved transcends the simple question of hours of work or rates of pay.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will say to the Senator, it seems to me this whole question was fought out in the 1930's, when the bill was originally passed.

Mr. ERVIN. Oh, no. The bill which was passed in the 1930's was a bill to regulate minimum wages and hours of work for persons engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce. This bill goes into an entirely different field. This bill goes into the field of the sale of goods in local communities and services rendered in local communities.

There is a great difference between the bill of the 1930's and this bill, from the standpoint of law. The gulf between them is as wide in law as the gulf between Lazarus in Abraham's bosom and Dives in hell.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may propound a question to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ERVIN. I shall be glad to yield briefly, but I should like to complete my presentation. I have had the floor for a long time, but I have not done so much of the talking myself. A lot of the talking has been done by other Senators.

I will yield to the Senator from Colorado, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor by so doing.

Mr. CARROLL. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, I am sure no one questions the sincerity of the presentation of the very able Senator from North Carolina; but it seems to me, in view of the statement made by the very distinguished Senator from Arizona, that we are all agreed that a minimum wage bill is going to be passed.

I think, as a second point, there is no question of constitutionality involved. That is a moot question. That question was decided many years ago.

There is a question raised as to whether there have been inequities as a result of the previous law which was passed.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator was going to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is about to leave.

Mr. CARROLL. I wanted to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Is it not the position of the Senator from Massachusetts on this matter that, really, the law has been on the books for many years; and, in view of the statement of the able Senator from Arizona that we are going to pass a minimum wage bill, there is no real question of constitutionality involved?

All we are seeking to do is to redress the balance, to restore the equity in the matter of minimum wages. The Congress some 20 years or more ago passed this law. We now seek to extend the coverage. As I have said, we seek to redress the balance and to restore some equity to the situation with reference to the working people.

As I understand the bill, unless the individual employee is in an industry itself which affects interstate commerce, he is not covered.

Let me state the question differently: If an employee is engaged in an industry which is in the stream of interstate commerce, he is covered under this bill while under the present law it is possible that certain employees in a business establishment engaged in interstate commerce may not receive the benefit of the law?

Mr. KENNEDY. If the employee is engaged in interstate commerce, then he is covered in the terms of the bill, and the enterprise for which he works is in interstate commerce.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator is referring to the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. Under the present law, this would not be true.

Mr. KENNEDY. Under the present law, only the particular employee in the company who happens to do something in the stream of interstate commerce, who is in the stream of interstate commerce, is covered. The employee who may be working next to him, who may be working for the same company, perhaps is not covered. That is an unnatural coverage for an act. After all, an employee is working for an employer. If the employer is engaged in interstate commerce, the employees should be covered. There have been cases, for example, of 5 employees in a plant who are sending bills across State lines, and 10 others who are working at a lathe, or doing something else, and these employees come in different categories. Those who are in the stream of interstate commerce are covered, but the others are not, even though the employer is engaged in interstate commerce. It seems to me that is unwise. That is the reason why we use the enterprise definition instead of the individual definition.

Mr. ERVIN. That simply proves one of the points I am trying to make. This is a different relationship sought to be established with respect to a man who has no relation to interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are talking about the employer.

Mr. ERVIN. The man who is to be brought in under the bill has no relation to interstate commerce.

Mr. KENNEDY. We are talking about the employer.

Mr. ERVIN. That is only one of the changes under the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it not better to cover the enterprise engaged in interstate commerce, rather than to cover only the employees so engaged, with the result that some employees are covered and some are not? If the enterprise is in interstate commerce, then the employees are. The enterprise is then covered, and all of the employees are covered.

Mr. CARROLL. That was the understanding.

Mr. KENNEDY. It seems to me to be a much more sensible way of proceeding.

The reason I think the earlier individual test was chosen is that in 1938 there was a question about the constitutionality of the act.

Mr. CARROLL. That has been settled, and there is no question about its constitutionality.

I will ask one more question. Basically, therefore, this is really a discussion in economics with respect to the correction of an inequity and the restoration of the balance.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from North Carolina does not think it is simply a question of economics; it is a question of whether the Government will take charge of this field of economics on the national level as distinguished from the local level.

Mr. CARROLL. I must respectfully disagree with my friend from North Carolina. Colorado has a minimum wage law, and I do not think that Colorado could legislate in this field, since, under the doctrine of preemption, we in Congress have taken over this field. The State could not restore any equities. It is true that the broadening of the definition will raise new problems. There is no question about that. But in view of the requirement of a $1 million gross, the bill would not affect small restaurants in my State, it would not affect small service establishments in my State.

It might affect some large chains; it might affect some large dry goods stores. But I take the position that if they are making a gross of $1 million annually, they ought to be able to pay a minimum wage. As the able Senator from Massachusetts said, we are dealing with the lowest income group, at the very bottom of our economic pyramid. The bill would certainly not have a disastrous or catastrophic effect upon the people of my State or upon the economy of my State. People who will receive this increase will not put the money under their beds. They will spend it for food, clothing, and medicine. It will flow into the channels of trade. It will bolster the economy of my State, and it ought to help the economy of the country. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I do not desire to engage in any controversy with my good friend from Colorado, but this is not the law which Congress passed in 1938. The law passed in 1938 applied only to interstate commerce and the production of goods for interstate commerce. This bill undertakes to expand into an entirely different area, an area which properly lies within the domain of the State, involving the sale of goods between two citizens of the same State occurring within that State, and services rendered by a resident of a State to other residents of that State.

This bill represents an entirely different concept. There is a change of concept. It has no legal relationship in that respect to the businesses covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act as it now stands.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a comment on this point, so long as the Senator and I are engaged in colloquy?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I recognize that the proposed legislation would extend the coverage, and that we propose to move into the field of service establishments. I fully recognize that if there were not the $1 million limitation with respect to gross income, it could be said that the Congress for the first time is insinuating itself into the bootblack shops and into the small restaurants; I realize this could create some real problems at home. But the $1 million gross is the real limitation, and this is the real protection for the rural areas.

Some of the businesses in the rural areas of my State could not pay $1.25 an hour at this point. I understand that. Some of the small, independent filling station operators and some of the other small business people do not have the required volume of business. Their economy is not geared to enable them to pay $1.25 an hour, or even, in some cases, $1 an hour.

When we insert in this measure a floor, if I may call it such, of $1 million, there is ample protection.

In my own State, which is not too far different from the State of North Carolina, we have a metropolitan section and a rural section. Who is really going to be affected?

I have been concerned about the automobile dealers of my State. Many of them have a $1 million gross, and yet make little profit.

I find, in studying this measure, that their position has been recognized and that automobile salesmen have been exempted from overtime coverage.

As I consider my whole area, there are very few small businesses that would really be affected by the bill. I think it is a most modest and moderate bill.

Mr. ERVIN. When the camel starts to put its nose under the tent the first time it does not put it in very far. But in a short time after it gets its nose under the tent, the camel comes in and occupies the whole tent. I predict that the optimism of the Senator from Colorado will vanish very soon because this bill is only an effort to get the camel's nose under the tent. The camel will then move in and occupy the entire tent.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend. I have been intrigued by some of the points made by my distinguished friend from Colorado because I think while not so intended, they begin to bring out essential facts in this debate which very much need to be brought out. The Senator from Colorado has said that the bill represents a change. Of course, it is going into new ground. Of course, it will present new questions. Of course, it will present new problems for the Court.

I ask my distinguished friend whether one of the new questions will not be the question of constitutionality as applied to an entirely different set of problems and circumstances than those involved under the National Labor Relations Act, which are the only ones which have been passed upon in such a way as to have the Court use the words "activities affecting commerce."

Mr. ERVIN. There is no question about that. As a matter of fact, the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the constitutionality of the Fair Labor Standards Act solely upon the ground that its regulations were restricted to workers engaged in interstate commerce, or in the production of goods to be shipped in interstate commerce. This provision has no relation to that. It has relation to the sale of goods which have come to rest in a State, and to services rendered within the borders of a State.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend. Is it not true that decisions based upon the National Labor Relations Act are the only ones which have dealt with this new definition of activities affecting commerce, and that have to do with the activities found by the Court to restrain or interfere with or obstruct the flow of interstate commerce?

Mr. ERVIN. Not only that, but the effect must be direct.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct. Is it not true that the proposed legislation, which the distinguished Senator from Colorado has admitted, and properly so, is plowing new ground, presenting new questions and presenting real change, has to do with an entirely different question of whether the Federal Government has the power to go into businesses which the Federal Government has regarded up to this time as intrastate business? On the ground that that intrastate business has to do with sales and with services, but not necessarily obstructing or interfering with or even having any relationship to the actual flow of goods in interstate commerce, the Federal Government seeks to take jurisdiction for the new purpose of inflicting Federal regimentation upon the businesses imposed upon in this bill that are intrastate and all other businesses when Congress gets around to extending the coverage further?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Florida is eminently correct. These amendments have relation to services which have never had any relation to interstate commerce. They are rendered solely by a resident of a State to other residents of the same State. They have no connection with interstate commerce. The proposal relates also to sales of goods which have ceased to flow in interstate commerce and have come to rest in a State. There is involved a transition from a field which undoubtedly belongs to the Congress under the interstate commerce clause into a field which has always belonged to the States as intrastate commerce.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. CARROLL. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield, since the Senator from Florida has mentioned my name?

Mr. HOLLAND. I did not interfere when the Senator from Colorado was speaking. I sat down when he said that he was continuing the course of his questions. I was happy to do so. I hope I may have the same treatment.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the Senator from Florida. When he has finished his questions, then I shall yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HOLLAND. The distinguished Senator from North Carolina was a justice of the supreme court of that State. North Carolina is one of the Original Thirteen States, a State which has been the largest State in the South until this last year, and which still makes the greatest contribution in Federal taxes of any State in the entire Southland.

He has passed upon many important questions, sitting as a justice of the supreme court of his great State. I am asking the distinguished Senator if it is not true that in the process of change, in the process which the Senator from Massachusetts has described as a matter of penetrating new frontiers, which means the same thing, that there will be hundreds, if not thousands, of different sets of facts to which this new question will be directed, and that many industries in the very nature of things will never have the chance of knowing with assurance whether they are covered and included within the new law until the final court, the Supreme Court of the United States, has actually ruled upon a case involving them, or involving another business identical with theirs?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Florida is absolutely correct. This illustrates very well the fact that I have never been able to get anyone to give me an opinion as to the meaning of the term "activity necessary to the distribution of goods in commerce."

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator. I should like to ask him one more question. I was intrigued with the use by the distinguished Senator of the well-known expression, frequently used in the Senate, and always effectively, that this is an instance of the camel's nose getting under the tent, which is another way of saying that the proponents are using the technique of divide and conquer. There are also other ways of saying the same thing.

Do we not have affirmative notice, in the report of the committee, in the opening speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, one of the sponsors of the proposed legislation, and in the opening speech of the Senator from Oregon, the other of the two sponsors, that both of these distinguished Senators regard the pending bill as only an entering wedge, and have told us so clearly that no one can possibly be confused on this point, that they expect to go very much further, and that they believe we ought to go very much further now, and that it is a matter, under this philosophy, if it is written into law by the passage of the pending bill, of how far down to the smallest business in any State Congress may care to go in imposing the long arm and rigid hand of Federal governmental control upon businesses on every main street in every village and in every city of the 50 States of the United States; and that we are given clear warning that the real objective is to go vastly further than what would be accomplished by the passage of the pending bill?

Mr. ERVIN. We have been given the most solemn and most explicit assurance that the pending bill merely represents a first step in this field.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend. Then it is true, as indicated by the frankness and candor of the advocates of the pending measure, that they admit that this is a foot-in-the-door approach?

Mr. ERVIN. Absolutely.

Mr. HOLLAND. That this is a camel's-nose-under-the-tent approach?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. That this is a divide-and-conquer approach?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. For the time being, they choose to confine their effort to what they call large business, and reserve the right to have, by this new definition, access to every business that would be of the same classification in every State and in every community in the Nation, as soon as they can reach them?

Mr. ERVIN. Absolutely.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. In view of the remarks of the able Senator from Florida, I ask the Senator from North Carolina if it is not an admission on their part, therefore, that the pending bill does not cover everything. We talk about a foot in the door or a camel's nose under the tent. Is it not true that this is the first movement in this field in 22 years?

Mr. ERVIN. This is the first movement in this field since our Constitution was drafted.

Mr. CARROLL. I am referring to the 1938 law. If the Senator wishes to go beyond that, it is all right with me.

Mr. ERVIN. I say to the Senator that in my judgment this is an entirely different proposal having no legal similarity to the 1938 act. I was going to say to the Senator from Colorado that this is the first time since the Constitution of the United States was drafted that there has been an effort to let Congress undertake to regulate in this manner what are essentially local, intrastate activities.

Mr. HOLLAND. In time of peace.

Mr. CARROLL. In the Taft-Hartley Act and in the Disclosure Act we incorporated the phrase "affecting commerce."

Mr. ERVIN. I pointed out earlier in my talk that the Taft-Hartley Act gives the phrase "affecting commerce" one definition, and that in the pending bill the definition is an entirely different one. Therefore, the definitions of the term in the two acts have no relation to each other, because the term is defined separately in the Taft-Hartley Act and separately in the bill. The two definitions do not agree.

(At this point Mr. ERVIN yielded to Mr. PASTORE, whose remarks appear at another point in the RECORD.)

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I appreciate very much the patience of the Senator from North Carolina in giving me the opportunity to voice these sentiments and to ask these questions. I share the concern of many people. Some months ago I spoke to some small restaurant people, who thought they were going to be drawn into this matter even though their activities were purely intrastate. I examined the bill very carefully, because I respect the viewpoint of these small business people. Some of them are from rural areas; they could not afford to pay $1.25 an hour.

However in the bill there is a limitation of a million dollars gross. Furthermore, I should like to say that we are not going to act willy-nilly and apply the law to everyone merely because he does a million dollars gross business. There may be businesses which are entirely intrastate, which have no connection, directly or indirectly, with interstate commerce. Therefore, I believe the Court will pass upon this as a constitutional matter, as to whether or not, if such a case arose, it came within the constitutional prohibition.

So I say to the able Senator from North Carolina that I am not in the least concerned about the camel's nose under the tent. It is true that with a changing economy, with changing conditions, after 22 years, inequities have been created in a changing economy. These we must now adjust.

I believe the pending bill moves in that direction. I am not at all apprehensive or fearful that we will diminish the power of the States to such an extent that we will cripple them. I am not at all concerned about that.

My State government has grown stronger since the days of Franklin Roosevelt. It has not been weakened. Our economy is stronger. Our population has grown. The people have a very strong State government, strong in the sense that it protects their institutions—their institutions of learning, their penitentiaries, their hospitals. They operate in their own sphere.

The laws which Congress has passed in the last quarter century have not injured but, I believe, have strengthened State government. The time has come, in my opinion, to strengthen the Federal laws, so that we can adequately strengthen our own National Government.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina for yielding.

Mr. ERVIN. I enjoyed the remarks of the able and distinguished Senator from Colorado. I do not agree with him. I think the Federal Government has taken charge of a large part of the activities of the States and the States have been much weakened by the centralization of power in Washington.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should like to pose a question which might help to answer the question put by the Senator from Colorado and help to explain the concern of the Senator from North Carolina and myself about this matter. Is there any question in the mind of the Senator from North Carolina that the enactment of the bill as it is presently written would preempt the minimum wage laws of the States?

Mr. ERVIN. No; that is the intent of the bill. The advocates of the bill say that the States have not acted wisely; therefore, they want the Federal Government to act in the place of the States. That is exactly the purpose of the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Allow me to go one step further. I do not believe the Federal Government could preempt power in the areas of intrastate business, but it could preempt——

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Federal Government could preempt power so far as interstate commerce is concerned. Let me take the example of an establishment which does more than a million dollars worth of business. Let us say that everything in the establishment is purchased within the boundaries of the State; that everything is manufactured within the boundaries of the State; and that everything is sold within the boundaries of the State. We would call that, then, an intrastate business.

Mr. ERVIN. I might add that that would be true even though the goods sold were imported from another State originally.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under the present definition of the law, that is true.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am glad the Senator mentioned that for the edification of the Senator from Colorado. Under the language of the bill, the language "activity affecting commerce," even though nothing was sold outside the State boundaries, but the business was confined entirely within the State boundaries, it would come within the purview of the bill. Am I not correct in that statement, I ask the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Arizona is eminently correct.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Allow me to finish my example.

Mr. CARROLL. All right.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If that establishment employed one person who was engaged in out-of-State activity, whether for the purpose of research or for whatever it might be, then under the provisions of the bill as it is presented to us here, that business would be engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. ERVIN. I think that would certainly be an activity which would come within this definition.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Under the law which now exists, the minimum wage would apply to that one person. But under the bill as it is now before us, and is proposed to be enacted, that one man could put the entire establishment in interstate commerce, and take it out from under the purview of the State law. This, let us remember, is under the very concept which we have known in our history as intrastate business.

Mr. ERVIN. That is exactly what the bill is designed, among other things, to accomplish. In other words, it uses the premise that the employer has one employee who is engaged in interstate commerce, and on that premise seeks to bring within the coverage of the bill all the other employees, who are engaged solely in intrastate commerce.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I might read to the Senator from North Carolina several new parts of the bill which we have not discussed here, and which are mostly activities affecting commerce. Actually, there is a new definition called "enterprise," and the onus, so to speak, is removed from the employee and is placed on the employer. Let me read this. It is in section 3(r) of the bill:

> (r) "Enterprise" means the related activities performed (either through unified operation or common control) by any person or persons for a common business purpose, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units but shall not include the related activities performed for such enterprise by an independent contractor.

So, in effect, one person engaged in purely interstate commerce could put the enterprise or the business in interstate commerce and under interstate commerce regulations.

So I say to the Senator from Colorado that this language simply opens up the constitutional front, and we fear it is wrapped up in the words "activities affecting commerce." It is a part of a whole new approach, an approach which has never been used before in the Fair Labor Standards Act, of placing an entire enterprise within the scope of the act, whereas before it was related to one person.

We do not argue that the Federal Government does not have the right to control the minimum wage of one person, two persons, or three persons employed by a firm which is engaged in pure interstate commerce. But we question whether the Federal Government has any constitutional right to regulate a business simply because one member is, by definition, engaged in interstate commerce.

I ask the Senator from North Carolina, Do I express our views correctly?

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator from Arizona expresses himself in exceedingly lucid fashion. He has now made very clear the provisions of the bill, which will certainly be subject to many legal challenges.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I recognize that we cannot conjure up in our minds all the problems which may arise under the bill. I think there is no doubt about the intent of the proposed legislation. The able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has explained it in a very clear, lucid manner.

What is the intent? The intent is, as nearly as possible, to spread the minimum wage law to those industries—we are broadening the concept of the law; there is no question about it—which grossed $1 million or more annually. Congress has already acted. We all admit this. For 22 years there has been a law. Whether it was wise or not, it was enacted. This having been done, certain inequities have arisen. Now Congress is being called upon to restore the balance of those equities. In order to do that, it is necessary to invade a new field.

Will the Supreme Court say that because we have broadened the definition of the industries in commerce—and the court has passed on other laws using the same language, with perhaps a different purpose—that really Congress did not know what it was doing? I think we know what we are doing.

I simply say, let us move forward into this field. If we are to have a law, let us have one as clear and equitable as possible. I do not want to invade every law of an intrastate nature in every State. That is not the purpose of the bill. There may be borderline cases. I do not accept the example given by the able Senator from Arizona. Such a case could arise. My position is that if a company does a business of $1 million annually, and is engaged in some interstate activity, then it ought to come under the law. We cannot have a portion of the employees of an industry, in my opinion, come under the law, and another portion denied the benefits of the law. That would create confusion.

I think the Senator from Arizona and I are far apart. There is a great difference in our philosophies. I take the position, from my experience of a quarter of a century in observing these laws and seeing what has happened under them, that the Nation has grown stronger, and the States have grown stronger, politically and economically. Our whole Nation is stronger because we have paid attention to the general welfare clause of the Constitution. We will not injure any State. Some States have very low minimum wage provisions. In many States low wages are paid. We know this because in many instances industries have moved to those States. I do not say they do it to exploit their labor. Perhaps the reason they move is to make a larger profit. Perhaps they have to do it.

At any rate, this is a most modest bill; and if any State or if the economy of any State cannot live with this bill, then I feel sorry for the people of that State.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think it is important to call attention to one fact. Many references are made to businesses doing a business of $1 million or more. However, there are other provisions of the bill. I read now from page 4, section 3(t).

(t) "Enterprise engaged in an activity affecting commerce" means any of the following which is engaged in any activity affecting commerce:

Then the bill lists the retail service establishments, laundries, and so forth, including street railways.

I now read further from the bill, at that point:

(4) any establishment, not included in an enterprise described in paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of this subsection, which has one or more employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross volume of sales of such establishment is not less than $250,000 (or $350,000 in the case of an establishment engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction, or both), * * *.

I wish to make this point perfectly clear, because if a firm does not fall within the categories listed in (1), (2), or (3), it is nevertheless covered by this measure if it has gross sales of not less than $250,000, or of not less than $350,000 if it is in the construction industry. So this proposed law would apply to a very great many businesses.

The Senator from Colorado has talked about the establishments in his State. I am well acquainted with his State, and it is very much like my State. But many of the small establishments of both of our States would come under the purview of this measure. That is one of the reasons why we are so concerned with it. The pending bill contains a great many "sleepers" or "gimmicks" which I think make it necessary and justifiable to prolong the debate until we can ascertain whether the American people and businessmen want the Federal Government to become more and more over them.

As regards the question of whether the States will become weaker, let me point out that today the States cannot provide the schools they would like to provide, because the Federal Government is taking more and more of the taxes. The same may be said of many other essential activities.

I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that although apparently, on the surface, there is great strength in the States, I do not believe that the Federal Government today has the strength it had 25 years ago, and neither does the economy.

The steps which have been taken have so greatly limited the profits which may be made by businessmen, that many young people are discouraged and are not willing to go into business, because of the strong position the Federal Government has in the tax structure, with the result that most of the profits are taken by the Government.

So I do not entirely share the view of the Senator from Colorado that we have not been weakened by the centralized Government and its activities.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I shall yield in a moment.

Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator has said, I point out that under subsection (t), on page 4 of the bill, if I were to operate through employees a motorbus which was transporting people from one end of the street on which I live to the other end of the same street, I would be covered by this measure, although that street might be 200 miles removed from the nearest State line. But how anyone can say such a business is not intrastate business, I cannot understand.

But, besides that, subsection 5 covers "(5) any gasoline service establishment if the annual gross volume of sales of such establishment is not less than $250,000."

There will be an effort to eliminate that monetary limitation, if the bill is enacted. If such effort proves successful, there would be Federal regulation of every gasoline service station in every one of the 50 States.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield now to me?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to say to the Senator from Arizona that this is what I call really conservative thinking. For example, I recall when there were 200,000 heads of families on relief in my State. But today we have one of the most progressive old-age pension programs in the Nation. Every old-age pensioner in Colorado receives more than $100 a month. We financed it, of course, with the aid of the Federal Government; but State taxes contribute most of it.

We have one of the most progressive old-age medical care programs in the Nation, and we have very strong educational institutions. Of course, those cost our people money.

I remember that when the fight was going on, it was said such programs would bankrupt the State. Fifty million dollars a year now goes into the hands of the pensioners.

How much does the Senator think must be had in order to live? Is $100 a very large amount of money, in terms of providing the necessities of life? Those who receive that aid spend every dime of it. In some of the rural areas of Colorado, the businessmen are kept alive during the wintertime by what the old-age pensioners spend for food, medicine, and clothing.

My point is that only a pitifully meager sum, only a few pennies, separate the Republican position from the Democratic position.

It is true we broaden the scope and increase the coverage. But to say that this program will injure a State economically is, in my opinion, sheer nonsense. To say that this program will really impair the economy of a State is also, in my opinion, sheer nonsense.

Let me say that I have very great respect for the constitutional arguments presented by my friend, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], who is a very able lawyer.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, let me state that I have not talked about old-age pensions at any time during this debate.

I have been talking about the minimum wage law.

Mr. CARROLL. But the Senator from Arizona has given the impression that there has been no progress in the State governments. Let me say there has been wonderful progress in all sections of the country during these 25 years. Why? Because we have raised the standard of living. After all, money is not something to hoard. Money is a medium of exchange. And it has been used for the benefit of the people. Whenever they have money, they make purchases, and that is how they raise their standard of living.

We give the members of this small group—a very few people, really, considering the great population—a thin dime or a few nickels over a period of years. But to say that will injure the economic fabric of the Nation is sheer nonsense.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me say to the Senator from Colorado that during this debate I have not discussed the situation from an economic standpoint. If I thought this measure were constitutional, that would be different. I have often said that if it were constitutional, I thought we would find the necessary funds.

This matter involves more than a dime or a quarter. In fact, earlier today I said that George Meany said, in effect—I was not quoting him directly—that a minimum salary should be $4,600, in order to enable a family to obtain the necessities of life. That salary would mean a minimum wage of $2.25.

I would just ask my friend, if I would introduce an amendment to raise the amount from $1.25 to $2.25, would he support it?

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to permit me to answer?

Mr. ERVIN. On condition that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. CARROLL. If that were done suddenly, I think it would create an economic imbalance in our country. The Senator is asking me if I would be in favor of raising the minimum wage from $1.25 to $2.25. The Senator is asking me an "iffy" question. I am talking about 10 pennies, the difference between the Democratic and Republican position. I say, let us get out of the bargain basement and meet the issue. When the Senator asks me the question if I would increase the minimum 100 percent, my answer is, "Obviously, no."

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thought the answer would be "No." If the Senator wants to make a Democratic or Republican issue out of this, I point out there are one Republican and two Democrats talking about this now. It is not a matter of party interest, but of constitutional interest. I suspect that Senators will rise on the floor and accuse the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Arizona of being penurious and saying we do not want people to have a decent standard of living. We expect people to say these things. We are discussing the constitutional aspects of this bill because we think it will change our concept of government if the bill is passed the way it is written.

More and more people are questioning it. I have had no objection in my office to raising the minimum to $1.25. I have had no objection to raising the coverage. But I am having a lot of questions asked, "What does the language in this bill mean?" That is what we are arguing about. We are not arguing about $1.25, $2.25, or any other amount. We must clear this question up before we get the bill acted on.

Mr. CARROLL. I did not want to imply that either the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from Arizona were penurious. I think the arguments of the Senator from North Carolina are helpful. I have great respect for my colleague on the Judiciary Committee. I am always glad to hear his arguments.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. I want to commend the Senator from Colorado, who brought a new issue into the debate which I have been waiting to hear brought into the debate since it started, because I knew it was there. The Senator from Colorado a few minutes ago brought in the question of the program being under the welfare clause of the Constitution, which means under the welfare clause of the preamble of the Constitution. Then he proceeded to liken this program to the welfare program and to couple it to the welfare program which followed, attention to which was called by the Senator from North Carolina.

I think this is a very proper addition to the argument, and it gives us clearer insight into what the background of this program is. This is a welfare program, helping to create a welfare state, and asking us to out-New Deal the New Deal vastly, because this measure was a New Deal measure, recommended by President Roosevelt himself in language which made it perfectly clear that he felt it was improper to try to apply this hour-and-wage setup to intrastate businesses, to retail stores and service establishments, recommended by a distinguished New Deal leader, the former Senator from Alabama, Mr. Black, with the same clear explanation that he felt it should not touch the retail businesses and the service businesses which were within States. And when it got over to the other House, it was ably sponsored and defended by a very able ultraliberal, a splendid gentleman, for whom I have the greatest respect, the Representative from New York, Mr. CELLER, again with the clear explanation that this should not apply to intrastate businesses because the States had responsibility there which they could better exercise because they knew the facts better.

Those who wish to read will find that not only in 1938 did the Representative from New York, Mr. CELLER, strongly stand up for that position; he even offered an amendment to make clear the exemption of stores, retail outlets and establishments, within States, which was adopted, and rewritten a bit in the conference report.

Later, in 1949, when the same matter was before the House, when he was chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he again reiterated, 11 years after the law had been enacted, his conviction that that was the sound approach and that it must be preserved.

We are asked now by Senators, one of whom has made reference to the welfare clause of the Constitution, and has mentioned this program apparently as a part of programs coming under the welfare clause, to out-New Deal the New Deal, to out-Roosevelt President Roosevelt, and to go further than any of the most ardent liberals, by anybody's interpretation and construction, that we have in our country are willing to go.

So far as the Senator from Florida is concerned, he wants to express his appreciation to the Senator from Colorado for having, for the first time he has heard during this debate, brought this particular issue right out into the open, where it ought to be.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to make a quick response?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from Colorado did not intend to say any such thing; he did not intend to justify this legislation under the general welfare clause of the Constitution. The Senator from Colorado, as a lawyer of some years of experience, knows that this question arises under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and the reference to welfare clause has no legal significance in this discussion. The Senator from Colorado wants it clearly and distinctly understood for the record that he does not believe that this bill covers those industries whose activities are solely intrastate. This should be crystal clear.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina for yielding me this time in his debate.

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, will my distinguished colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to my colleague from North Carolina.

Mr. JORDAN. Is it not true that the million-dollar limitation that the committee arrived at was arrived at as some reason for which they could account for themselves?

Mr. ERVIN. They just plucked it out of the air.

Mr. JORDAN. And next year they can say, "We are going to reduce it to half a million dollars because we left out too many people."

Mr. ERVIN. That is the philosophy of the people who are behind this bill. I do not say all of them, but many of them. They want to give complete control of this field to the Federal Government. There is no doubt about it. Anybody who entertains a contrary opinion is suffering from a delusion.

Mr. JORDAN. Is it not also true that this bill is discriminatory in the fact that they are leaving out more people than they are taking in? In my home county of Alamance County, there are two stores that come into that category in that whole county of over 80,000 people, which has several hundred stores. There are only two stores in that category. Under this bill those two stores will have to pay a minimum wage of $1.25 and wages paid in all the other stores will be from 75 cents on up.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JORDAN. Under the law.

Mr. ERVIN. That is true.

Mr. JORDAN. It is sought to leave out many more people than are to be brought under the coverage. I do not believe the Congress of the United States has the authority or the moral right to say that we should take in one small group of people who are doing exactly the same work, selling exactly the same goods, as the majority of people who are to be left out. I think 2 years from now another set of Members of Congress or another set of Senators might say to the people, "We left out two-thirds of the people of our districts. We shall vote to bring them all under the coverage."

Mr. ERVIN. It is most attractive political bait. The candidate can say, "Elect me, and I will see that your employer pays you more money. I will pass a law in Washington."

This is a very attractive thing. That is one reason why it requires a certain amount of devotion to fundamental principles to oppose a bill of this character.

Mr. JORDAN. As someone pointed out a few minutes ago, I do not contend that working people should not receive a legitimate wage. I would not contend that. I believe the people should receive good wages and that the people should have a good standard of living.

However, I believe I can point to an example in my own county which brings the problem to the fore. There are two stores which would be paying one wage scale, and the rest of the stores would be paying another wage scale. Pretty soon the two stores would not have a million dollars worth of sales per year. If they had sales of $999,000, they might shut down 1 day a week, to keep the sales under the $1 million. If they were good business people they would shut down, to keep the sales down, so they would not be involved in a wage differential. These people are intelligent enough to do things like that.

If this law is put forward to the ultimate, which I am afraid is planned under the bill, we shall finally reach the point where an individual farmer will come under the law. It could come to that, could it not?

Mr. ERVIN. If the farmer sold some of his farm products the bill could be extended to him finally if its constitutionality is sustained.

Mr. JORDAN. The terms of the law could be extended to the farmer. The administrators could say, "Mr. Farmer, you work on the farm. You are going to sell some potatoes, so you are engaged in interstate commerce. You have to keep a set of books. You have to be regulated. If you do not agree, you cannot raise anything. Whatever you raise you have to eat, because you cannot sell it."

That is possible under the terms of the bill. That is what concerns me. I am not concerned at the moment about the million-dollar limitation. Such a law could put a small firm out of business. Many people who are doing a million-dollar business could go broke. To most people, a million-dollar business sounds like a great deal of business, but it really is not as much as one might think. I have checked the records on the two stores to which I have made reference. Their gross profits for last year, which was a good year, were less than $50,000 before taxes.

Mr. ERVIN. In other words, they made about 5 percent before taxes were paid to the Federal Government, and the Federal Government takes 52 percent of the 5 percent.

Mr. JORDAN. The Federal Government takes 52 percent, and our own State tax is 6 percent more. That is 58 percent of earnings. The store ended up with about $23,000 profit for all of the stockholders in the store, on a million dollars worth of sales. That is not a great deal of business.

Mr. ERVIN. It is said that passage of the bill would not increase prices, but how could a man who is making a 5-percent profit, and who is paying out 58 percent of the profit in income taxes to the Federal Government and the State government, as well as paying ad valorem taxes, in addition to paying additional expenses, stay in business without raising the price of his goods?

Mr. JORDAN. He will have to raise the prices of his goods.

Mr. ERVIN. Or he will go out of business.

Mr. JORDAN. There is another aspect of the matter which worries me considerably. I do not believe my distinguished colleague has brought this out.

I happen to know of another store, which is a very nice store, which had sales of over a million dollars. There was elevator service to the second floor of the store. There were elevator operators to operate the elevators. Now the store is in the process of putting in automatic elevators, and discharging the employees, because it is said the store cannot afford to pay them.

Passage of the bill will put many people out of work. Instead of increasing wages of some people, we will put them on relief. There is no question about that fact.

Hotels are to be brought in under the terms of the bill as proposed. Anybody who knows anything about the hotel business today knows that the motels are putting the hotels out of business, because the motels do not provide services. They are doing a grand job of it. A person must pick up his own ice outside the door and carry it to his room. He must bring in his own bags. He must carry them in.

People will not go to hotels which provide service that is poor, yet the hotels are having a rough time now. Under the terms of the bill the hotels are sought to be brought under the law, though the law would not apply to their competitors down the street, out in the country where the land is cheap, where the competitor has to provide no service whatsoever.

By the widest stretch of the imagination I cannot see how washing a shirt in a laundry becomes interstate commerce. Anybody who knows anything about laundries knows of the small self-service laundries which are putting the big laundries out of business faster than people are going into the business. I have some friends who were in the laundry business, who are already out of the laundry business.

For a cost of 15 cents, a person can go to one of these self-service laundries and wash his clothes, and for another 10 cents he can dry them. Any person can do that in Washington, D.C. That is pretty cheap laundry service. A person must put the clothes in himself, and must take them out himself, but it is pretty cheap laundry service. This makes it terribly hard for the laundries to stay in business.

I will admit that the wages in some laundries are too low. There is no question about that. The bill, however, goes beyond the question of how much money the employees should earn or not earn. The bill provides that the Federal Government has a right to fix the wages, the working conditions, and the hours of employment of everybody in the United States. If the bill is carried to its ultimate, which I am afraid is the intent of this piece of proposed legislation, that will be the case.

Mr. ERVIN. The chief proponents of the bill have already given us their solemn assurance that this is only the first step in this direction.

Mr. JORDAN. Nothing will happen to stop them from coming to the Congress next year to say, "Let us drop it to a half-million-dollar limitation." The next year they could say, "It should be $100,000." And the year after that they could say, "We should wipe it out completely." Is that not correct?

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct.

Mr. JORDAN. I thank my colleague.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I hope to complete what I have to say shortly, and then I shall yield the floor.

I am not one of those who suffer under the delusion that the Federal Government can do all things well. I had the privilege of serving on what was popularly known as the McClellan committee or the rackets committee. Prof. Sylvester Petro, an expert in the field of labor, wrote a book on the investigations of that committee titled "Power Unlimited—the Corruption of Union Leadership." The book deals primarily with the abuses of power revealed by these investigations.

Professor Petro closes his book with a statement about the way the Federal Government is constantly increasing its control over this Nation. I quote this comment from page 304:

> The ultimate responsibility falls to the public. But this fact does not absolve the members of the government from all responsibility. It is their job to inform the public that they cannot deal with all the things which the special privilege groups are seeking and still run a decent government in the general welfare. Then it is the job of the public to understand that government, like all other human institutions, has very narrow limits. It may be able to do a fair job of providing for the national defense, of keeping the peace, of enforcing the laws, and of administering justice in the courts—if it devotes all its time and energy to those difficult tasks. But it cannot do those things at all, as the McClellan record so vividly demonstrates, if its energies are expended on every pet project upon which every pressure group from the National Education Association to the National Committee for the Protection of Tropical Fish comes running to Washington for help.

Mr. President, that is a statement which could be applied to proposed legislation such as that embodied in the bill before the Senate, as well as to other proposed legislation, which undertakes to allow the Federal Government to take over more tasks which have always been committed to local government under our system of government.

Mr. President, I have mentioned the fact that we inherited the finest governmental system in the world, a governmental system created by the Founding Fathers who has studied the long history of the struggle of man to find a manner of governing himself without losing his liberty.

I have pointed out that under the Constitution as drafted by the Founding Fathers the powers necessary to the discharge of the functions of a central government were given to the Federal Government, which powers included the power to regulate interstate commerce, and the powers necessary to the discharge of the functions of local government were reserved to the States, which powers included the power to regulate "intrastate commerce."

I wish now to discuss briefly the four reasons which caused the Founding Fathers to establish that kind of government. Let us consider the first reason. At the time they drafted the Constitution, the United States consisted of only 13 States lying along the Atlantic seaboard. The Founding Fathers realized that even in those 13 States there were varieties of conditions and that the legislatures of those States could best understand those conditions and could best devise remedies for them. If this concept was valid—and it certainly was valid at a time when the United States consisted of only 13 States lying along the Atlantic seaboard—then it is doubly valid now, when the United States consists of 50 different States stretching from the Atlantic seaboard clear out into the Pacific Ocean 2,000 miles to the State of Hawaii. How can any Member of the Senate delude himself into the belief that he knows more about conditions in North Carolina, Illinois, Texas, California, or Hawaii than do members of the legislatures of those States? Who is more competent to legislate with reference to those matters in the States than are the legislators of those States?

State legislators know the conditions prevailing in their State and can legislate more wisely with reference to them. The Founding Fathers were certainly on sound ground when they left the regulation of matters of that kind, including intrastate commerce, to the legislative bodies of the States.

Any governmental power can be exercised wisely or foolishly, and if the Congress of the United States is going to strip State legislatures of their powers merely because they think State legislatures do not exercise their powers wisely, then we shall have all government centralized in Washington, and the America which was established by the Founding Fathers will cease to exist.

To reiterate, the first reason which prompted the Founding Fathers to leave to the States the regulation of functions which are essentially local was the realization on the part of the Founding Fathers that the people living in the States and sitting in the legislatures of the States know conditions in the States better than do Senators and Representatives sitting in Washington, and can devise better remedies for those conditions. That was the first reason which prompted the Founding Fathers to separate the powers of government between the Federal Government on the national level and the State government on the local level.

There was a second reason, which was somewhat kindred in nature. The Founding Fathers realized that if they left to each State the power to regulate its own local and internal affairs, and the State made a mistake in regulating those affairs, the effect of that mistake would be confined to that State and would not be suffered by other States, or by the entire Nation. So the Founding Fathers divided the powers of government between the Federal Government on the national level and the State governments on the local level to permit each State to make experiments in government without injuring other States or the Nation. They knew that if such experiments should prove successful, other States could adopt them then. But if the experiments proved unsuccessful, other States and the Nation as a whole would not be injuriously affected by them. That was the second reason why the Founding Fathers divided the powers of government between the Federal Government on the national level and the State government on a local level.

Let us consider the third reason which prompted the Founding Fathers to commit the regulation of local activities, such as intrastate commerce, to the States rather than to the Federal Government. They realized that the diversity of conditions existing in the various States makes it impossible for Congress to deal justly with local activities, such as intrastate commerce, by uniform laws applying to the entire Nation.

There was a fourth reason, which is indicated by the statement attributed to Justice Brandeis by Judge Learned Hand, to the effect that the States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only society in which personality can survive.

The Founding Fathers had studied the history of the long and bitter struggles of mankind for the right of self-government, and they had found engraved upon each page of that history the eternal truth that no man or body of men can be safely trusted with unlimited governmental power. And so they created the Constitution and divided the powers of government between the Federal Government on the national level and the State government on the local level in order to deny to either government the unlimited power which is incompatible with liberty.

Mr. President, the advocates of the pending bill charge the opponents of the bill with being parsimonious individuals who are opposed to the payment of adequate wages. I deny that charge. I favor the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, because that act in its present form is confined to the regulation of a field committed by the Constitution of the United States to Congress itself. If an opportunity is afforded me to do so by a bill not encroaching upon the proper domain of the States, I will vote to increase the minimum wage of those now covered by that act.

In closing I would like to say this: I share in full measure the belief that the States are the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to submerge the individual and destroy the only society in which personality can survive. For that reason I vote against bills which undertake to transfer governmental power from the States to the Federal Government. I am confident that I can best serve the America of this day, and the generations of Americans who are to come after us by doing what I can to preserve the only breakwater against the ever-pounding surf which threatens to destroy the America created by the Founding Fathers—an America where the powers of government are divided between the Federal Government on the national level and the States on the local level.

VICE-PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE LODGE AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the Republican vice presidential nominee,

Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., our Ambassador to the United Nations, has indicated in recent statements that he is somewhat uneasy about continuing as the U.S. representative to the United Nations while he is at the same time a candidate for election to be Vice President.

Although the President has asked Mr. Lodge to continue in this position until disarmament discussions are concluded, I would hope that Mr. Lodge can see his way clear to submit his resignation in the very near future.

People have forgotten that during the Democratic administration our chief representative at the United Nations was the able Republican, who was greatly loved by all the Members of this body, former Senator Austin, of Vermont.

I should think the President might now wish to consider the appointment of a successor to Henry Cabot Lodge. I can think of nothing that would more effectively show the Communist world our unity than to replace Mr. Lodge with Mr. Adlai Stevenson; or if the President feels that a Democrat is not suitable, certainly there are many persons within his own party, such as Arthur Dean or General Gruenther, who would be suitable to head the U.S. delegation to the United Nations.

The General Assembly convenes in less than 4 weeks. If we are to be prepared, the one to succeed Mr. Lodge ought to be assuming his responsibilities now.

Finally, it seems to me that the Republican presidential nominee would want to utilize Mr. Lodge in planning the Republican approach to the campaign. I cannot escape the feeling that it must be most difficult for Mr. Lodge to keep his mind on his work, in view of his campaign responsibilities in the weeks ahead.

Most of us here in this body know Mr. Lodge personally. I have the greatest respect for him. I used to serve with him on the Foreign Relations Committee. He rendered many services to the Nation while he was a Member of this body.

In this morning's New York Times there appears an article which, it seems to me, justifies my feeling about this matter. The headline of the article reads as follows: "Lodge Names Editor as an Aid; Bars Politics While Still at U.N.—Picks Vincent O'Brien of Lynn Paper as Campaign Press Officer—Plans To Attend Cabinet Meeting Monday."

It strikes me that this in itself is clear evidence that Mr. Lodge is preoccupied with plans for the coming campaign. I do not know how he could pick out his campaign press officer, make these plans, and at the same time give adequate attention to the affairs of the United Nations.

But, in addition to that, I think it is a great mistake for the United Nations to become directly embroiled in a political campaign—which, it seems to me, will be inevitable.

All of us know that the meetings of the Security Council, and other United Nations meetings, are televised nationwide quite frequently. They were recently. It is very useful to any candidate to obtain free television time, and I am sure that the opponents of Mr. Lodge will feel somewhat at a disadvantage; and I suppose they should be entitled to equal time, in case he does engage in these meetings.

I now read from the article published this morning in the New York Times:

> Mr. Lodge said that it would be "selfish and irresponsible" of him to leave the United Nations before the disarmament talks were over. He said the session was the logical step after the breakdown of the Geneva Conference.
> In what was described as his last news conference here, Mr. Lodge said he did not expect to resign his United Nations portfolio until after the coming meetings of the Disarmament Commission in New York. He said he had no idea when the meetings would end.

Mr. President, past disarmament discussions have continued week after week—although with slight accomplishments, it is true. But they seem to last for quite a long time; and such a forum would, I think, be too intimately connected with the forthcoming campaign if Mr. Lodge continued in his present capacity.

I read further from the article:

> Henry Cabot Lodge, the Republican vice presidential nominee, named his campaign press officer today. But he declined to discuss details of campaigning in view of prior commitments as U.S. representative to the United Nations.
> When he starts campaigning, Mr. Lodge said, his press officer will be Vincent O'Brien, 50 years old, of Lynn, Mass. Mr. O'Brien will take a leave of absence from his post as news editor of the Lynn Item. He has been on the staff for 25 years.
> Mr. Lodge said that Soviet intimations that he planned to use the coming talks as a forum for political campaigning were typical of Russian propaganda, the black is white, war is peace, falsehood sort of thing.

I submit that regardless of his intentions or the purity of his heart, there will, nevertheless, be that effect.

I read further from the article:

> Mr. Lodge said that President Eisenhower has asked for the disarmament talks long before I was even considered as a nominee for Vice President.
> The nominee held the conference in a small reception room off the garden of his two-story brick home overlooking Beverly Harbor. Contrary to impressions that he had been resting here for 4 days, Mr. Lodge said that he had been working from 8:30 a.m. until after 6 p.m. daily on speechwriting material.

He did not say whether that material was for speeches at the United Nations Disarmament Committee discussions or whether it was speechwriting material for the campaign.

The article also states that "later he and Mrs. Lodge posed for photographers in the garden."

I suppose the photographs are to be used at the United Nations disarmament meetings.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I notice that the Senator from Arkansas is reading from a newspaper item.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes; from an article published this morning in the New York Times.

Mr. AIKEN. I have read it, too; and yesterday I read another statement, credited to Mr. Lodge—although I do not know whether it is true—to the effect that he is expected to resign his post before the coming meeting of the United Nations, which I think is set for September 19, and which corresponds rather closely to the intensive part of the coming political campaign.

Actually, I would think there would be nothing improper in Mr. and Mrs. Lodge having their picture taken in the garden. Certainly, as a setting it would be even more appropriate than for a presidential candidate to have his picture taken in a room adjoining the Senate Chamber.

If we are to be deprived of Mr. Lodge's services at the disarmament conference, which I understand is almost in progress now, it would be very difficult to break in a new man, a green man, for conferences to be held over the next 3 weeks. It would be almost as difficult as breaking in a new majority leader for the Senate or a new champion for the minimum wage bill—I almost said "civil rights," but I caught myself in time and did not say it.

As for appointing Adlai Stevenson to the position, I assume the Senator feels it would be for the purpose of training him for his work as Secretary of State if conditions later warranted his appointment. But what about CHESTER BOWLES? The Senator would not want to injure his feelings, would he? In the part of the country I come from, some people think CHESTER BOWLES should be the next Secretary of State in the event of a Democratic victory in November. Would it not be just as well to appoint him in case the Democratic Party won, rather than Adlai Stevenson, who may be the choice for Secretary of State in other parts of the country? Apparently, one thing we have not caught up with——

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, just so I may not lose the privilege of the floor, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield for a colloquy between the distinguished and able Senator from Vermont and the distinguished and able Senator from Arkansas without losing the floor, and with the understanding that their remarks will appear in the RECORD after my remarks.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not think I can contribute too much more for the edification of the Senate, so I will not ask the Senator from Arkansas to yield any more.

Mr. ERVIN. I have yielded for that purpose.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from North Carolina had already yielded to me by unanimous consent, and, under the usual understanding, I am free to yield to any other Senator.

Mr. ERVIN. I have made a unanimous-consent request that the distinguished and able Senator from Arkansas may engage in a colloquy with the distinguished and able Senator from Vermont or any other Senator, without my losing the privilege of the floor and with the understanding that their remarks shall follow my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In answer to the statement of the Senator from Vermont, I did not mean to say that Adlai Stevenson was the only Democrat qualified to serve. I mentioned him as an example only. CHESTER BOWLES and a number of others I could mention would serve with great distinction. It is true that under the Democratic administration, under some degree of bipartisanship in foreign policy, Mr. Truman appointed Mr. Austin, as the Senator well knows, as our delegate to the United Nations, as well as naming to positions of responsibility people like John Foster Dulles; prior to that, Mr. Lovett and Mr. Stimson. There has been a long history of that.

The point I am trying to make is that it is a different matter when one takes pictures of people in the anteroom of the Senate Chamber. They are not candidates. Mr. Stevenson is not a candidate for anything. He is a distinguished private citizen with experience in this field, compared, I would say, to that of Mr. Austin. I do think it is bad for an active candidate to be our representative in the United Nations. The President and other members of his party have often said we should not play politics with foreign affairs. We should try to keep it outside of the realm of the usual partisanship which, unfortunately, is a characteristic of the democratic process, and in which elections are often undignified, and in which unwarranted statements are made. But it is an accepted custom.

Here is our Ambassador at the United Nations, and it so happens that at the moment the United Nations is especially in the public eye.

At the moment it is undertaking one of the most unusual and unprecedented actions in its history; that is, sending troops into the Congo to try to establish law and order. The troops went in there yesterday. It is a very ticklish situation, which draws the attention of the whole world to the United Nations. It certainly draws the attention of this Nation to it. But Mr. Lodge is an active candidate, and the campaign is already under way. One of the candidates for the Presidency, Mr. NIXON, has already opened his campaign in Hawaii, and he is proceeding daily, according to the press, to make speeches, and so on. I do not complain about that, and I do not complain that Mr. Lodge was nominated. I merely say it is unsuitable and certainly does not promote bipartisanship to have him continue in an office where he is in a position to use his assignment for political purposes. Whether he intends it or not has nothing to do with it.

I notice further these words in the article:

> Mr. Lodge had no comment on further additions to his campaign staff. But there was an impression that his brother, John Davis Lodge, Ambassador to Spain, might resign in time to come home and help out.
> John Lodge is a former Governor of Connecticut and an experienced campaigner.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator from Arkansas believe it is wrong for the younger brother of a candidate to be active in the campaign of his brother?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not think it is wrong, and I also have great affection and respect for John Davis Lodge. John Davis Lodge is going to resign as Ambassador if he comes home and engages actively in the campaign.

I think the Senator would agree that it would be most unsuitable and inappropriate if John Davis Lodge came home without resigning, and entered into the campaign. I do not think there would be any question in the Senator's mind that it would be beyond the pale.

Mr. AIKEN. I think if he were openly active in a campaign he should resign, but I remind the Senator again that he is reading from a newspaper item; and I might call attention to the fact that another newspaper article stated it was the intention of Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge to resign his position as delegate to the United Nations before the new session of the United Nations convenes on September 19. I think it is only natural that he would have work to clean up, which might take 3 or 4 weeks, before turning the office over to a successor. I think it is only natural that Mr. Khrushchev and the Russian delegates at the United Nations have little liking for Mr. Lodge.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The decision bears upon this question: Mr. Lodge has established a reputation for being especially offensive to the Russians. Apparently one of the issues in the coming campaign is going to be who can be the most offensive, or who has been the most offensive. It clearly bears upon the matter. I do not see why he needs to continue in this office after the campaign is under way; and it is under way. The presidential candidate sets the tone as to whether it is under way. He has already opened his campaign, and it is proceeding.

If this is to give Mr. Lodge a further opportunity to demonstrate his anticommunism, it certainly will contribute to the campaign. It has a bearing upon one of the issues.

I do not wish to go into the merits of whether this is a legitimate issue in the campaign or not, but according to the press it is.

The Senator seems to insinuate or to leave the implication that the article is not accurate. Of course, I cannot verify it. It is written by John H. Fenton, a special dispatch to the New York Times, dateline Beverly, Mass. All I can say is that under normal circumstances the New York Times has a reputation for being as accurate as any newspaper in this country.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If he or anyone else wishes to disavow it, I am more than willing to accept that.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know about that matter, but I have not yet heard the Senator from Arkansas read anything from the article which would indicate that Mr. Lodge intends to retain his position after the United Nations convenes next month. As a matter of fact, Mr. Lodge has only been the vice presidential nominee for about 2 weeks. I imagine it was something of a surprise to him that he was the nominee. It was a surprise to me, although he had been mentioned, among a dozen others. Two weeks' time is not long to clean up a business one has been carrying on for about 6 years. It is not a very great length of time. It seems to me that 5 or 6 weeks would not be more than would be needed to prepare the work for a successor.

Perhaps Mr. Lodge knows who his successor will be, but I certainly do not have any idea who will succeed him as Ambassador to the United Nations. Whoever may be appointed to that position certainly ought to have an opportunity to have some briefing, and the logical person to brief him is the Ambassador himself.

I do not think he should be charged with doing anything wrong for trying to complete the work of the office to which he was appointed some years ago. To the best of my knowledge he has not made any political speeches of any kind, or any speeches other than in connection with his work. In fact, I do not know that he has made any speeches whatsoever after the nomination.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not know. I have not followed the matter very closely. The article says that he has been working from 8:30 a.m. until after 6 p.m. daily on speech-writing material.

I am making this statement on the assumption that he should be resigning soon, because the campaign is under way.

The second paragraph in the article says, "Mr. Lodge said he did not expect to resign his United Nations portfolio until after the coming meetings of the Disarmament Commission in New York." The article goes on to say, "he said he had no idea when the meetings would end."

Apparently they could go on through November, so far as that is concerned. I would expect a man in this position to say, "I have been nominated for the vice presidency. The campaign is under way. At the earliest opportunity I shall give up my position. I request the President to designate a successor."

He could certainly brief his successor without having to hold the office itself, or without having to appear publicly in the Disarmament Commission meetings.

I do not know the answer. He himself does not say how long this will take.

I had understood a week or two ago that Mr. Lodge was preparing to relinquish the office. I do not wish to make a big point of the matter, but it simply seems to me inappropriate, if we expect some degree of bipartisanship in our foreign policy, for him to continue. The matter of bipartisanship is constantly referred to by leaders of both parties. I think, in all fairness, this side of the aisle has evidenced considerable cooperation in the past several years. I do not believe we have tried to make any undue political hay out of our foreign policy.

It seems to me in deference to that feeling on the part of many Members—and I believe on the part of the public—with regard to our foreign policy, since this is one of the most important foreign policy posts in our country, it should not be used as a vehicle in a campaign. That is the only point I make.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think it is a matter of policy. This is not a reflection on anybody's character or anything like that. I think this is simply a matter of policy.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas is the chairman of the great Committee on Foreign Relations. I think he is quite correct when he says that his side of the aisle has cooperated on many occasions in matters of foreign policy.

I am sure that both of us agree problems of great urgency and of critical importance to the United States ought not to be tainted by petty considerations.

The Senator's value as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is very great. In view of the Senator's value to the country, to his committee, and to the principles of foreign policy—I express this as an opinion—I hope that when the Senator is a candidate for reelection he will not under any circumstances consider resigning from the Senate to conduct his campaign because there might be situations occurring during the campaign when the Senator from Arkansas as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations would be needed in that capacity. I surely hope that whatever the Senator is getting at with relation to Ambassador Lodge, he would not apply it in his own case, and that he would under no circumstances consider resigning at a time when he is a candidate for reelection. The Senator is much too valuable to be spared to the Senate even for that brief period of time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator for those remarks. As so often happens, the Senator is much too subtle for the Senator from Arkansas, and I fail to find the relevancy of his comments, but I sense that in a way they were intended to be complimentary, so I appreciate very much the contribution of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will yield further, perhaps he would let me recite the story of the old lady.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. There is a story in regard to an old lady to whom someone sent a bottle of brandied peaches. In her "thank you note" she said she appreciated the peaches, but that she appreciated even more "the spirits with which they were sent." [Laughter.] I am sure the Senator has the same reaction.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, that is about all I have to say about the matter.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to say on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas that in his conduct of the Committee on Foreign Relations as chairman he has done, I believe, a very good job indeed. Partisan politics have been kept to an absolute minimum. That is as it should be, because there should be no partisanship in dealing with foreign affairs.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator will permit me to so state, I can certainly say that about the Senator from Vermont. Without the help of the Senator from Vermont and the help of some of the other Members on his side, the committee could not function at all. Although the Senator from Vermont in other fields very properly has some partisan attitudes, in respect to foreign relations I think the Senator has been completely free of any partisanship.

Mr. AIKEN. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas. I do not believe the Ambassador to the United Nations should be sitting in meetings and campaigning for the Vice Presidency at the same time. However, I believe it is rather precipitate to ask for his resignation almost immediately after his nomination, which certainly was not expected by many of us, and probably not expected by him. I would say he should have 5 or 6 weeks in which to prepare the ground for the next meeting of the United Nations. I think he should be permitted to attend the forthcoming meetings of the disarmament conference, which I believe will start very soon. He, of course, will not be expected to stay on if the meetings should run on for months or years.

It seems to me that 4 or 5 or 6 weeks' time after he is nominated is not an unrealistic length of time for him to use to prepare to give up one office and campaign for another.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I say to the Senator that I have made no demand, but this article leaves the impression that the present meetings of the Disarmament Commission are indefinite. Mr. Lodge is quoted as having said that he has no idea when the meetings will end, but he is going to stay there until they do.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not think any of us has any idea when the meetings will end. They have been going on for years.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The length of the meetings should not be the controlling factor, because we know the meetings of the Disarmament Commission have been going on for years. His statement apparently leaves the question in the air. He will stay there as long as they continue. I think that is a mistake. I think such action is bound to arouse some resentment on the other side, and especially if this news item gets the same kind of notice that the recent Security Council meetings received. I believe it is a small matter which perhaps is not of sufficient importance even to warrant the present statement, but I think it is an irritant and one of those things that can cause further trouble and inject more partisanship than has heretofore been present in the field of foreign relations. I regret it. We are in a very difficult time in the United Nations right now anyway. I do not suggest that Mr. Lodge is having a difficult time; it is Mr. Hammarskjold and the U.N. itself which are having a difficult time at the moment.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say on the subject. I believe it would be wise if the United Nations had selected some other person. I would not insist upon a Democrat; they might select a good Republican. They might have selected either Arthur Dean or Homer Gruenther, since they are not running for the second most important job in the United States.

Mr. AIKEN. I would be the last to advise any possible Democratic President as to whom to nominate as Ambassador to the United Nations unless my advice were sought. However, I happened to be appointed as a delegate to the United Nations, and expect to take office on the 15th of September, to be prepared for the opening of the United Nations sessions on the 19th of September. Does the Senator from Arkansas think it would be possible to adjourn this session of the Congress sufficiently prior to that time so that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and I might be able to attend the meetings of the United Nations this fall without being accused of shirking our duties in the Senate?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I can speak only for myself. So far as I am concerned, with the exception of the consideration of one or two measures, I am ready to adjourn right now if we can get the necessary votes.

Mr. AIKEN. We have two votes in favor of that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not wish to delay. I believe that many of the proposals before the Senate are dictated by the coming campaign and they are not particularly to my liking.

Mr. AIKEN. We are in accord again.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article by Mr. John H. Fenton, printed in the New York Times under the dateline of August 12, to which I referred, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LODGE NAMES EDITOR AS AN AID—BARS POLITICS WHILE STILL AT U.N.—PICKS VINCENT O'BRIEN OF LYNN PAPER AS CAMPAIGN PRESS OFFICER—PLANS TO ATTEND CABINET MEETING MONDAY

(By John H. Fenton)

BEVERLY, MASS., August 12.—Henry Cabot Lodge the Republican vice-presidential nominee, named his campaign press officer today. But he declined to discuss details of campaigning in view of prior commitments as U.S. representative to the United Nations.

In what was described as his last news conference here, Mr. Lodge said he did not expect to resign his United Nations portfolio until after the coming meetings of the Disarmament Commission in New York. He said he had no idea when the meetings would end.

When he starts campaigning, Mr. Lodge said, his press officer will be Vincent O'Brien, 50 years old, of Lynn, Mass. Mr. O'Brien will take leave of absence from his post as news editor of the Lynn Item. He has been on the staff for 25 years.

WILL ATTEND CABINET MEETING

Mr. Lodge told the conference that he planned to leave for Washington on Sunday night. He is scheduled to attend President Eisenhower's Cabinet meeting on Monday morning. And he plans to confer later with some Cabinet members.

On Tuesday he expects to make the presentation for the United States at the opening of the Disarmament Commission session.

Mr. Lodge said that Soviet intimations that he planned to use the coming talks as a forum for political campaigning were typical of Russian propaganda, the black is white, war is peace, falsehood sort of thing.

Mr. Lodge said that President Eisenhower has asked for the disarmament talks long before I was even considered as a nominee for Vice President.

The nominee held the conference in a small reception room off the garden of his two-story brick home overlooking Beverly Harbor. Contrary to impressions that he had been resting here for 4 days, Mr. Lodge said that he had been working from 8:30 a.m. until after 6 p.m. daily on speechwriting material.

Later he and Mrs. Lodge posed for photographers in the garden.

STUDYING NEW DEVELOPMENTS

Mr. Lodge said that, although he was busy studying developments in areas he had not studied recently, "I won't guarantee that I won't go out in my boat for an hour or so this afternoon."

Mr. Lodge said that it would be "selfish and irresponsible" of him to leave the United Nations before the disarmament talks were over. He said the session was the logical step after the breakdown of the Geneva conference.

Mr. Lodge said that normally the talks might be expected to be finished by the end of August, but I wouldn't want you to hold me to that.

Mr. Lodge paid tribute to Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary General of the United Nations, for his extremely efficient handling of the Congo situation.

Mr. Lodge had no comment on further additions to his campaign staff. But there was an impression that his brother, John Davis Lodge, Ambassador to Spain, might resign in time to come home and help out.

John Lodge is a former Governor of Connecticut and an experienced campaigner.

COHESION—SOILS AND PEOPLE

During the delivery of Mr. ERVIN'S speech,

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Colorado, who has informed me that he desires to make a short statement and perhaps make an insertion in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the able and distinguished Senator from Colorado without losing my privilege of the floor, and with the understanding that his statement and insertions shall follow my remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina amend his statement to include the junior Senator from Pennsylvania following the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to permit me to handle one request at a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I thank the senior Senator from North Carolina. He is always courteous and considerate of his colleagues.

I ask that an address made by Ellis L. Armstrong, Commissioner of Public Roads, in Boulder, Colo., on June 16, 1960, which is a very inspiring and thoughtful address, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COHESION—SOILS AND PEOPLE

(Remarks by Ellis L. Armstrong, Commissioner of Public Roads, U.S. Department of Commerce, at the conference banquet of the American Society of Civil Engineers' Research Conference on the Shear Strength of Cohesive Soils, University of Colorado, Boulder, Colo., June 16, 1960)

I'm most honored to have been asked to talk tonight at this banquet at this most important and distinguished gathering of engineer-scientists. I'm honored in having Dr. Casagrande, who is synonymous with soil mechanics, introduce me. And I'm very proud to consider myself in a small way a part of this group. My first assignment, as a young engineer fresh out of college, was to set up and operate a laboratory for the construction of an earth dam and canal project. And I've been quite involved in problems of soil mechanics ever since.

It is fortunate for me that I was able to stop off between planes on my way to the Western Association of State Highway Officials Conference in Portland, Oreg., to be with you this evening. This puts me somewhat on my own time, and I propose to take advantage of this in broadening the field of discussion from that which I have usually covered since becoming Commissioner. However, as U.S. Commissioner of Public Roads it would be inconceivable for me to talk to any group on any subject without first pointing out the status of America's gigantic road program.

With the passage of the Federal Highway Act of 1956, we in America embarked on what has been called, and I think rightly so, the greatest public works construction project of all history. We are building our highways to meet the needs of our present-day automotive age.

In a nation where individual freedom is supreme, we have evolved a wonderful way of life that has resulted in, by far, the highest standard of living of all history, a standard of living reflected throughout our 180 million citizens. It has been largely created by reason of the freedom of every individual—not just the select favored few but everybody—freedom from tyranny, freedom to strive, freedom to develop the potential every individual has, freedom to achieve, freedom to learn. Another freedom, which is unique today, and that is freedom of movement for every individual which has overcome confining, imprisoning distances. And this has been made possible by our rubber-tired automobiles and highways. And actually this mobility of the individual citizen has created in large measure our very way of life.

We now have nearly 75 million cars and trucks and buses on our roads. Last year we traveled 700 billion vehicle-miles and we spent for that travel about $75 billion. And we are nearly 4 years into the accelerated program of making capital investments in our highways that will yield large returns in opportunity for growth and development, convenience, and savings in time, money, and safer travel to all of us all across America.

Since the passage of the 1956 act, about $17½ billion of Federal and State funds have been obligated in agreements for engineering, right-of-way, and construction on our Federal-aid highway system. Construction has been completed on 110,000 miles of highways and we have another 25,000 miles under construction. Of this total about 7,000 miles are part of the 41,000-mile superhighway, limited-access Interstate and Defense Highway System. This mileage especially, and the 2,300 miles of toll roads incorporated into the Interstate System, has already begun paying great benefits in savings of accidents, lives, time, and operating costs and in providing convenient, smooth-flowing, safe traffic facilities.

A large number of problems have been overcome in getting to this stage and we still have a lot of problems ahead. Nearly 50,000 construction contracts have been awarded and over 1½ million people have been directly involved in the program. On the Interstate System alone over three-quarters of a million individual tracts of property are being purchased for right-of-way. Most of the locations of the 41,000 miles are now tied down after a tremendous amount of study and work and discussion.

All of this accomplishment adds up to a hectic, dramatic, animated, interesting, and rewarding 4 years for us in the highway business and there are still great days ahead. While the going has been tough, there is exhilaration in achieving results in working toward the worthy goal of a balanced, integrated, optimum highway system all across America. So much for that.

Besides taking care of my duties as Commissioner this recital is also to show that I know something about my subject. In our construction of Federal-aid highways, we are moving nearly 20 million cubic yards of earth and rock each working day, and compacting most of it into highway embankments and subgrade. To do this properly we of necessity must know something about soils and cohesion.

In our operations we have 180 million quasi-experts judging us and what we do. Our highways affect every one of our citizens—and affect each differently—so there becomes quite a problem of resolving all the differences. Perhaps only a few are in a position to judge what is best for the overall good—but everyone can judge how our operations affect him personally. And few are backward about letting us know if they don't agree. So I have had to learn a lot about people and their cohesion—friction, of course, is involved here too. Actually, the understanding of people is the most fascinating, stimulating, complex, and important problem we have in the world today. It is necessary that it be resolved if our society and our America and our civilization is to continue.

One more thing before we get down to business: Robert Moses, New York's No. 1 public servant, made the sage observation that to work for the general public for any length of time, one had to be completely indefatigable and just a little bit crazy. I think I agree except there are times when I would eliminate the "little bit." Anyway if you don't agree with some of my ideas, keep this in mind. As a former State director of highways, and now with nearly 2 years as U.S. Commissioner of Public Roads, I've learned to keep out of corners whenever possible.

I think we will all agree that soils and cohesion and people are basic. They are closely interrelated. If you will follow my discussion I think you'll agree that any attempt that people can make toward understanding must start with soils. And neither soils nor people would amount to much without cohesion.

It appears that our earth originated as a primeval cloud of cosmic dust—soil—that rolled through the stormy cosmos and for billions of years passed through ages upon ages of flocculation, consolidation, compression, stress and strain, drainage and adjustment, establishing cohesion and resulting in the earth that we have today. And stabilization is still ahead for, as yet, we don't have perfect cohesion, we still have stress and strain in the soil of our earth, as witness the recent earth upheavals in Chile. This is also true of people as we still have stress and strain as the cold war, the awakening and restlessness of our so-called undeveloped areas, the riots in Japan and elsewhere, and the collapse of the summit well indicate.

Now man, in his eternal gropings and search for understanding, has always postulated a creation. Genesis speaks of the creation with universal accents in its mighty opening phrases. And I mention this because in our thinking it is well to have in mind that as we delve into the mysteries of our universe—or soils or people—every mystery that science resolves points to larger mysteries on beyond. And it is a striking fact that today cosmogony and religion seem increasingly to converge. As Sir Julian Huxley has suggested, "Like the meridians as they approach the poles, science, philosophy, and religion are bound to converge as they draw nearer to the whole."

So this is the way the earth began according to Genesis: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep.* * * And God said let the waters under the heavens be gathered together. * * * and let the dry land (soil with cohesion) appear. * * * And God called the dry land earth * * * and God saw that it was good."

If we want to understand people or soils and their cohesive relationships, it is necessary to get down to solid basic fundamentals, utilizing every avenue that we can. I think we will all agree on this general statement; but what we each mean by basic fundamentals may not be coincident. One of my electronic friends was discussing man with me some time ago and drew up a comparison. He told me that if all the atoms that made up Ellis L. Armstrong were green peas, they would cover the entire earth including all the waters, to a depth of 4 feet. Further they would cover 128,321 other earths of the same size 4 feet deep. But, he pointed out, if the solid matter was absolutely consolidated to eliminate all space between the atom particles, the resultant mass would be a sphere about the size of a small pinhead.

This shook me up so that I haven't even been able to properly worry about the Blatnik committee or the Interstate location in Reno, Nev., since. In checking his figures, I've had a little difficulty establishing whether he was talking about 4 feet normal to the earth's surface or a vertical depth; and I'm not sure of the uniformity coefficient of the peas that he used or the internal structure of the pea mass and its relationship to the critical void ratio; and I have some question concerning the size of the green peas, whether a No. 2 or a colossal large. And I'm still trying to determine the exact size of a small pinhead. But it seems that quite a difference in perspective may get involved in considering fundamentals.

Anyway, if we call on Genesis again for guidance we find this: "God created man in his own image * * * male and female created he them. (He) formed man of the dust (soil) of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul." And God admonished Adam and Eve after banning them from the Garden of Eden: "* * * Till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shall thou return." And this seems as certain as the solidness of this podium.

Actually this isn't a good comparison. If we reduced the sun to the size of a 6-inch rubber ball, the earth would be a speck of dust in the further corner of this room; and the nearest neighbor, in the same relative size relationship, would be down at the Atlantic entrance to the Panama Canal. And my electronic friend tells me that the same relative structure arrangement of the universe exists fundamentally in all materials we consider solid. Maybe we should better say that "* * * dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" is as certain as taxes.

Thus it appears that fundamentally when we talk about soils and people we are actually talking about the same thing. If this is so, then maybe we can learn more about people by applying to them some of the postulations we have established about soils. And if so, this is good; for understanding is not a simple matter in our time. Science has extended our world into the infinitely complex and it is becoming extremely more difficult to cut across our many specialized disciplines to get an overall good look and to see and to understand and to comprehend what soils or people are all about.

For example, modern physics with all its tremendous insights has actually added unmeasurably to the enigmas of man's existence. New paradoxes, uncertainties and dualities have now become a part of man's vision of this little old world he inhabits. I'm having increasing difficulty with the fundamentals of science which I learned in school. It now seems to have become clear, for example, that mass and energy are the same thing. In our probings into the vast, veiled depths of the outer cosmos we are finding that space and time become indistinguishable. This worries me and I wonder about a lot of things.

Actually it appears that we are groping through a rather narrow twilight between the inscrutable universe of elementary particles on one side and the illimitable universe of space and time on the other. And some suggest that actually man himself, as an individual, is just about halfway between.

Thus with any observations made, we must keep in mind the scale and the approach we are using. For instance you and I as soil engineers, on examining a certain soil may conclude that it is well-graded, clayey silt. Those of us with highway leanings may further conclude that it is an A-3 soil, and if our concern is earth dams we may further say it is a good stable zone 1 material. Our wives may conclude that it is either dust, dirt, or mud, depending on number of particles involved and the moisture content. If you happened to be one of the larger individuals of the hordes of living things that abound in the soil, you could conclude that it was a world of large, rough, jagged, boulders and mountains.

Further time is quite a factor. It has been said that the only permanent thing in this world is change and that the stabilization which I mentioned will never be. In fact the Latin poet, Ovidius, made an observation some 2,000 years ago that is still good:

"There is nothing constant in the universe, all ebb and flow; and every change that's born, bears in its womb the seeds of change."

And in our little old world the mountain-building upheavals and the wearing down again have influenced our soils and environment. The Laurentian upheavals probably occurred about a billion years ago; the Appalachians were formed 200 million years ago; and our Rockies and Himalayas, the Alps and Andes were created within the last 60 million years. And the differences in environment are there to see. Certainly the actual problems of soils—and people—are constantly changing.

Our concepts of soils are changing—soil mechanics is relatively new—in fact most of our present concepts have evolved within our lifetime. Our present soil problems are considerably different than even 50 years ago.

Today with harnessing of power through our large construction equipment we are fashioning our environment on a gigantic scale. On our vast Federal-aid highway program, for example, I mentioned the literally mountains of earth and rock we are moving every working day. We are building earth dams to unprecedented heights, even higher than our concrete dams. We are controlling and harnessing the Missouri, the Colorado, the Nile, the St. Lawrence, and the many other rivers of the world. We actually are "subduing the earth," as Adam was admonished at the time he was cast out of the Garden of Eden to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. So, there is need for understanding of soils as never before—an understanding of all soils, because we are today involved with all soils, so we can do a better job of fashioning.

And our problems of people today are far different than previously. Our world has become small—in fact is pretty much one neighborhood. Any spot on earth is within less than a day's travel of any other spot. And we have man-made satellites circling the globe at 17,000 miles per hour and soon we will be riding in those satellites. And for the first time it appears we have the power to literally destroy our civilization and perhaps the world itself. Some suggest that we shouldn't worry too much about a hydrogen bomb or a cobalt bomb starting a chain reaction that would destroy the earth. What if it does; this is really a very minor planet. What a thought. However in the overall it can rightfully be considered as but a grain of sand on a seashore in a world of millions of seashores. But it's quite important to you and me.

In our generation we have been and are involved in accelerating change that is astounding. My father as a young man drove stagecoach through the wilds of southern Utah, Arizona, and Nevada. Cohesion and soils, of course, were of passing interest—either the road was dust or mud, depending on the moisture content—but with good stout horses and the big wheels of the stage it was usually possible to get through.

No one worried too much about road improvement. These roads were quite similar to those that had existed for centuries all around the world, even though some good pavements had been built here and there where concentrations of people and needs had been built up—such as Roman roads and roads in some of the big cities of the world.

In those days, if the foundation of a building settled and the building came tumbling down, or an earth dam failed because of any reason, that was something well in the hands of the gods—and man in his judicious findings to determine if the engineer was liable, classified such occurrences as "acts of God."

In those days also, my father wasn't much concerned about people on the other side of the world or their cohesive relationships. Of course, there was an effect from these folks, but it usually took years for these effects to show up down in the wilds of the great American western desert. Quite a contrast from today when a fist-waving Khrushchev is instantly seen and heard all around the world and where New York can literally be destroyed 15 minutes after a button is pushed on the other side of the globe.

So there is need for understanding of all people everywhere. As individuals we have always been involved in mankind. Over 200 years ago John Donne wrote: "If a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less. * * * Any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls—it tolls for thee." But today we are more deeply involved and minutely concerned than ever before, in fact our very survival is involved.

In my father's stagecoach days, and until about 35 or 40 years ago, there were a few relatively simple generalizations about soils and soil behavior, such as Coulomb's wedge theory essay of 1773. Evelyn, in 1675, had decided that there were 11 classifications for soils, and Anathesus Kircher about the same time computed there were 179,100,060 different sorts of soils, but concluded that only 8 or 9 needed to be considered from a practical standpoint.

Terzaghi pointed out in 1925 that, while there had been a general attack on the unsolved problems of soil mechanics, there was lack of knowledge concerning basic relations between soil properties and that each of the so-called physical properties—such as internal friction, cohesion, plasticity—was in itself so utterly complex a phenomenon that it couldn't be correlated with the others. Soil was then, as it still is, a natural material with no two soil masses identical. Physical performance varies radically depending upon amount, size, and shape of constituents—whether loose, dense, liquid, or stiff, and depending upon water content and the treatment the sample has received.

Today we've come a long way in wrestling with the enigmas of soils and I think we can say that soil mechanics is becoming a well-established science. We have standardized testing and methods of classification. We have various indices which tell us how soils are apt to perform under certain conditions. You are spending a week discussing cohesion, getting a good grip on this problem of many facets. We are accumulating great stores of basic data and are advancing our understanding of such things as pore pressures. One of the largest and most complex investigational studies, the $25 million AASHO road test in Illinois, is producing billions of pieces of data that with our high-speed electronic computers we hope to analyze, systematize, and develop more rational methods of highway pavement and subgrade designs.

Nowadays if something goes wrong with soil foundations, it is the shortcoming of investigations, studies, and design or construction. We no longer blame it onto God but take out after the engineers and inspectors and contractors to see who got paid off, or who didn't do their job.

Our general approach in determining a solution to some soil problem is to run various classification tests to catalog the soil and then follow up with tests to determine the cohesion. We measure the volume change produced by various pressures, the resistance to stress, we measure the undermining of strength by water percolation. While fully recognizing that conclusions pertaining to soil masses in the field involve uncertainties, we determine what we need to do to obtain the necessary strength, the cohesion, to support our structure. And we've learned how to compact subgrades by mechanical methods, by chemical methods, by bolstering up the strength with steel, concrete, and timber piling. And, by and large, I think we do a pretty good job, although the problems are still quite complex as a review of the papers of this conference will prove.

Now when we come to people, we could well classify them by physical size and shape. In this regard we have the distracting factor of male and female, not present in soils, which to engineers make some shapes so much more interesting than others, that proper attention to the entire field is not accomplished.

However, I think there could be some classifications or indices we could use. For example, the other night at a cocktail party in Washington, a fellow at the bar drank about half of his "*n*th" martini, slammed his glass down on the bar, turned around and walked three steps and fell flat on his face, out cold. His friend standing nearby turned to me and stated, "That's one good thing about George, he always knows when he's had enough." This could well be called the liquid limit, and with other variables properly controlled, might be a measure of how well a person could negotiate with the Russians, for example, in working toward worldwide cohesion.

I've always thought that some kind of plasticity index might be worked out. However, the one which is most fascinating to me is a possible oscillation index. I don't know just how this could be best measured, but every time I watch a luscious, tantalizing example of female pulchritude go tripping down the street, I can't help but think of what might be done in this direction. The possibilities are tremendous.

In Washington yesterday I attended the Saints and Sinners luncheon at which the Secretary of Commerce was the fall guy. A couple of burlesque dancers at the luncheon certainly demonstrated there are many variables in this oscillation business but perhaps some relationship could be worked out if we could get oscillation simplified down to vertical and horizontal movements as related in some way to pore pressures.

I expect that attempts to tie down precisely the physical makeup of people into exacting classifications would be difficult and probably not very yielding as I expect you might have as many classifications as you have people. And just how you would relate these classifications to behavior is a bigger problem. In fact it has been my observation that the individuality of persons is a world of continuing surprises rather than a world of uniformity. And this is particularly true, I think, of the female half of humanity and I'm more convinced of this every day. It appears that every person is quite different than every other person. So applying the techniques of soil mechanics to people, the approach must be toward breaking people on down into simpler terms and seeing what can be done.

A human being is made up of a large number of organs and muscles composed of groups of tissues, each group of which has a different function and purpose, and each group dependent upon every other group and coordinated with all the rest. Built into this assemblage are literally thousands of automatic mechanisms that maintain order and function and perform countless tasks. Over 30,000 chemical compounds are formulated within our bodies by the relatively simple foods we eat and sunlight, and some of the products undergo as many as 100 different changes before final use. All of these mechanisms and processes operate and are maintained, usually, from cradle to the grave without worry or attention. We still have great complexity with tissues so we should further break man down.

The tissues, which are considered biologically homogenous materials, are made up of cells, and a mature human being is composed of several hundred million billion separate cells, each of which has a separate existence and each is fully capable of eating, growing, and multiplying by itself. The cells are made up of protoplasm composed of a wonderfully accurate assemblage of millions of complex molecules of many different kinds.

First each cell has 48 chromosomes. In every cell we have two almost identical sets of chromosomes; one set from the father and one set from the mother. And these two sets carry with them the complex hereditary properties which are passed on from generation to generation.

The structural unit of a chromosome is a gene and these are the culprits that carry on the thousands and millions of hereditary characteristics. A gene is considered the smallest unit of living matter, I'm told, and there are several thousand in each chromosome. They are made up of intricate groupings of assorted atoms formed into very complex molecules. In each gene there are about 1 million atoms, and these atoms are formed after the same order as our universe with comparatively the same space between the whirling electrons and their central neutron as between our planets and our sun.

As the smallest unit of living matter, genes have been called by some the missing link between organic and inorganic matter. Quite a distance from dust to dust. Man is fearfully and wonderfully made.

Anyway, this approach just gets me confused so lets start back again with the individual and try another approach. Where did you, as an individual, come from? Actually, we have quite a phenomenon here. Each of you started out from the union of a sperm cell from your father and an egg cell from your mother and these two cells contained all the genes built up by generation upon generation that determined your starting characteristics.

An infant girl contains her lifetime supply of egg cells, estimated at about 420,000. However, only about 400, as an average, develop into mature cells so we'll just consider these 400. It is estimated that in his lifetime, an average man produces about 1,500 billion sperm cells. And the start of you was the union of one of these egg cells with one of the sperm cells. And had the union been of one of the other 600,000 billion possibilities, you would not have been you, you would have been your brother. That is, you would have been your brother if the proper hormone conditions had been present. Otherwise you would have been your sister.

Of course, it wasn't just this one combination that produced the start of an individual, that started you—but rather the characteristics that your father and your mother had inherited from their fathers and mothers—and in turn their fathers and mothers and so on back to the beginning. And it took the exact combination in each of the hundreds and thousands of instances to produce the start of you.

This, of course, is just the beginning of you being you. Your physical characteristics as you now have them are the result of all the things you have done since you were conceived, the result of the food you have eaten, your mental state which affects your digestion of that food, the environment you have been in, the work you have done.

About every 7 years the cells in our bodies become completely changed. Many things have an effect upon the composition of the replacement cells. The soil conservation practice of a farmer in South America who produces bananas which you eat may determine quite a bit about you. If that banana contains rich vitamins from a rich soil the effect on you is one thing. If the banana is from a starved, depleted soil, then the effect on you is something else. It would seem that there are quite a number of possibilities for variables in every individual.

This is the physical you. This is tremendous and wonderful but if you tend to get conceited, remember you are only one of about 3 billion individuals now striving for a good life on our little old world. Taking a quick look outward, our earth is one of the nine planets belonging to our sun. Our sun is a part of the arrangement, the universe, consisting of other suns and their planets. Our universe, which is the milky way we see at night, has about 30 billion suns, most of which are bigger than our sun, and it is reasonable to assume that in our universe there are at least 30 or 40 billion other planets with conditions similar to those on our earth, and where individuals such as you and I could exist without undue discomfort. And, with information from the "big eye" at Palomar, it is estimated there are at least 500,000 billion universes besides ours. Our astronauts certainly have their work cut out for them.

Anyway, this should give you something to think about and help you to get irritating troubles into their proper perspective. I find it most convenient to consider this analysis when I am getting whopped over the head by an irate highway promotional group. However, you should be cautious in your searching that you don't become as one of my friends recently suggested, like a blind man on a black night, in a dark room, looking for a black cat that wasnt there.

Be this as it may, let's get back to you, the individual. I think you can say your physical body is a series of tremendous universes, with a complexity of and an incomprehensibility of organization many times removed from anything we know in the cosmic universe. These billions upon billions of variables are primarily physical, and while there is an interrelationship, there is something else, much more complex, that we don't even have to worry about in studying cohesion of soils.

For imposed on your physical body is your spiritual self, your soul, your mental outlook, your character, which coordinates and uses your physical body, which determines what you do, which controls you, which determines in the final analysis—you—the individual. You remember the Genesis quotation: "* * * and God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul." And this is the part of man that has the greatest effect upon friction and cohesion of peoples.

The character of each individual can be said to be the weighted sum total of the character of all persons with whom he has come in contact directly or indirectly. It may have been profoundly affected by something someone wrote 5,000 years ago. It is affected by those you meet each day. You are the sum total of your past. You are the inheritor of the ages and represent all that has withstood the test of time. And according to Genesis your soul came direct from God.

As an individual man, you stand alone in the complex of nature, the master of vast forces beyond calculation. Man, individually and collectively, is actually arbiter of his destiny, of the cohesion of people, which actually will determine his fate.

And, armed now with present-day knowledge concerning the power of the atom, there is a very real danger that man will end up as quite an assortment of split atoms scattered all over the landscape, providing he doesn't get the problem of cohesion of all peoples resolved.

For we have no guarantee that we'll always be around—our dangers are greater than they have ever been before. Even back in the Bible days Psalms records: "* * * He remembereth that we are dust. As for man, his days are as grass, as a flower in the field—so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over, and is gone, and the place shall know it no more."

We have a challenge. There are those that say we of the Western World, and particularly we in America, who are carrying the torch for the freedom and dignity of the individual human being, the hope for the future of humanity, may be surrendering to the forces of evil on the installment plan. There are those who say that in our affluent society, in our world of material wealth, we are forgetting the dedication to high moral principles that has enabled us to progress, and that we lack the discipline to make these high moral principles effective. There are those who say the forces of ignorance and degradation and tyranny working toward ultimate destruction of the individual, are gaining and will overwhelm us. And they say that our progress toward cohesion is retrogressing—and that the days of man are numbered. I don't agree.

I believe that the problem will be solved, providing, of course, that there is time before man destroys himself. There must be time to win the race of the effects of knowledge and understanding over the effects of ignorance. There must be time to win the race to bring about the cohesion of people. And I believe we are winning the race.

A long, clear view of the history of man shows that whenever he comes to an unsurmountable obstacle, a final barrier, he goes to work and in due time, overcomes it. For man's fundamental features, I think, are his eternal striving to understand, his capacity to learn, his ability to adapt, adjust, and to remake the world in the image of his needs. And while we still have cruelty and hatred and prejudice and tyranny, I think the world is a better place than it has ever been before because of man's fundamental features—even if today we do have greater dangers. These fundamental features are the strong forces of cohesion—which I think can be summed up as love in its full sense of our neighbors as ourselves, and our neighbors today are all men everywhere.

And I think the potential of man is unlimited and eternal as the cohesion of people is developed. Robert Browning put it quite well a hundred years ago:

"Progress, man's distinctive mark alone,
Not God's, and not the beasts: God is, they are;
Man partly is, and wholly expects to be."

SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS' RETIREMENT ACT OF 1959

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I am sure that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle are extremely desirous of making these last days of the 86th Congress most constructive ones. We have returned here to consider some of the most important legislation of our time and we cannot afford to turn this Congress into a political arena. The eyes of the world are on us and we must prove the critics wrong.

The pending business before the Senate when Congress recessed July 3 was H.R. 10, the Self-Employed Individuals' Retirement Act of 1959. As a cosponsor of legislation embodying the principles of H.R. 10, I am vitally interested in passage of the bill. Earlier in this session of the Congress I heard expressions of interest and approval from members of both parties on this measure. I hope this interest will now be reaffirmed.

This is not new legislation. It was first introduced in 1951 and has received intensive study. It has been reported favorably by the House Ways and Means Committee and twice has been passed, almost unanimously, by the House. On June 9 of this year the Senate Finance Committee, after concentrated hearings, reported the bill favorably by a 12–5 vote, which emphasizes the bipartisan support the bill has received since its introduction 9 years ago.

I am sure that many of the small-business and professional people and their employees in each of our States, who nationally number 20 million, are anxiously awaiting the return of this legislation to the floor of the Senate and watching to see how we, their representatives, determine its fate.

Its return to the Senate floor for consideration was assured, of course, on the next to last day of the session before the recess, July 2, when the majority leader agreed to Senator SMATHERS' suggestion that the bill be further considered in August.

Although, admittedly, we are confronted with legislation labeled, "Priority" and an extremely brief time for action, I do not see how we can in good conscience adjourn without enacting H.R. 10 into law, subject to the President's approval.

Certainly legislation that has been pending for 9 years to correct an inequity that has been existing for 18 years must be considered priority legislation.

I thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for yielding to me.

Mr. ERVIN. I thank the senior Senator from Colorado.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS DURING DEBATE ON MINIMUM WAGE BILL

During the delivery of Mr. ERVIN's speech,

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to inquire of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania as to the purpose for which he desires me to yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will yield to me very briefly, I wish to make a comment in connection with the minimum wage bill and the character of the debate pertaining to it. I shall be very brief. I wish to refer to a current news item.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for that purpose, without losing my right to the floor, and with the understanding that his remarks will follow my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his courtesy.

Mr. President, sometimes I wonder whether there is any particular relationship between what happens on the floor of the Senate and what is dispatched on the teletype or ticker tape. UPI dispatch No. 12 begins with this statement:

Democratic Presidential Nominee KENNEDY passed up campaigning today to shepherd his minimum wage bill through bitter Senate debate.

I was present last night in the Senate for several hours. All of the debate on the minimum wage bill was interesting. None of it was bitter. All of it was carried on by Members of the Senator's own party on his side of the aisle. I did not see at that time any shepherding. I did not see any bitterness. Today again I do not see any shepherding on the part of the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

In fact, I do not even see many sheep. Certainly there is no bitterness involved, and there is certainly an absence of the vigor which the junior Senator from Massachusetts has been calling for on his somewhat rare, occasional, and much appreciated visits to the floor. I know that the occupants of the galleries are waiting for an opportunity to see the junior Senator from Massachusetts, and

I know that he is eager to oblige. I assume he is not campaigning, although the minimum wage bill is still the order of business. It is undergoing debate—desultory debate, it would appear—and I think it is unfortunate that more progress is not being achieved, because certainly we do not want this debate to be obstructive. Certainly we want to get a bill, and certainly I personally expect to support some kind of minimum wage bill, and as good a one as we can get.

My voting record in this area is very well known. I and many other Senators on this side are anxious to get a bill passed.

Therefore, I conclude by saying that I do not know whether the sheep have lost the shepherd, or whether the shepherd has lost the sheep. When I see only one Member, momentarily, on the Senator's side of the aisle, and when I realize that there are 100 Senators, I remember what the Bible says about a hundred sheep and about the 90 and nine, and I will leave it at that.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

THE U–2 "APOLOGY"

During the delivery of Mr. ERVIN'S address:

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, there has come to my attention an editorial published in the Pittsfield, Mass., Berkshire Evening Eagle entitled "What Senator KENNEDY Said About a U–2 'Apology.'" I believe that the editorial is important enough to place in the RECORD at this point. It appears to me to summarize in a clear and statesmanlike manner what Senator KENNEDY did say and did not say concerning the so-called U–2 incident.

I feel that this editorial is so timely and so clear that it deserves a prominent position in the RECORD. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may be placed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT SENATOR KENNEDY SAID ABOUT A U–2 "APOLOGY"

It now seems clear that one of the main efforts of the Republican Party in the current campaign will be to fasten the "appeaser" label on Democratic presidential nominee JOHN F. KENNEDY. This is to be done by stating over and over again that Senator KENNEDY said President Eisenhower "should have apologized" to Mr. Khrushchev for the U–2 spy plane fiasco.

Thus, at the Republican Convention 1 week ago, former Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, recalled Adlai Stevenson's complaint that the U–2 overflights had handed Mr. Khrushchev the "crowbar and sledge hammer" with which to wreck the pending summit meeting.

"Senator KENNEDY went further and said that President Eisenhower should have apologized to Mr. Khrushchev," continued Mr. Dewey. "In my opinion the President of the United States owes no apology to anybody for protecting his country and the free world from another Pearl Harbor."

The theme sounded by Mr. Dewey was taken up the next night by Vice President NIXON. In his speech accepting the nomination, Mr. NIXON slashed out at Senator KENNEDY for his "rash and impulsive suggestion that President Eisenhower could have apologized or sent regrets to Mr. Khrushchev for the U–2 flights which the President had ordered to save our country from surprise attack."

Now what are the facts of the case? Both Mr. Dewey and Vice President NIXON were referring to an impromptu statement made by Senator KENNEDY in a question-and-answer session following an appearance at a high school assembly in St. Helens, Oreg., last May 17. The statement was in response to the question: "What would you have done if you had been Mr. Eisenhower?"

Senator KENNEDY'S answer was tape recorded. According to the record, he began his answer in one way, broke it off, and responded in another way.

"Once the summit had broken up and once Mr. Khrushchev indicated his refusal to continue I don't think that the United States could—but—he said there were two conditions for continuing. One, that we apologize. I think that that might have been possible to do; and that, second, we try those responsible for the flight. We could not do that. It would be highly unfair because the flight had been authorized and therefore that was a condition Mr. Khrushchev knew we couldn't meet and therefore it indicated that he wanted to break it up. If he had merely asked that the United States should express regret, then that would have been a reasonable term. To say we should try those involved—quite obviously that meant that he wanted to break it up and we had no alternative but to let him do so."

Now a careful reading of Mr. KENNEDY'S remarks in context will show, first of all, that he did not initiate the suggestion that our Government "apologize." Mr. Khrushchev did; and the Senator simply indicated that that might have been possible to do. Second, in the next breath Senator KENNEDY declared that the second of Mr. Khrushchev's conditions—that those responsible for the flights be tried—was impossible, and hence the Russian leader's demand for an apology was window dressing. Khrushchev was determined to break up the summit parley in any event.

The third point to be noted is that KENNEDY went on in the same statement to clarify his meaning: "If he had merely asked that the United States should express regret, then that would have been a reasonable term." But Khrushchev's further suggestion of a trial was out of the question.

Taken thus in context, the KENNEDY remarks boil down to an opinion that the U.S. Government might have expressed regrets about the U–2 overflights if it had appeared that such a message would have saved the summit meeting. Inasmuch as the spy flights over Soviet territory were a clear violation of international law, this was a reasonable stipulation. It might be remembered that the administration has expressed diplomatic regrets to other countries, including Castro's Cuba, for violation of their airspace. There is nothing particularly demeaning or treasonable about practicing diplomatic good manners.

Yet in the hands of Mr. Dewey and Mr. NIXON a cool-headed and logical comment on foreign policy is being twisted into the semblance of a demand for a groveling "apology" from the President. This still strikes us as a misrepresentation of the facts. We hope that in the future GOP leaders will try harder to keep the record straight.

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR MEDICAL TECHNICIANS

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, we are all aware of the Salk vaccine program carried on by the National Foundation and most of us know of the Foundation's direct aid program, which has provided nearly $300 million to victims of polio.

Less well known is the health scholarship program started by the Foundation 2 years ago, which provides $500 a year for 4 years to 500 selected students interested in the badly staffed health professions of medicine, nursing, physical therapy, occupational therapy and medical social work.

I am proud that five Oklahoma young people have been awarded these scholarships. The lucky students, their interests and the colleges chosen are: Miss Stacy Ann Shrout, 1612 Newport, Tulsa, medical social work, University of Oklahoma;

Miss Carrol Ann Smith, 314 South Darlington, Tulsa, nursing, Vanderbilt University; Robert Darryl Fisher, 812 East Seventh, Ada, Okla., medicine, University of Oklahoma;

Miss Sandra Lee Flowers, 1632 N.E. 15th, Oklahoma City, occupational therapy, University of Kansas; Miss Sharon Ann Neddeau of the Tahlequah, Okla., Sequoyah Vocational School, physical therapy, at Northeastern State Teachers' College, Tahlequah, and the University of Oklahoma.

THE NECESSITY OF A NEW DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a great speech by a distinguished American, an outstanding executive, Gov. David Lawrence, of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF GOV. DAVID L. LAWRENCE, GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE STATE DEMOCRATIC DINNER, CIVIC CENTER, CHARLESTON, W. VA., AUGUST 12, 1960

Just 10 days ago, I met with many other Democratic leaders in Philadelphia to discuss the forthcoming campaign. It was a regional conference, attended also by officials of the West Virginia Democratic organization.

During the course of that meeting one of your delegates offered to make a bet with me on the outcome of the election.

The bet was that your State will carry for Senator KENNEDY and LYNDON JOHNSON by a heavier percentage than we will in Pennsylvania.

Since the gentleman from West Virginia offered to wager some good Mountain State leaf tobacco against our own Lancaster cigars, I considered it something other than partisan pride when I accepted the challenge.

Now, just to show you that my heart is in the right place, here I am tonight doing what little I can to help him win his bet.

To be honest about it, I am confident Pennsylvania will produce the votes I need to win that bet—but I won't be abjectly unhappy if I lose, just so long as both States end up, solidly, in the Democratic column.

I want you to know, tonight, that I believe it is important—not only to Americans, but to the peoples of all the nations of the world—that we elect a Democratic administration in the fall.

We stand on the edge of a new world—a world which is every bit as challenging and, in some ways, mysterious, as the shores of America were in 1492.

To answer those challenges—to mobilize the energies of our people—to consolidate the friendship of our allies—to combat the rigid, unrelenting march of our enemies—to do these things, the Democratic Party in 1960 has selected a new and dynamic leadership.

Along with many of you, I can remember vividly those other periods in our history when we were faced with a time of great decision.

I remember the days of Woodrow Wilson, who came to the Presidency at the end of a prolonged period of stagnation in which America's economy had declined and its role in international affairs had been paralyzed.

I remember the days of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Those were days of bitter defeat for America's people—a defeat which had seen factories closing, family farms abandoned, public facilities and public schools in shambles. The duststorm of indifference had taken its toll.

America demanded strong leadership. And when the Nation cried out for inspiration, the Democratic Party answered the call with great men who possessed the skill and the stamina to bring out the secret resources of will within the people.

During those periods—and at every similar period in the history of the world—the course of events has been altered by men of vision and intellect.

Our memories of past political victories remain undimmed. But we must always remember that the mission of the Democratic Party is to look forward, to press against the future, to shape the present so that the hopes of man may be fully realized.

The pattern of life in this Nation and in the world is changing with breathtaking speed.

To keep pace with those changes—and others, more swift and more challenging which may still come—the Democratic Party has offered a blueprint for progress. I believe the 1960 Democratic platform reflects the ideals of all America. It is a courageous, dynamic document which can, and will, help change the course of history.

As Democrats we are justly proud of it as a program for the future of our party. As Americans, we intend to live up to the pledges written into that platform. By contrast I doubt that the Republicans will be able to live theirs down.

It may have put on a new face, but the pancake makeup left over from the slick, supercolossal show they called their convention in Chicago cannot hide the fact that it is still the GOP—and that stands for "grim old party," so far as we are concerned.

To meet the critical challenges of our decade, the Republicans ask that we crawl forward in lockstep, inch by inch, carrying banners filled with pinchpenny platitudes. Surrounded on all sides by the fears of our allies and the calumnies of communism, the "grim old party" offers the American people a platform of covered wagon compromise.

It has been glossed over, of course, with the high sheen of Nelson Rockefeller's language. But the words are only skindeep.

Beneath the brave New World salutations, the intent of the Republican Party remains clear: ignore the problem long enough and, no matter what it is, it will go away.

But the critical problems of this day cannot be ignored. The cold, hard facts are always with us, even though we have not been informed of them these past 7½ years.

When the free peoples of the world no longer trust our motives; when our spokesmen in Washington feel they can substitute ninth-inning shouts for intelligent diplomacy; when crisis after crisis is met by fumbling indecision; when we are blackmailed by false threats; when we meet charges of espionage first with fainthearted denials, then with abject admissions—when these things are the order of the day, as they have been for so many months, then the American Nation is in desperate trouble and the cause of freedom is sabotaged.

We have grown accustomed, through long practice, to thinking of the threat of Communist domination as something far removed from our own borders.

Yet the rambling pointlessness of the past 8 years have allowed the hammer and sickle to set itself up, deeply entrenched, in the backyard of freedom—in an island only 90 miles from our own coastline, just 8 minutes away by jet from Florida.

Throughout this great land of ours, there has been a growing concern about our aims, our goals, our very reason for being. In town after town and county after county, I have found people confronted with the grave realities of this age who are determined that America must have a new course, a new vision, a new frontier.

It is, indeed, a time for greatness.

If we are to achieve the greatness our ancestors saw for us, we must have leadership—strong, painstaking, valiant, courageous leadership.

It is time, now, to throw off the shackles of old ideas and ancient mythology. It is time to abandon the old taboos and the "Can't be done" philosophies of the pessimists who would rather do nothing than make an attempt.

The Democratic Party has met that challenge. It has nominated for President a man with the strength of will, the intellectual achievement and the physical stamina to carry its burdens, to reach the right decisions for all its people and restore its dignity among the nations of the world.

We are fortunate, too, in the fact that Senator KENNEDY is a young man in years and is endowed with energetic force and decisiveness.

We have nominated a great man whose qualities for leadership, for understanding our own problems and those of the nations of the world, have been emphatically and dramatically demonstrated.

Senator KENNEDY will bring to the White House 14 years of experience in the legislative branch of our National Government. He has visited every crucial area of the world. He has studies the problems of those nations with searching thoroughness; and he has acted vigorously in the Congress toward the maintenance of world peace because of his understanding of international events.

By contrast we are told that the Republican nominess has been "trained" for his job.

If, by this remarkable statement, the Republicans mean that their man has spent some time as Vice President, all right.

But how can a man be trained for a job by an administration which has failed completely to meet its internal economic crises? How can a man be "trained" by an administration which has drifted through seven and a half of our most perilous years in foreign affairs without successfully damming the onrushing floodwaters of communism in the world?

The Republican nominee has been "trained" in all the wrong ways—he has been trained by directionless apathy, by unconcern, by contradiction and by misinformation.

This much must be clear. If we are to win the struggle for a free world, we cannot depend upon hit-and-miss diplomacy for hit-and-run pantry-style debating.

This year, more than at any previous time in our history, the Democratic Party will be able to present the issues with reason, understanding, and clarity to the American people.

Make no mistake about it. This election is going to be decided on the issues.

It will be decided on the battleground of America's rapidly diminishing prestige.

It will be decided on the issue of our faltering economy and the false philosophy that the Ameriacn economy cannot "afford" to grow as far as that of Russia.

It will be decided on the full range of our civil rights and the progress we must make toward living up to our own constitutional guarantees for all our citizens.

It will be decided on the issue of leadership—and the desperate need for it in the days to come.

It will be decided on the issue of secret governmental decisions in which the American people have been denied the information they need to understand the explosive and critical relationship of this Nation to the rest of the world.

It will be decided on the issues because we intend to devote all our energy and all our information resources to giving the American people the truth—the whole truth.

We have no intention of taking the easy way out. We do not want to lull the American people to sleep, chanting lullabies, saying that everything is all right, charming them with smiles.

The age of the broad grin and the glittering generality has brought us only chaos and confusion; it has lost us friends and it has nourished the propaganda of our enemies.

Just recently, I came across a brilliant commentary by Walter Lippmann, America's most astute editorial columnist. Mr. Lippmann wrote:

"It is plain to all observers that the deepest concern of the American people is with foreign affairs. They are looking for leadership, knowing—because they feel it in their bones—that things are going very wrong, that American influence is declining in Asia, in Africa, and in Latin America, while the Soviet influence is rising."

Mr. Lippman continues: "The people could find that leadership in the Republican Party if it had the sense to nominate Governor Rockefeller. They can now find it in the Democratic Party under Kennedy and the men, such as Stevenson, Bowles, Humphrey and Symington, who will be near him.

"Those party leaders know that in order to stand up to Khrushchev a lot more is needed than to sass him back. There must be power and influence to stand up to Khrushchev.

"The power cannot be generated by running the economy in low gear and pretending to believe that the country cannot afford to arm itself fully or to educate its children properly or to satisfy its public needs.

"The influence cannot be generated unless this country, by the vigor and imagination of its own development, becomes again, as it was under Wilson and Roosevelt and indeed in the 19th century generally, a model of what democracy can do."

Mr. Lippmann concludes with this thought: "There are some among us who seem to think that the way to deal with Khrushchev is to be as rude as he is and to rattle the rocket as he does. Any fool can be rude to Khrushchev and Washington is full of ghost writers who can write rude statements.

"But we are not suffering from a lack of rudeness in our policy. What we are suffering from is a failure to attract enough friends among the masses of the people of Asia and Africa and Latin America."

Walter Lippmann, as you may remember, was one of General Eisenhower's strongest early supporters in 1952. He thought he saw—as did many other Americans—the elements of domestic leadership in the man who was a great military leader.

I believe Mr. Lippmann's disillusionment is shared by most American citizens today. I know it is shared by a vast number of this Nation's responsible leaders.

Mr. Lippmann would not find the welcome mat out around the White House these days, I am afraid.

The administration in Washington has little use for criticism of any kind. So far as they are concerned, they make the bed and the American people can lie in it—like it or not.

At the Republican Convention, the President classified the administration's critics as "a cult of professional pessimists" and pictured himself as a Biblical Job suffering the boils of their criticism.

The administration attitude seems clear: Anything it does should be considered beyond criticism.

If you will bear with me, I should like to quote a few words which apply directly to this point:

"During recent years a theory has developed that there shall be no criticism of the foreign policy of the administration; that any such criticism is an attack on the unity of the Nation; that it gives aid and comfort to the enemy and sabotages bipartisan foreign policy.

"This proposition is a dangerous fallacy threatening the very existence of the Nation. * * * Members of Congress have a constitutional obligation to constantly reexamine and discuss the foreign policy of the United States. If we permit appeals to unity to bring an end to that criticism, we endanger not only the constitutional liberties of the country, but even its future existence."

Listening to those words, it would be possible to imagine them coming from the lips of Senator KENNEDY or Senator JOHNSON, or Senator SYMINGTON.

But they are not KENNEDY'S or JOHNSON'S or SYMINGTON'S words. They are the words of Senator Robert A. Taft, the late Republican leader in the Senate and the virtual embodiment of his political party. The date was January 5, 1951, during the war in Korea.

The Democratic Party believes that there have been serious, often disastrous errors in judgment and in policy during the Eisenhower administration. The Democratic Party has every intention of telling the truth about those errors.

The Democratic Party in America today is genuinely a party with a mission. Whether that mission succeeds will depend, almost entirely, upon what men and women such as you can accomplish in the few remaining weeks before America makes its most important decision in decades.

Our first and foremost responsibility, at this moment, is in the field of voter registration. Election day is less than meaningless for the voter whose name is not on the registration rolls.

Getting those registrations on the books and then getting out the vote in November will take hours and days and nights of hard, person-to-person work on your part.

It is imperative, therefore, that we consider the task of registration the first step toward a successful election campaign.

All we ask this November is that the citizens of West Virginia and Pennsylvania—and of America—be allowed to make a fair, openminded decision—a decision each of them can reach in the voting booth accompanied by nothing and no one but his own conscience.

If this is true, then there is no doubt in my mind that we will win this election.

Let me emphasize, once more, the importance of the work you must do at the local level.

You will have local democratic candidates running for office.

When Senator KENNEDY accepted our nomination for the Presidency, he set down the goals of this campaign and of his administration. This is what he told the delegates in the Los Angeles coliseum:

"We stand today on the edge of a new frontier—the frontier of the 1960's—a frontier of unknown opportunities and perils—a frontier of unfulfilled hopes and threats.

"Woodrow Wilson's new freedom promised our Nation a new political and economic framework. Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal promised security and succor to those in need.

"But the new frontier of which I speak is not a set of promises—it is a set of challenges."

We know—you and I—how many of those challenges are still to be met. In some parts of West Virginia and in my own State, we are forced to live with the physical evidence of those challenges every day.

Judging from the comments I have read in newspapers from your fine State during recent weeks, it would seem that there is some editorial dissatisfaction with the attitudes of the Republicans toward unemployment.

If the Republican Party really wanted to hear the opinions and hopes of the American people, they could hardly find a better place to begin than in this mountain State. With its unemployed labor force listed earlier this year as 70,000; with its mines closed and its farm incomes down, I should imagine the miners at Grant Town or Jordan or the unemployed work force at Farmington would have a great deal to say to the Republicans.

The plight of West Virginia's citizens is of ultimate concern to all States of this Union—not only to those who live here. Yet the Republican Party persists in treating economic crises as though they were limited, local, isolated quirks of an otherwise pleasant and painless society.

If the Republican Party were really listening to the voices of the people in West Virginia it would know that there is a need for an improved, accelerated rate of economic growth. But the Republican platform stands foursquare on the fence; the Republican elephant has one foot planted uneasily in the intellectual pocket of Nelson Rockefeller—but the remaining three legs are chained to Goldwater, Dirksen, and Walter Judd.

If the Republican Party were genuinely interested in the growing dilemma of the American city, it would recognize the drastic need for greater urban renewal programs.

But the Republican platform dismisses the real problems of our cities with a 225-word shrug vaguely labeled "housing."

Contrast this, if you will, with the detailed, comprehensive, and highly specific recommendations in our own platform.

The Democratic program for America's cities calls for a 10-year action program to restore our cities and provide for balanced suburban development.

The Democratic platform calls for elimination of slums, the restoration of cities and depressed areas.

Senator KENNEDY has called the problems of American cities "the great, unspoken, overlooked, underplayed problem of our time."

I would suggest to you, therefore, that, on these two issues alone, the people of West Virginia have every reason to cast their ballots on the Democratic side in November, for these issues are the bread-and-butter, paycheck issues of their lives every day.

I would suggest, also, that the true beginning of the new frontier must be right here at home—in the county courthouses, the city halls, the rural communities, in the State legislature, and in the Governor's chair.

We have had enough of the empty promises and the complacent false pride which have characterized our political life, these past 8 years.

The destiny of mankind demands new ideas, new determination, and new courage.

There must be a new generation of pioneers in America. We have no choice.

We cannot afford to live in the past. We cannot afford to satisfy ourselves with the achievements of our fathers—no matter how great or small those achievements may have been.

A dynamic, creative administration in Washington is essential to the reawakening of the American spirit.

That administration will come with the election of Senator KENNEDY to the Presidency.

It will come because it will include, also, the determined and devoted services of many of America's greatest contemporary minds.

It will come through the enormous legislative experience of Senator JOHNSON, the most brilliant majority leader the U.S. Senate has been given in this century; a man of extraordinary sensitivity to the needs of all our people in all parts of our Nation.

It will come through the outstanding contribution of men such as Adlai E. Stevenson, whose voice speaks with truth and integrity to all the world's people.

It will come through the intelligent and creative plans for peace of Chester A. Bowles, an architect of modern democracy and an expert in foreign affairs.

It will come through the efforts of countless other great men and great women in the ranks of the Democratic Party—men and women who have been, and are, among the world's responsible leaders—men such as Harry Truman and women such as Eleanor Roosevelt, who is still the first lady of the world.

At the risk of being considered controversial, I would suggest, also, that it would come through the enlistment of the advice and counsel of men from the Republican Party.

In my own mind, the great mistake of this past 8 years has been the blind, steadfast refusal on the part of this present administration in Washington to draw, in any way, upon the resources of men such as Stevenson or Bowles or Acheson.

While it cried out for bipartisanship, the administration has utterly ignored the wisdom of Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman—a wisdom which brought men of high caliber from the Republican Party into an administration which was genuinely dedicated to serving the will and goals of all Americans.

The road to the kind of administration we need—a government which will restore American prestige and provide a new, bold strategy for peace and an influential democracy in a troubled world—demands the vitality and vigor and energies of an aroused and enlightened public.

This is your job.

The true voice of the American past does not say "Sit still—everything will be all right."

All our traditions have pointed toward tomorrow, not yesterday. All our periods of greatness have been times of great change.

They were times when we had great leaders—men who went out, eagerly, to meet the challenges of our Nation and the world.

The true pessimists in modern American society are the men who do not believe America can afford greatness. The true pessimists in America today are those who would shut off debate, who would strangle criticism, who would present an image of America to its neighbors as a smug, complacent, self-satisfied nation too busy patting itself on the back to see the shattered mirror on the wall.

Never before in our history has there been a greater opportunity for this Nation to initiate a positive, constructive strategy for peace and international friendship.

That strategy must be built upon sound economic planning, diplomatic determination and spiritual stamina.

In November, the voters of America will choose the men and the party they feel are best fitted to meet the awesome responsibilities of this decade.

I am confident the people of West Virginia will recognize the qualities of greatness and competence in Senator JENNINGS RANDOLPH, a truly great legislator; in Wally Barron, your candidate for Governor and in all the Democratic candidates who offer West Virginia skillful and humanitarian leadership at home and in the Congress.

I know that the choice of the people of America will be Senator KENNEDY for President and LYNDON JOHNSON for Vice President.

I know they will choose the Democratic Party—the party of hope for the future of a young, hopeful Nation in a world praying that its people may dare to hope again.

When that decision has been made, we will have won a victory, not for ourselves, but for the memory of all that was great in our past, for the acknowledgment of all that is good in our present and for the faith and confidence in all that can be great in our future.

It will be a victory for all men, everywhere, who yearn for human dignity and for freedom. May God grant us the strength and the will to bring the truth to the American people.

The truth, in turn, will bring to our party a smashing victory at the polls in November. It will bring the heavy duty of responsibility in seeking out the new frontier that is ours to have—if only we have the courage and vision to find it.

I am always happy to be in West Virginia, but especially so tonight, because I am returning a courtesy call which your Governor made to Pittsburgh a little less than 3 years ago.

I was running for my fourth term as mayor of Pittsburgh and he came to town to help me along by making a television appearance in behalf of my opponent.

I hope I won't sound immodest when I report that I was reelected mayor by the biggest majority in history—and so it is only natural that I feel grateful for his opposition.

Of course, I really don't believe that you need me to tell you of his political or administrative persuasiveness.

The White House gave the best testimony to his effectiveness and prestige when President Eisenhower slammed the depressed areas veto in his face.

But the Republicans really are a pretty decent lot at times. Since they could not oblige West Virginia and other distressed States with an area development law, they made up for it to your Governor by naming him the temporary—the very temporary—chairman of their Chicago convention.

And although few people really noticed, I understand they even let him make a speech, but his message didn't survive long enough to get in most newspapers—which is perfectly understandable.

I don't know which performance was more ludicrous—his or Tom Dewey's. As someone said after the Dewey performance, Tom should know that there is really only one little man with a mustache who is a comedian—and it isn't Dewey.

On serious reflection about your Governor's role, however, it seems that the Republicans know a temporary public figure when they see one—as the people of West Virginia will demonstrate when they permanently and decisively retire him from public affairs in November.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I rise to express my most vigorous opposition to the pending amendment offered by our good friend the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. The Senator's amendment is proposed to be inserted on page 24 of the pending measure, between lines 5 and 6, and it reads as follows:

SEC. 11. Except as may otherwise be expressly provided by law, the powers of the Secretary of Labor to regulate wages, hours, or other conditions of employment shall be limited to those specified by the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended.

Mr. President, in his remarks concerning the effect of this amendment, the senior Senator from Florida, at page 16308 of yesterday's RECORD, stated:

The Secretary of Labor insists that he has the power under other acts to prescribe conditions of work, wages, and hours, as well as housing conditions and other conditions of labor.

The senior Senator from Florida indicates that the Secretary predicates this authority upon the Wagner-Peyser Act. He states further:

The industries affected feel with very deep conviction that the Secretary has no authority to do this.

The language of the senior Senator from Florida carries with it the clear implication that the Secretary of Labor has, by regulations issued under the Wagner-Peyser Act, attempted to regulate the wages, hours, or other conditions of employment, of domestic farmworkers. The Senator has not submitted any evidence to support the conclusion that such regulations have been issued. And the fact is that no such regulations are in existence.

The truth of the matter is that the regulations at which this amendment apparently is directed merely prohibit the use of the interstate recruitment machinery of the nationwide system of public employment offices to obtain workers for employers offering jobs with conditions that provide wages, housing, transportation, and other conditions of work that are below those which are prevailing in the area.

As a matter of fact what the Senator's amendment would attempt to do is to make the Federal Government an agent in the recruitment of workers for employers who are undercutting other employers in the same area.

We should not be misled by the language of this amendment. It is, in actuality, directed at recision of the minimum and reasonable standards for the use of the public employment offices. I frankly doubt that the language accomplishes the purpose of its sponsor; assuming that it does, however, it presents squarely the question as to whether public funds should be used to establish and maintain facilities for furnishing out-of-State workers to employers unwilling or unable to offer prevailing local wages and working conditions. It raises the question of whether governmental agencies financed by tax revenues should lend their machinery and assistance to undermine the prevailing employment practices in any area.

I would also point out, Mr. President, that the bill which we are today considering is a bill to increase the minimum wages for nonagricultural workers. The proposed amendment purely and simply is to permit the use of governmental facilities to undercut the already substandard wages of agricultural workers.

It is incomprehensible to me that anyone would suggest that the Government of the United States would and could properly be a party to such practices; that Americans would advocate and sanction the use of public moneys to assist any employers in obtaining workers from distant points at substandard wages—at wages which would depress the prevailing wage scale in the area of employment—at wages which would give an unfair competitive advantage over other employers in the area who are not interested in engaging in such practices.

I noted with interest the Senator's statement yesterday:

The industries affected feel with very deep conviction that the Secretary has no authority to do this.

I think it of interest to point out that the question has been laid squarely before the Attorney General of the United States who rendered an opinion clearly supporting the authority of the Secretary to issue the regulations in question.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks both the regulations in question and the Attorney General's opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I think this body should also be aware of the fact that this very question was considered in 1946 by the Senate Labor Committee which at that time was considering amendments to the Wagner-Peyser Act and not to some irrelevant act. The question of the Secretary's authority to issue such regulations was laid squarely before that committee, and after due consideration of all the testimony before that committee, the Senate issued the following report, and I quote from Senate Report No. 1266, 79th Congress, 2d session, page 20:

Under the Wagner-Peyser Act the Secretary of Labor is authorized to promulgate rules, regulations, and standards of efficiency necessary to carry out the provisions of that act. Under that authority the Secretary is empowered to issue reasonable referral standards necessary to conduct an effective employment-service program. The specific referral standards provided for in this section are referral standards which are basic to an effective employment-service operation and constitute minimum referral standards which must be adhered to.

The final part of this quotation is important:

The inclusion of these referral standards in this act is not to be construed as restricting the secretary's authority to issue other reasonable referral standards.

It is important to have the RECORD show at this point that the referral standards in effect at the time the Senate report was issued, and referred to in the report, were substantially similar to the referral standards currently in effect.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, and now pending, has not been considered in committee, has not been given due consideration, and constitutes action directly in conflict with the fully considered action taken by the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield with the understanding that he will not lose the floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield for that purpose.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 12 O'CLOCK MERIDIAN ON MONDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Did I correctly understand the Senator to ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess or adjournment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield, provided he does not lose the floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader about the time schedule and the prospective speakers during the remainder of the day. Today is Saturday. I am quite aware that we had a tentative understanding about ending the session at approximately 7:30 p.m. But knowing that this is the end of the week, and that there are always little personal chores which must be done, I thought a spirit of charity might prevail at this hour of the day and that we could consummate our deliberations a little earlier.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no knowledge of the number of Senators who desire to speak. I was informed by the Senator from Illinois just now that the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] desired to speak. I do not know how long the Senator from New Jersey wishes to speak.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] indicated that he knew of some other speakers. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] desires to speak.

We had an agreement on this subject at one time before, and we finally agreed that there would be no yea-and-nay votes or rollcalls after 7:30. But the Senate can remain in session as late as Senators want to talk, if they want to talk. However, there will be no rollcalls after 7:30.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thought all Senators who really desired to speak, not only on the bill, but perhaps on some other subjects, as well, could be accommodated within the space of an hour.

So, speaking for myself, I would not introduce the slightest objection if, instead of having the session continue until 7 o'clock, or thereabouts, it came to a timely close in the neighborhood of 6 o'clock.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield; with the understanding that he will not lose the floor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. My understanding of the agreement reached yesterday is that it was simply to the effect that there would be no voting after 7:30 this evening. I did not understand that there was any agreement to remain in session until any fixed hour. I am completely content to remain in the hands of the majority leader in this matter. I have no motion to make. I am simply commenting. It seems to me that with the very small attendance in the Chamber, it might be well simply to consider the question of how soon we may expect to be able to go home.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no way in the world of knowing how long Senators may want to speak after 7:30. We did say yesterday that there would be no rollcalls after 7:30.

Mr. HOLLAND. If Senators want to speak after 6 o'clock, I assume they may. Does the Senator from Texas expect to take the floor himself?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would not want to foreclose that possibility. I have no plans to do so. I hoped we might try to proceed to a vote, if we could.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to emphasize the point I last made, namely, that this amendment would have a sweeping effect. Perhaps it is not clear what the total picture would be concerning the programs of the Secretary of Labor in the field of agricultural workers. However, certainly the senior Senator from Florida, who is one of our closest students of deliberative and orderly processes, will recognize, I am certain, that an amendment of this particular effect should properly have the orderly consideration of a committee hearing and discussion, which it has not had.

I suggest to the Senator from Florida that such an important amendment, which has not had proper consideration, should not receive favorable action by the Senate when it has an opportunity to express itself on the amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the kindly references of the Senator from New Jersey to the Senator from Florida. It seems to me that the Senate could very properly pass upon this amendment, for various reasons. First, I fail to find in the law or the regulation which has been drawn, and to which the Senator has referred, any reference to power to fix wages or other conditions of employment, such as those which are fixed in the bill. Yet the present regulation assumes to do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. Let me complete my statement; then I shall be glad to hear the Senator's position.

Second, my information from the vegetable and fruit industries of the Nation is that this regulation has been recently issued, after long contention, and after their asking every chance to be heard upon it, and without the submission of any act or amendment which would have given the approval of Congress to the specific thing which the Secretary of Labor has sought to do.

Third, from my own experience, I am frank to say that the subject has been very arbitrarily handled by the Secretary of Labor. I myself have had some correspondence with the Secretary of Labor on this question, and some dealings with some members of his staff, one of whom told us that he thought it was not any business of the employers what wage requirements were placed in the act; and until he was directed by his superiors to give us more information, we were unable really to find out what was contemplated.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that while in parts of the Nation production of fruits and vegetables will soon be ending, there are portions of the Nation, including my own State, where the planting for the fall crop and the winter crop will soon be underway. A very important vegetable crop, constituting most of the winter vegetable supplies of the Nation, is covered by this regulation.

So there has been no opportunity, so far as I have heard, for those industries to be heard on any proposed measure giving specific power to the Secretary of Labor to do what he has assumed to do.

I understand the Secretary of Agriculture has strongly opposed the issuance of this regulation, and that there is quite a difference of opinion between the two agencies; and that the agency which is peculiarly charged with the duty of supervising the agricultural industries of the Nation is opposed to the regulation in the form in which it has been issued.

I will not state that of my own knowledge. I have not had that statement made to me by Secretary Benson or any of his staff. But that is my understanding from various sources. So I think the subject is a very proper one for consideration as we are considering the wage and hour law. I hope to be heard upon the merits of the proposal at the appropriate time.

I am glad, indeed, to have the expression of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey. We all know he has made a study of the problems of migrant workers. My own study of almost a lifetime in a practice largely devoted to representing agriculturalists, cooperatives, and others, has been more concerned with producing conditions and the problems of the producer in my particular part of the Nation. I know that those producers feel that the Secretary of Labor has not given them very kindly or considerate treatment. I know that their counsel advised them that he had not given them treatment which is supported by the present legislation.

I wanted to make this brief statement, which I shall follow with an argument later. I appreciate the kindness of the Senator from New Jersey in yielding to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Florida.

The regulations under consideration here do not fix the wages of farmworkers. The regulations simply provide that the farmer or the grower may not use the employment offices of the U.S. Employment Service if he pays wages below the area wage; or if his housing conditions are below the standards of the area. The regulation does not affect wages; it merely removes the opportunity for growers who are operating on a low standard, undercutting others in the area, to use the agencies of the Federal Government.

I point out, too, that these regulations are not new. Regulations similar to them have been in existence since 1951. Congress has known about them, and has acquiesced in what I regard as very fair and reasonable regulations under the circumstances.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator from New Jersey believe that the Federal regulations recently issued do not go considerably further than the regulations issued as long ago as 1951, as the Senator has said?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I do not believe there are any new, perfecting regulations which make any sweeping changes.

EXHIBIT 1

THE NEW "WAGNER-PEYSER" REGULATIONS

On November 18, 1959, the Department of Labor issued a revised section 602.9 of the Code of Federal Regulations, to be effective December 20, 1959, and reading as follows:

"SEC. 602.9. Interstate recruitment of agricultural workers: No order for recruitment of domestic agricultural workers shall be placed into interstate clearance unless there are assurances from the State agency that:

"(a) The State agency has established, pursuant to recruitment efforts made in accordance with regulations, policies, and procedures of the Bureau of Employment Security (United States Employment Service), that domestic agricultural workers are not available locally or within the State.

"(b) The State agency has compiled and examined data on the estimated crop acreage, yield, and other production factors in accordance with procedures established by the Bureau of Employment Security (United States Employment Service) to assure the validity of need and the minimum number of agricultural workers required.

"(c) The State agency has ascertained that wages offered are not less than the wages prevailing in the area of employment among similarly employed domestic agricultural workers recruited within the State and not less than those prevailing in the area of employment among similarly employed domestic agricultural workers recruited outside the State.

"(d) The State agency has ascertained that housing facilities (1) are available; (2) are hygienic and adequate to the climatic conditions of the area of employment; (3) are reasonably calculated to accommodate available domestic agricultural workers; and (4) conform to the requirements of the applicable State, county, or local housing and sanitary codes or, in the absence of such applicable codes, have been determined by the State agency to be such as will not endanger the lives, health, or safety of the workers. In making such determinations the State agency shall give full consideration to the applicable recommendations of the President's Committee on Migratory Labor with respect to housing and related facilities.

"(e) The State agency has ascertained that the employer has offered to provide or pay for transportation for domestic agricultural workers (1) at terms not less favorable to the workers than those prevailing among the domestic agricultural workers in the area of employment recruited from the area of supply; or (2) in the absence of such prevailing practice in the area of employment, at terms not less favorable to the workers recruited by out-of-State employers who recruit domestic agricultural workers from the area of supply, as determined by the State agency in the State requested to supply the workers.

"(f) The State agency has ascertained that other terms and conditions of employment offered are not less favorable than those prevailing in the area of employment for domestic agricultural workers for similar work."

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

JULY 2, 1959.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF LABOR.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have your letter of May 8, 1959, requesting my opinion regarding your rulemaking authority under the Wagner-Peyser Act (act of June 6, 1933, 48 Stat. 113, 29 U.S.C. 49 et seq.), establishing the U.S. Employment Service as a Bureau in the Department of Labor with the responsibilities to perform the duties assigned by the act. Those duties, which are specified in section 3, 29 United States Code, section 49b, include the following:

"To promote and develop a national system of employment offices for men, women, and juniors who are legally qualified to engage in gainful occupations * * *, to maintain a farm placement service * * * [and] also assist in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and in increasing their usefulness by * * * assisting them in meeting problems peculiar to their localities * * * and maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States."

Section 12 of the act, title 29, United States Code, section 49k, authorizes the Secretary of Labor "to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act."

The problem involves your authority to promulgate regulations establishing referral standards governing the use of the public employment service in connection with the interstate recruitment of agricultural workers. The regulations require a State public employment agency to give certain assurances before placing an employer's order for agricultural workers to be recruited outside the State. Your letter advises me that the "system for clearing labor between the several States" (sec. 3, supra) functions as follows:

"An employer endeavoring to obtain labor files a job order with a local public employment office, which attempts to fill it in the local labor market. If this attempt is unsuccessful, copies of the order are forwarded to surrounding public employment offices within the State. If the necessary workers are not thus obtained, a copy of the order goes to the State office, which undertakes recruitment efforts on a State-wide basis, and, if these efforts fail, forwards the order to the appropriate regional office of the Bureau of Employment Security, which is a branch of the United States Department of Labor. The ever-expanding area of the search is then widened to include the whole region. All other efforts failing, the order is referred to the Washington office of the Bureau, which, from available labor market information, undertakes recruitment on a national basis, generally pinpointed to the probable area of labor supply."

It appears that referral standards for the interstate recruitment of agricultural labor were first promulgated by your predecessor in 1951 (16 F.R. 9142), and revised in 1954 (19 F.R. 7433). In their present form they provide (20 CFR (Cum. Supp.) sec. 602.9) that a State agency must make assurances as to the housing, wages, and transportation to be accorded to agricultural workers recruited through the interstate clearance system. These are in substance that employers will supply interstate workers with hygienic housing adequate to meet climatic conditions, offer them wages not less than the prevailing wages paid to local agricultural workers, and provide daily transportation from pickup points to the place of employment, and return, in accordance with the common practice of employers in the area. You state that you now have under consideration proposed amendments of these standards. You inform me that in recent years the economic and social problems of migrant farm labor have received wide publicity, that a successful program of interstate farm labor recruitment must take cognizance of the conditions revealed by governmental investigations of these problems, at Federal, State, and local levels, and that this is the purpose of the proposed amendments to the existing regulations. There are cited the Report of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor (established by Executive Order No. 10129 of June 3, 1950, 15 F.R. 3499), congressional committee hearings, studies by State agencies, and numerous news reports, as showing that the housing provided for migrant farmworkers "has frequently been overcrowded, unsanitary, lacking beds and bedding, unheated, and a fire hazard. Some migrants have even been required to sleep in the open, completely exposed to the elements." These conditions "breed disease and thus endanger the health of the whole community."[1] The report of the President's Commission summarized the matter as follows (p. 16):

"Beyond wanting migrants to be available when needed and to be gone when not needed, they are expected to work under conditions no longer typical or characteristic of the American standard of life. In a period of rapidly advancing job and employment standards, we expect them to work at employment which, for all practical purposes, has no job standards."

[1] See, e.g., Report of the President's Commission, "Migratory Labor in American Agriculture (1951)," hearings before the Subcommittee on Labor and Labor-Management Relations of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, 82d Cong., 2d sess., February and March 1952; studies by agencies of the States of Arizona, Florida, Oregon, Texas, and Pennsylvania; the Baltimore Evening Sun, New York Herald Tribune, Providence Evening Bulletin, York Gazette and Daily, Tampa Tribune, Los Angeles Times. The newspaper accounts relate to the years 1957, 1958, and 1959.

Stressing the fact that the Department of Labor has reached no definite conclusion as to the precise content of the proposed amendments, and that, no more than the existing regulations, will they preclude noncomplying employers from obtaining workers who do not come through the governmental interstate clearance system, you state that you have in mind the following three changes: (1) The regulation dealing with housing would require the State agency to assure that housing conforms to applicable State or local housing codes, and, if there are no such codes, that the housing will not endanger the health or safety of the workers; (2) the regulation dealing with wages would require the State agency to assure that the wages offered are not less favorable than those prevailing among employers in the area for workers recruited outside the State, and, in any event, not less than the wages prevailing in the area of employment for local agricultural labor similarly employed; (3) the regulation dealing with transportation would be expanded to require the State agency to assure that the particular employer will provide transportation arrangements not less favorable than those prevailing among employers in the area of employment who have recruited labor from the areas in which the workers are to be obtained; if there is no such prevailing practice, transportation arrangements must be no less favorable than those prevailing in the area of supply as determined by the local employment office. You state that the proposed housing amendment recognizes the existence of local remedial measures and prohibits the use of the interestate labor recruitment system to subvert them, and that where no remedial measures have been enacted, the amendment will preclude the public employment service from being utilized to send workers over long distances to employment providing quarters dangerous to their health and safety. Concerning the proposed wage amendment, it is said that its purpose, like that of the existing regulation, is to prevent the use of the interstate system as a vehicle for undermining prevailing wage rates in the area of employment. As to the transportation amendment, you advise me that like the wage proposal it seeks only equal treatment for employees referred through the interstate recruitment program.

You inform me that all three proposals represent the development of longstanding policies promulgated by the Secretary of Labor, which have been previously unquestioned, and that you believe that the proposals and the other regulations promulgated under the Wagner-Peyser Act, particularly in the area of interstate recruitment of workers, are within the scope of the authority conferred upon the Secretary of Labor by the act. You have transmitted the opinion of your chief legal officer in support of your conclusion. The request for my opinion appears to have been prompted by the fact that a number of persons have questioned both the propriety of the proposed amendments and the authority of the Secretary of Labor to issue regulations providing standards for interstate recruitment of workers. You enclose a copy of a letter received by your solicitor from the counsel of the House Committee on Agriculture, maintaining that the Wagner-Peyser Act confers no authority upon the Secretary of Labor to issue regulations of the nature herein involved.

The committee's counsel makes the following points: (1) Nowhere in the act, either by expressed language or by necessary implication is there any delegation of power to the Secretary of Labor to promulgate referral standards, and no intention on the part of Congress to delegate such power is to be found in the legislative history; (2) the legislative materials indicate that the sole intention of Congress was to establish the public employment service as "a service agency" to assist and encourage the development and operation of free public employment offices without any authority to exercise substantive controls over conditions and terms of employment; (3) the act cannot reasonably be construed as conferring upon the Secretary the power to promulgate substantive regulations regarding conditions and terms of employment with respect to agricultural labor in the face of consistent exemptions of such labor from regulatory statutes, such as the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938) 52 Stat. 1060, 1067, 29 U.S.C., secs. 201, 213), and the Walsh-Healey Act (49 Stat. 2036, 2039, 41 U.S.C., secs. 35, 43); (4) section 11(b) of the act (29 U.S.C., sec. 49j(b)), authorizing and directing the Secretary in carrying out the provisions of the act to provide for the giving of notice of strikes or lockouts to applicants before they are referred to employment, is perhaps the most compelling indication of congressional intent—the fact that Congress felt it necessary to include this specific referral standard shows that it intended no others.

In considering this matter my function is of course a limited one. It is not to act as a superior administrative officer passing upon the wisdom of your decision to exercise whatever rulemaking powers have been granted you by the Wagner-Peyser Act. This is a responsibility which Congress has confided in you as the administrator of the act, and in law I do not share it. Although technically the Attorney General does not, like a court, sit in review of agency rulemaking, your authority should be viewed in the light of judicial principles applicable in that area. This seems to have been the approach taken by Attorney General Mitchell in advising the Secretary of the Treasury on similar problems (36 Op. A.G. 510 (1932)). The judicial standard is whether the agency rule is inconsistent with the statute or is in itself unreasonable or inappropriate (United States v. Morehead (243 U.S. 607, 613–614); Boske v. Commingore (177 U.S. 459, 470); Forbes v. United States (125 F. 2d 404, 409 (C.A. 9, 1942); 36 Op. A.G. 510, supra). And the invalidity of an administrative regulation must be made plain to warrant striking it down (Boske v. Commingore, supra; Knight v. Mantel (135 F. 2d 514, 517 (C.A. 8, 1943)); and see Labor Board v. Seven-Up Co. (344 U.S. 344, 346–347).

That in the act itself there is no express or necessarily implied delegation of power to the Secretary to establish referral standards does not establish a lack of power. The existence of administrative authority to promulgate rules on a particular subject does not depend on such considerations but may be found in the legislative grant to the administrator of general rulemaking power (American Trucking Associations v. United States (344 U.S. 298, 309–312)). And I have recently so held. See 41 Op. A.G. No. 73 (Dec. 18, 1958); Id., No. 41 (Nov. 29, 1957). That the legislative history is also silent is of course equally without significance. The absence of authority is not established by the absence in the legislative history of evidence of an affirmative intention to grant the claimed power. I do not find the references cited to demonstrate an intent to deny the power convincing. The expressed concern of Congress to have the Federal agency "help and encourage" the States and "cooperate" with them (73d Cong., 1st sess., S. Rept. No. 63, p. 4; H.R. Rept. No. 158, p. 2) does not necessarily show an intention to exclude from the rulemaking power of the Secretary the subject of referral standards. It might indeed be said that a contrary intention was present because the House Committee, although it recognized that the purposes of the existing Federal Employment Service included the "improvement of working conditions" (ibid.), one of the basic statutory responsibilities of the Secretary (37 Stat. 736; 5 U.S.C. 611), did not indicate that the subject was to be excluded in his operation of the new service. The legislative history is wholly inconclusive.

I have also considered the specific delegation found in section 11(b). It does not show that Congress necessarily intended to confine the general grant of rulemaking authority of section 12 solely to procedural and administrative matters. The provision merely seems to reflect the feeling of Congress that a matter of such importance ought not to be committed to the discretionary regulatory power of the administrator. This view is supported by the mandatory language of section 11(b). Moreover, as pointed out by your Solicitor, such a narrow view of the Secretary's rulemaking power is inconsistent with section 9 of the act (29 U.S.C. 49h), and the decision of the Court of Claims in Ottinger v. United States (123 Ct. Cl. 23 (1952)).

Section 9 requires the Secretary "to ascertain whether the system of public employment offices maintained in each State is conducted in accordance with the rules and regulations and the standards of efficiency prescribed by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of this act." It is unlikely that Congress would have affirmatively placed upon the Secretary such responsibilities if it did not consider that the rules, regulations, and standards of efficiency were to be of substantive importance rather than merely procedural and administrative. The Ottinger case involved a longstanding policy of the U.S. Employment Service of prohibiting referrals to jobs which are vacant because the former occupant is on strike or is locked out in the course of a labor dispute, or the filling of which is an issue in a labor dispute. (See 20 CFR 602.2(b).) The policy was continued in effect when the employment service became an operating arm of the War Manpower Commission during World War II. Pursuant thereto the Commission refused to authorize referrals to an Army contractor involved in a labor dispute. In dismissing the contractor's suit for damages allegedly suffered as a result, the Court of Claims rejected the contention that the Commission's policy was so unreasonable and arbitrary as to be illegal. The rationale of its holding appears to have been that when the Government went into the business of running employment agencies it was faced with the same problems as private employment agencies and could deal with them similarly. A private agency, the court stated, "would have lost its patronage" if it had, "without warning, referred an applicant to a job where there was a strike or picketing" (123 Ct. Cl., at 45–46).

The Ottinger case does not imply that the referral standard was without justification in the Wagner-Peyser Act itself. Nor is it inconsistent with the earlier decision of the same court in Sanders v. United States (104 Ct. Cl 1 (1945)), where Government reliance on the standard was rejected. The cases are factually distinguishable. In Sanders, unlike Ottinger, the Government had expressly obligated itself by contract with the plaintiff to furnish him workers through the U.S. Employment Service. It had to live up to its contract regardless of what it might otherwise be free to do. In Ottinger, where the Government was under no such contractual obligation (see 123 Ct. Cl., at 39), the legality of the referral standard was directly in issue.

Congress, in section 12 of the act, has vested in the Secretary the power "to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out" its provisions. Such a broad grant of rulemaking power is a sufficient legal basis for the promulgation of substantive standards unless it may be fairly said that the subject matter of those standards is wholly outside the purposes and policies of the act (Cf. Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. Labor Board (319 U.S. 533, 540)).

II

I cannot say that prescribing referral standards for the interstate recruitment of farm workers power has no rational relation to the basic purposes and objectives of the act, or that the standards involved are in themselves arbitrary and unreasonable. The act does not, of course, vest in the Secretary of Labor any power to require employees of farm labor to abide by working conditions which in the opinion of the Secretary are desirable. In disclaiming such power, you properly point out that the only effect of the referral standards is to withdraw the facilities of the public employment offices from noncomplying farm employers who remain free to secure workers through other sources. They are subject to no direct regulation. Viewed in this light it is difficult to see a violation of the assumed normal practice of Congress of exempting agricultural labor from the operation of regulatory statutes, as for example, the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Walsh-Healey Act (Cf. American Trucking Associations v. United States (344 U.S. 298, supra, at 317–318)).

Section 3 of the act, supra, directs the U.S. Employment Service "to maintain a farm placement service" and to increase the usefulness of public employment services "by maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States." You state that the regulations in question are designed to enable the public employment offices to perform a more effective job in the interstate recruitment of unemployed domestic farmworkers to regions experiencing a shortage of agricultural labor. This is elaborated in the opinion of your Solicitor as follows:

"No one would deny that a private employment agency would * * * lose its patronage if it referred workers to jobs which provided housing unfit for human habitation, or which paid wages below the level prevailing in the community, or which required the workers to furnish more than the customary share of transportation costs. The Secretary of Labor is confronted with the same problem. If he is to maintain an effective farm placement service and a functioning system of clearing labor between the States, he must offer prospective employees minimum assurances of the nature contained in the existing regulations and proposed amendments, in order to retain their 'patronage'."

It is also said that these assurances are essential to the fulfillment of the declared objective of Congress in establishing a nationwide system of public employment offices "to reduc[e] unemployment and * * * stabiliz[e] labor conditions throughout the States." (See S. Rept. No. 63, supra, p. 3; H.R. Rept. No. 158, supra, pp. 2–3.) As your Solicitor puts it:

"Unless job orders placed in interstate clearance are required to contain specifications no less favorable than conditions prevailing in the area of employment, the interstate recruitment system could be used to undermine existing labor conditions in that area, in derogation of the declared congressional purpose of stabilizing such conditions. An employer's inability to recruit labor locally may be due to his unwillingness to pay the wages prevailing in his community, or to provide housing adequate to the basic demands of sanitation, health, and safety, or to share in transportation costs on the same basis as other employers in his area. The use of interstate recruitment facilities to supply workers to such an employer could very well create a labor surplus in the area, with resulting unemployment of local workers. The assurances sought from State agencies by these regulations and proposed amendments are essential if the interstate farm labor recruitment program is to be devoted to remedying genuine labor shortages."

In giving you the authority to make rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of the act it is reasonable to believe that Congress intended that you might resort to that authority in order to prevent the public employment service from being used in a manner which in your judgment would defeat the stated purposes and objectives of the act (Cf. American Trucking Associations v. United States, supra, at 310–311). Nor would it seem that your action must be dependent, as appears to be claimed, upon a showing of actual experience as to the deleterious effect of the conditions involved upon the programs authorized and contemplated by the act. The exercise of the rulemaking power conferred by section 12 is of a legislative nature and is not subject to challenge on the ground that the facts justifying its exercise do not exist; the necessary state of facts is presumed (Pacific States Box & Basket Co. v. White (296 U.S. 176, 184–186); and see, United States v. Rock Royal Co-Operative Inc. (307 U.S. 533, 567–568); Thompson v. Consolidated Gas Co. (300 U.S. 55, 69–70)). Moreover, it is not improbable that these conditions may have the consequences you fear. In any event it is your judgment that controls.

The regulations you have in mind cannot be said to be in themselves unreasonable as imposing undue or arbitrary burdens upon employers who desire to obtain farm laborers through the interstate system of recruitment. As to housing, they would merely require such employers to satisfy applicable State or local housing codes, or in the absence thereof, to furnish housing that will not endanger the health or safety of the workers. The remaining regulations would do no more than call upon employers to pay prevailing wage rates and to comply with prevailing practices in the furnishing of transportation, if they wish to use the facilities of the public employment offices. The requirements are consistent with the congressional policy expressed in section 3304(a)(5) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, 26 U.S.C. (Supp. V). Pursuant to that provision the permissible credit toward Federal unemployment taxes is conditioned upon the inclusion in the State unemployment compensation law of a provision prohibiting the denial of benefits to any otherwise eligible individual for refusing to accept new work "if the wages, hours, or other conditions of the work offered are substantially less favorable to the individual than those prevailing for similar work in the locality."

III

Any consideration of the question must also take into account the well-established rule that the construction of a statute by those charged with its execution, especially when it has long prevailed and has been acquiesced in by Congress, is entitled to great weight and ought not to be disregarded or overturned except for cogent reasons and unless it is clear that the administrative construction is erroneous (Great Northern Ry. Co. v. United States (315 U.S. 262, 275–276); United States v. Shreveport Grain & Elevator Co. (287 U.S. 77 84); United States v. Johnston (124 U.S. 236, 253); 41 Op. A.G. No. 9 (Jan. 31, 1950); 39 Op. A.G. 203, 206 (1938); 36 Op. A.G. 510, 513 (1932)). The Secretary's view that the rulemaking power conferred upon him by the act includes the authority to promulgate referral standards has a history of more than 20 years. (See Sanders v. United States (104 Ct. Cl. 1, supra, at 15, 24.))[2] There is in addition persuasive evidence of congressional acquiescence, if not approval, of the administrative interpretation.

In 1945 and 1946 Congress considered various bills proposing amendments to the Wagner-Peyser Act. Some of the bills would have amended the act to incorporate expressly certain of the policies and regulations of the Secretary. One would have authorized and directed the Secretary "in carrying out the provisions of [the] act" to assure that State employment systems were maintaining reasonable referral standards, including "referral of workers to jobs on the basis of their qualifications and at wages and working conditions which are not less favorable to the individual than those prevailing for similar work in the community" (S. 1510, 79th Cong., 1st sess., sec. 212). In testifying on this bill before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor on November 16, 1945, the Chairman of the Social Security Board stated (hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, 79th Cong., 1st sess., on S. 1456 and S. 1510, p. 55):

"The Wagner-Peyser Act, which is now the statutory basis for the Federal-State system of employment offices, is very general in its terms. It is probable that the Secretary of Labor, under his rulemaking power, could prescribe all of the standards and conditions that are spelled out in these bills."

The Director of the U.S. Employment Service testified in considerable detail on the same subject (hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, 79th Cong., 2d sess., on S. 1456, S. 1510, S. 1848, and H.R. 4437, pp. 307–311). The Senate Committee on Education and Labor, in reporting favorably on H.R. 4437, expressly concurred in this view on the Secretary's authority under the act, stating (S. Rept. No. 1266, 79th Cong., 2d sess., p. 20):

"Under the Wagner-Peyser Act the Secretary of Labor is authorized to promulgate rules, regulations, and standards of efficiency necessary to carry out the provisions of that act. Under that authority the Secretary is empowered to issue reasonable referral standards necessary to conduct an effective employment-service program. The specific referral standards provided for in this section are referral standards which are basic to an effective employment-service operation and constitute minimum referral standards which must be adhered to. The inclusion of these referral standards in this act is not to be construed as restricting the Secretary's authority to issue other reasonable standards."[3]

This report furnished the basis for the Senate's action when it passed the bill (92 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 7457), indicating thereby its approval of the administrative interpretation which had been explained to the committee and accepted by it. (See United States v. Zazove (334 U.S. 602, 622).)[4]

Shortly thereafter the Secretary of Labor promulgated regulations prescribing recruitment and referral standards similar to those here involved. These were published in the Federal Register, 11 F.R. 11278 (Oct. 3, 1946). The Wagner-Peyser Act was amended in 1950 (64 Stat. 822), but no action was taken to curtail in any way the Secretary's

[2] The specific referral standards here involved were promulgated at varying dates beginning in 1946.

[3] The committee, at the beginning of the paragraph from which the quotation is taken, expressly referred to sec. 12, the provision conferring general rulemaking authority upon the Secretary.

[4] The bill passed by the House did not contain any provisions regarding referral standards (92 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 547). Objection was made in the House to the Senate request for a conference (id., 1591), as a result of which no conference was had. The fact that Congress did not amend the Wagner-Peyser Act in 1946 to give the Secretary the express statutory authority to promulgate referral standards does not establish the view that such authority did not already exist. (See Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Labor Association (315 U.S. 373, 378–379).)

rulemaking authority. Following the promulgation of the farm labor recruitment regulations in 1951 and their revision in 1954, Congress further amended the Wagner-Peyser Act (70 Stat. 910), and again did nothing to cut down the Secretary's rulemaking authority.

In the face of the longstanding administrative construction of the act as conferring power upon the Secretary to promulgate referral standards governing the use of the public employment service and the evidence of congressional acquiescence therein, I would not be justified in advising you that the construction is in fact erroneous in the absence of a clear and convincing showing of error. In my opinion no such showing has been made.

In considering your course of action you will understand of course that this opinion is limited to the situation presented by your letter and is not to be taken as necessarily applicable to substantially different circumstances.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General.

AMBASSADOR LODGE AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, earlier today, when, as I understand, the leaders on both sides were absent from the Chamber, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], so I have been informed, launched an attack on Ambassador Lodge, the official representative of the United States of America to the United Nations. At the time when the Senator from Arkansas spoke, I was necessarily absent from the Chamber, as I understand a great many of the Members of the Senate were.

I have learned that at that time the distinguished Senator from Arkansas expressed the view that Ambassador Lodge should immediately resign his position as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations.

But, Mr. President, in my judgment this will not sit well with the American people. They will not be happy to learn of the impatience with which Ambassador Lodge's continued service in the United Nations is viewed by some Members of this body. I hope nothing said in this Chamber earlier today by either the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] or by any other Senator, either at that time or later on, will undermine Ambassador Lodge's unstinting efforts in behalf of our whole Nation—Democrats, Independents, Republicans, and all other citizens alike—to win the peace and protect our freedom and security in the councils of the world.

So far as I am concerned, it is much more important for Ambassador Lodge to remain at his post until he has a full opportunity to train his successor than it is for him to get any headstart in the campaign. Of course, I have no doubt that he, as well as some of the Members of this body and some who are not in this body, are anxious to start their campaigns and are selecting methods by means of which to do so.

But, Mr. President, I regret very much the suggestion of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that Ambassador Lodge should precipitously abandon his job in the United Nations, in order to satisfy the chairman's qualms about his status. I feel that it is necessary for Ambassador Lodge to consider other factors, in addition to any qualms which the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee may have about his status.

We, in this country, owe a debt of gratitude to Ambassador Lodge. He has been untiring in his attempts to tell the truth to the rest of the world. Day in and day out, night in and night out, he has combated, with firmness and dignity, Soviet lies and provocations. He has successfully exposed the Soviets' falsehoods, such as their now-disproved claim that the RB–47 they shot down was over Soviet waters. He has shown great initiative in working for fair treatment of U.S. airmen held by the Russians.

I should like to take this occasion to congratulate Ambassador Lodge and the rest of the American delegation to the United Nations for their continuing efforts to build the United Nations into a more active instrument of world diplomacy and a more effective agency for genuine world peace.

Mr. President, I believe that Ambassador Lodge, in his outstanding conduct of his office, has done a great deal to sell the United Nations in this country. Major credit for the success of the United Nations during the last few years should certainly go to Ambassador Lodge.

Mr. President, all of us know of the criticisms which were heaped upon the United Nations during its infancy, and which continue to this time. We concede and know that the United Nations is not a perfect instrument. But it is the only instrument we have for the discussion of world problems; and Ambassador Lodge has rendered great contributions in acquainting the people of the United States with the true functions of the United Nations and its efforts to assist in securing and maintaining a just peace.

Much of the credit for the success of the United Nations goes also to the able and determined leadership of its Secretary General, Mr. Hammarskjold. He has won for the United Nations a respect which never was granted to its ill-fated predecessor. His visit to the Province of Katanga will now, I hope, open the way for a reasonable settlement of the problems which have been plaguing the Congo since its birth as an independent state on June 30.

For some time, the leaders of Katanga Province have been contesting United Nations efforts to enter their Province. But the effort of this one Province to thwart the United Nations has now collapsed before the patience and the determination of Mr. Hammarskjold. Prime Minister Tshombe, of the Province of Katanga, has seen to it that the United Nations Secretary General was yesterday received in an orderly manner and with the highest courtesy. Secretary General Hammarskjold was accompanied by an escort, under his personal and exclusive command, of two companies of Swedish soldiers in the United Nations service.

Mr. President, the trip of the Secretary General of the United Nations to the province of Katanga offers convincing new proof, if it is needed, of the increasing importance of the United Nations in world affairs. Unlike the old League of Nations, the United Nations is really alive.

United Nations debates have a considerable influence on world opinion. In the rest of the world, as well as in the United States, the outcome of Security Council and General Assembly debates is listened to with serious attention. Although the Soviet veto is all too often responsible for deadlock and inactivity, I know that other nations, if the veto were not so used, would happily entrust the United Nations with a more active, more constructive part in world events. Perhaps eventually these hopes can be realized.

But, Mr. President, despite Soviet obstruction, the United Nations has managed to take decisive action on a number of critical problems. United Nations soldiers all over the globe have managed to keep peace where other forces would only make war.

United Nations forces are on the alert in Korea, in Kashmir, in the Middle East, and now in Africa. They are facing problems which range from boundary conflicts to refugee settlements, from major East-West confrontations to the internal confusions of the Congo. Thus far, the United Nations forces have been successful in performing their duty of preventing the outbreak of war between hostile neighbors.

It seems to me that this excellent record emphasizes the need to establish a permanent United Nations police force. This is demonstrated by their attitude toward the problems of the Congo which grow infinitely more complex as every day this crisis assumes new proportions. But I continue to be confident that here, as elsewhere, the efforts of the United Nations will not fail.

Mr. President, in concluding, again I express the view that a very large part of the credit for the success of the United Nations goes to the great statesman and former colleague of ours in the Senate, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I was not in the Chamber when the statement referred to just now by the distinguished Senator from New York was made by the Senator from Arkansas. But from what I can ascertain from reading the news ticker, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee did not call for the immediate resignation of the distinguished U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, the Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge—who during his 7½ years has done a magnificent job in representing our country before the United Nations—but suggested that, at an appropriate time in the near future, it might be better if he would undertake the great responsibility which the Republican Party has accorded him by naming him its vice presidential candidate.

It is my further understanding that that, all along, this has been the intention of the administration, namely, that in a reasonable time it is anticipated that Ambassador Lodge will resign and, if the press reports are accurate, that a man of the caliber of James Wadsworth, a man with great experience in the U.N., will be ready to step in and take his place. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I must assume from the press reports about this matter that that may be the situation which will develop some time in the future, and before the active campaigning really gets under way on the part of the four major candidates.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the contributions of the distinguished Senator from Montana. I am sure that what he has stated is in complete accord with the intentions of both the administration and Ambassador Lodge. I feel certain that Ambassador Lodge is desirous of effecting the termination of his duties in the United Nations at the earliest practicable moment. I sense in the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Montana the fact that he shares my feeling of apprehension over a too sudden termination of those activities.

I feel certain that so long as Ambassador Lodge continues in his present post, in order to meet the immediate crises which are faced by the nations of the world, he will do nothing of a political character or will do nothing which could properly be considered partisan in nature.

I sense that the distinguished Senator from Montana recognizes the necessity for an interim period of takeover by his successor, the identity of whom I have no way of knowing. If so, the Senator from Montana and I are in complete accord.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Without having spoken to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, I assume that is his intention also, because it would be a mistake to make a sharp break right now, without making a little allowance; and I assume discussions are going on to that effect at the present time.

Mr. KEATING. I am sure discussions are going on. I venture the guess that by the time this Congress has adjourned and the other three candidates are entirely free to engage in political activities, such as we all know would never be engaged in on the floor of the Senate, Ambassador Lodge will also be completely free of his official responsibilities. I anticipate that he might well be free before the Members of this body, and, indeed, the Vice President are able to leave Washington to campaign intensively.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I appreciate the Senator's implication, at least, to the effect that none of the three major candidates in the Senate is at the present time engaged in anything which could in the remotest sense be alined with political campaigns. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the remarks, made with a smile, and may I add an engaging smile, by my distinguished friend from Montana. I can assure him that when any of us feels that political motivations are behind any of the actions of any of the candidates who are in this body, it is more than likely that that will be called to the attention of the President of the Senate.

JUDGESHIP LEGISLATION SHOULD BE IN EVERYONE'S MUST LIST

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, for almost a year there has been pending on the Senate Calendar a bill to create 25 additional Federal judgeships. This is Senate bill 2673, which is Calendar Order No. 1045.

A similar bill is also on the Union Calendar in the other body, and has been granted a rule by the House Rules Committee. This bill provides for the creation of 35 new judgeships.

These measures are ready for action and have been for some time. They have been studied and restudied for years. No one at all familiar with the problem doubts the necessity for an expansion of our judge power. The proposals in each bill are extremely moderate and do not begin to satisfy the recommendations made by the Judicial Conference for 54 new judgeships.

Judgeship legislation was on the President's list for action needed prior to adjournment. He has repeatedly, time after time, called for action on the part of this body.

Let no one charge that this is a belated interest of the President. He has been pleading for congressional action on omnibus judgeship legislation for years, and the Attorney General has appeared in the President's behalf before congressional committees half a dozen times to press for action on this legislation.

Let no one charge that the President is playing politics with this issue. The administration has done everything possible to remove political considerations entirely from this subject. It has pledged to fill all the judgeships on a bipartisan basis. It has agreed to consult with the congressional leadership before making any nominations, and it has agreed to withhold all nominations until next January. This last condition could be written into the law if necessary to effectuate it.

In other words, the administration has gone further than in any case in my knowledge, during the 14 years I have served in Congress, in expressing a willingness to handle this matter on a completely bipartisan basis.

Let no one charge that the creation of these new judgeships is a mere matter of patronage. That word was used—used, indeed, by our distinguished majority leader. Such a suggestion shows a callous disregard for the people's interest in the prompt administration of justice. The conditions in many of our Federal courts are intolerable, with delays of several years in the trial of cases not uncommon.

I do not think the tens of thousands of automobile accident victims, for instance, many of whom are widows and orphans who must wait several years in some cases for redress, view this matter as a matter of patronage. I do not think the small businessman who may have a contractual representation with some larger corporation that does business in many States looks upon this as merely a patronage matter.

I feel sure those in modest circumstances—who make up the great bulk of the litigants in the State of New York, which is one of the places where the greatest delay takes place—do not look upon this as a matter of patronage.

I am particularly concerned about the constantly worsening congestion of the courts of New York City—a matter with which many in this Chamber are familiar.

Of the 54 new judgeships recommended by the Judicial Conference, a total of 11, more than one-fifth, were for the U.S. Court of Appeals and for the U.S. District Courts in the southern and eastern districts of New York. The Senate bill reduces this number to four. The House bill reduces it to five.

I have discussed this situation with many judges, court officials, and others who are interested in this subject—particularly in New York but also in Chicago and in other areas throughout the country. Not a one believes that the number of judges provided in either of the pending bills is adequate. All are shocked by the prospect that even this minimal number is in danger of postponement for still another session.

I share their sentiments, Mr. President, I am deeply dismayed by the dark cloud which the distinguished majority leader has placed over this proposed legislation by referring to it or by dismissing it rather summarily—not finally, but it seemed to me rather summarily—by the statement that it involved patronage. I hope the distinguished majority leader will reconsider what he has said on this legislation. I am confident that upon reflection he will recognize that a delay in the administration of justice very much affects the people's business and that years of waiting for the disposition of claims is a very human problem.

I hope, Mr. President, that this subject will be added not only to the present must agenda for this session of the Congress, but also to the must agenda or the "shopping list" or whatever it is called which has been presented to us by the distinguished majority leader.

I hope very much that in some manner we may be able to come to grips with the relating to the authorization of additional judgeships, before this session is over.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a recent statement by the Attorney General dealing with this important problem.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY ATTORNEY GENERAL WILLIAM P. ROGERS

It is most regrettable that the majority leader of the Senate yesterday in stating that no action would be taken this session on the President's request for additional judgeships termed the request in part, a matter of patronage. It is in no sense a matter of patronage. There is an urgent national need to create new judgeships in the Federal court system to cope with the litigation arising from our expanding population.

Additional judgeships have been requested by the judicial branch of the Government acting through the Judicial Conference of the United States each year since 1954. These carefully documented requests have been prompted by the heavy backlogs of cases in the Federal courts which have continued to grow despite the earnest efforts by the judiciary to keep calendars current. For 5 years Congress has turned its back upon this pressing need for new judgeships.

The unanimous support of the American Bar Association and the bar associations of the various States and localities concerned attests to this critical and nonpolitical need. Congress has held numerous hearings on bills to create additional judgeships. Bills have been unanimously approved by the Judiciary Committees of both the Senate and the House. There is before the Congress today, therefore more than sufficient information to justify the creation of the judicial posts recommended by the President or at least such additional posts as Congress deems necessary.

In order to forestall the charge of political patronage the President made it clear to the majority leadership in the Congress a year ago that any additional judgeships would be filled on a bipartisan basis divided equally between the two major political parties and that no nominations of Democrats would be made unless approved by the majority leadership.

When Senator JOHNSON said that this bill provides special consideration for special people he suggested that the purpose of this bill is merely to provide additional jobs. He wholly disregards the fact that its purpose is to serve the needs of thousands of Americans who are denied justice because of delay. It is hoped that the Senator will not arbitrarily disregard this public need but will reconsider his decision so that the Congress can do its part now to help during the administration of justice in the United States up to date.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, an editorial entitled "More Federal Judges," published in today's New York Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE FEDERAL JUDGES

An adjournment of Congress before passage of a measure to increase the number of judges on the Federal bench would be an inexcusable dereliction of duty. The record of congressional inaction to date on this desperately needed legislation would be unbelievable, except that it happens to be true.

In the face of the staggering increase in the number of cases flooding into the Federal courts Congress has failed for 6 years to make any increase at all in the number of judges to deal with them. During this period the Judicial Conference of the United States, highest official nonpartisan authority on Federal court administration, has been calling for new judgeships—in increasing numbers as the years have gone by—to meet the mounting crisis. The last conference appeal called for 54 new places on the Federal bench. It is said that with the present judicial strength nearly half of the civil cases will have to wait from 1 to 4 years to come to trial.

Since the present Congress began work several bills for new judgeships have been introduced, but not one has come to a vote on the floor of either house. Now the one that seems most worthwhile to support is the bill of Representative CELLER (H.R. 12552) for 35 new judgeships, 19 fewer than the Judicial Conference thinks are necessary. Last January the House Committee on the Judiciary approved the Celler bill and the Rules Committee has cleared it for action on the floor, but without any further results. A Senate bill for 25 new places was reported out toward the end of the last session of Congress but did not get any closer to passage than that.

Now Senator JOHNSON, Democratic vice-presidential candidate and Senate majority leader, has apparently decided to oppose any action on the judgeships at all in the present session on the ground that there isn't enough time before the end of the year to create and fill the new positions. This is certainly not convincing to the public.

TRIBUTE TO HUGH HAMMOND BENNETT

Mr. HART. Mr. President, a very eloquent tribute to a distinguished American was expressed in a letter written to me by several leading Michigan conservationists. I believe the contributions of Dr. H. H. Bennett to America and to its citizens, as cited by the Benzie Soil Conservation District representatives and as described in moving detail in the Tuesday Letter of the National Association of Soil Conservation Districts, should be acknowledged and publicized as widely as possible. For this reason, I ask unanimous consent that the letters may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BENZIE SOIL CONSERVATION DISTRICT,
Beulah, Mich., July 26, 1960.

Hon. PHILIP HART,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HART: We would like to call your attention to the enclosed Tuesday Letter, published by the National Association of Soil Conservation Districts for July 12, 1960.

We feel that this Tuesday Letter in a small way expresses the feelings of all people interested in and working with soil and water conservation activities, toward the man who worked so diligently for conservation of our soil and water resources—Dr. H. H. Bennett.

Sincerely yours,
VERNE HOPKINS, Chairman.
URI BRUNING, Secretary-Treasurer.

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SOIL CONSERVATION DISTRICTS,
Holdrege, Nebr., July 12, 1960.

The prodigious career of Hugh Hammond Bennett is over.

On July 7, at the age of 79, the renowned soil conservationist and first Chief of the Soil Conservation Service succumbed to anemia in Burlington, N.C.

Burial took place with full military honors in Arlington National Cemetery, Tuesday afternoon, July 12.

In his lifetime, Bennett wore the mantle of greatness. He combined knowledge and vision with remarkable feats of persuasion. He was responsible, as nearly as one man can be, for changing the attitude of the Nation from indifference to active concern for its soil. He added "topsoil" to the layman's vocabulary. He called it a priceless, irreplaceable heritage and made it stick.

Bennett was responsible, as nearly as one man can be, for launching the modern soil conservation program which is changing the landscape of the Nation. He built and inspired a farflung organization of conservation technician-salesmen. He transformed principles of wise land use from excessive scientific detail to understandable workaday practice. Farmers respected him, believed in him, and loved him.

THE COURSE OF THE NATION

"The Chief," as he was known to thousands of his friends, altered in a fundamental way the course of the Nation with respect to land and water resources. He made soil erosion a national enemy and soil conservation a national goal. He produced the formula for reaching the goal, tested it, and lived to see it applied on ever-widening areas of American farm and ranch lands.

"To hope that anything less than a scientifically planned and properly executed conservation program for each field, each farm, and each watershed will give the needed permanent protection to the land is to hope for the impossible," he said. "What is more important, any acceptance of the idea that there can be a shorter and easier way of doing the job is dangerous; it will only delay getting this most necessary agricultural work done."

Even before his death, he was ranked with Gifford Pinchot as one of the country's immortal conservationists.

HISTORIC SURVEYS IN VIRGINIA

Hugh Bennett was born on a hill farm in Anson County, N.C., April 15, 1881. He began his professional career in 1903, shortly after graduating from the University of North Carolina, when he went to work as a soil surveyor for USDA's old Bureau of Soils.

By 1909, he had become inspector of the southern and eastern division of the Bureau's soil survey. Given the job of surveying the soils of Louisa County, Va., with specific instructions to investigate declining crop yields in that area, he made the first true soil erosion survey in history. This was the time, he relates, that he came to the conclusion sheet erosion was the most dangerous of all types of land destruction because it was so extensive and because farmers rarely saw it take place.

From coast to coast, Bennett saw the pattern of damage repeated—primarily as sheet erosion, gullying, and in some places as wind erosion. He gradually built up a background of facts and launched a one-man campaign to inform the public. For nearly 20 years he plugged away without attracting much attention.

FINALLY A TURNING POINT

The turning point, probably, came in 1928 with his Government pamphlet "Soil Erosion: A National Menace." It caught the eyes of a few farm editors and Members of Congress. He was called before a congressional committee. Thereafter things moved more rapidly. He was put in charge of Government soil and water conservation research work. In 1933 he was named Chief of the newly created Soil Erosion Service in the Department of the Interior. Two years later he was appointed Chief of the Soil Conservation Service when it was set up by Congress in the Department of Agriculture.

Bennett was a tenacious administrator governed by complete dedication to his special purpose. A respected scientist and inspired salesman, he built the SCS from the ground up to work with farmers and ranchers on their land.

A CHAMPION OF DISTRICTS

As the years went by, Bennett became a forceful champion of districts. When it became apparent that the erosion control demonstration projects established in the midthirties were inadequate, he shifted the full force of his leadership behind the organization of districts and development of close district-SCS working relationships.

"Districts make possible locally adapted soil conservation programs and plans, with local leadership and management of these activities," he wrote in 1948. "Not only this, but working more cooperatively, as farmers do in districts, much more mutually beneficial accomplishment is being achieved. * * * Since the districts carry forward their own programs of soil conservation and land improvement and are giving form to the expressed wishes of the farmers themselves in this field of mutual welfare, it would serve the American way of life as well as the cause of soil conservation to strengthen the districts in every appropriate way."

Many districts, many organizations, and many governments have honored the Chief. Not long ago the supervisors of the Central Crowley Ridge Soil Conservation District at Jonesboro, Ark., dedicated their 1959 annual report to him. In the first and last lines of that dedication they summed up the regard and feeling of countless other tributes:

"Dr. Bennett occupies a place almost unique in history," they said. "Untold millions, yet unborn, will owe him an eternal debt of gratitude."

WILLIAM E. RICHARDS,
President.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, with reference to the bill pending before the Senate, the amendment of the Fair Labor Standards Act dealing with wages and hours, the Senator from Mississippi submitted an amendment designated as "8–12–60—C."

I wish to modify my amendment, to which I have referred, by striking out the word "or" in line 11, page 2, and by adding thereto the followings words: "Unless such establishment would have been exempt under the provisions of this paragraph as in effect prior to the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960; or."

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to which I have referred, together with the modification, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the amendment, as modified, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 20, strike out lines 9 to 15, inclusive, and insert the following:

"(10) any employee employed by an establishment which is engaged within the area of production (which shall include, for the purposes of this paragraph and clause (3) of section 7(b), all of each county in which an agricultural or horticultural commodity, including livestock and poultry, is produced in commercial quantities) in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state or canning of such commodity for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products, except that the exemption provided in this paragraph (10) shall not apply to any establishment within such a county which has a gross annual volume of sales in excess of $1,000,000 unless such establishment would have been exempt under the provisions of this paragraph as in effect prior to the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1960; or".

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, briefly stated, the substance of the amendment relates to labor employed in harvesting agricultural crops and horticultural products.

Incidentally, I am speaking now in order to explain the amendment and to have it a matter of record for reference by anyone who may wish to refer to it. I shall further discuss the amendment later in the debate.

I point out in the beginning that the Congress, in passing the original Fair Labor Standards Act, recognized from the very beginning the need for exemptions to apply with reference to labor which was engaged in what is called, in farm language, the first processing of agricultural and horticultural products. The law has never been changed by the Congress. This amendment pertains solely to the question of further and more exact definition of the phrase used in the original law, "area of production."

Mr. President, with reference to the basic reasons for the exemption in the first place, with emphasis on the fact that those reasons apply now with even more force, I point out that it is the farmer, the man who grows the product in the ground, who first has to take his chances as to the rains, the storms and the droughts of various kinds which can occur from the time of planting until harvesting is completed, which can greatly injure, partially destroy, or perhaps totally destroy the crop itself.

With respect to the problem of harvesting those crops, in the first place this is a highly seasonal proposition. Most of these crops ripen at the same time. Cotton becomes ready to pick almost within a few days. The peakload of the work requires a great deal of overtime, when it is based merely on a day-to-day basis. There must be a concentration of effort by a great many workmen and employees working many days as long as daylight will permit, because of weather interruptions, at any time of day for any number of days. In addition to the problem of overtime the hours are irregular.

Even after a crop is planted, has been cultivated, and has matured, while it is being harvested weather conditions can suddenly develop which may partly destroy or totally destroy the fruits of the labor.

In modern times, when labor is not found out on the farms, the farmer has the additional requirement of paying money out of his pocket to transport laborers from the places where they live to his farm and back, not only once a week, but every day, under present conditions.

All the items which I have enumerated briefly require cash outlays, money out of pocket, on the part of the producer of these products. These are some of the basic reasons why we should not apply a wage and hour law with any kind of uniformity to such conditions.

Not only is it necessary to gather agricultural products, but there is always something to be done in processing them. In respect to cotton there is the question of ginning the cotton. The cotton must be taken to the gin. The cotton must be ginned. It must be wrapped with bagging and ties, and it must be stored, after first having been compacted.

With respect to vegetables that are used for canning, a process of preparation for canning by cleaning, sorting, classifying and placing into the containers is involved. All the steps in the canning process are involved.

These are merely basic illustrations that could be multiplied over and over, in which cash comes from the pocket of a farmer who has taken so many chances already to grow a crop. The added conditions under which he has to do his work are added reasons why a wage and hour law should not apply to him.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. This has been a troublesome problem in the fruit and vegetable industry in my State since the enactment of the act. I believe I told the Senator the other day that I appeared as an attorney in the first suit questioning what we regarded then as a very unfair regulation with respect to what constituted an area of production. We hear less about that problem at this time and more about the general situation of the farmer.

I am glad the Senator is presenting this problem. I hope that the distinguished sponsors of the bill which is proposed to change the law will accept his amendment.

I strongly support the Senator from Mississippi in his feeling and in his amendment. I call attention to the fact that the committee which reported the bill, instead of trying to make more livable the conditions of farmers and horticulturists, has inserted a provision in the bill which hits at those who are in the very business of canning and processing, to which the Senator has already referred. That is the provision which would cut the present exemption of 28 weeks for seasonal business—and that is seasonal business—to 20 weeks, with a further limitation that makes 10 of those weeks unlimited in connection with the time element, and provides a definite limitation of time with respect to the other 10 weeks.

Committees which are handling matters which primarily relate to industries have very little understanding of the problems of agricultural producers, to which the Senator has referred. They operate a seasonal industry. They generally deal with highly perishable commodities which must be handled when they mature or else they are lost, and it seems to me that the Congress should look sympathetically upon that problem and should endeavor to make the problem easier of solution, instead of clamping down with stiffer restrictions, as the committee does with reference to this bill.

I appreciate the Senator's attitude of friendliness, sympathy, and consideration for those who garden, those who farm, and those who produce the products which are affected by this bill. I hope he will succeed.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator very much for his comments as well as his encouragement. We all owe the Senator from Florida a special debt in that as attorney for a number of growers during the first years of the act, at least, he did some very fine work as attorney in bringing suits to get interpretations of the law related to this very problem. As I recall, it was approximately 20 years ago that these suits originated, which merely shows that the problem has not really been concretely and succinctly settled by the Congress by a real definition of "area of production."

Furthermore, we have not yet placed the problem into the hands of those who really know the subject matter and specialize in it, so that they can try to solve it.

I wish at this time, if I may, to quote the pertinent paragraph in the present law that will bring into focus the very point we are discussing. The pertinent provision of the present law is found on page 61 of the report on the bill under consideration, and it reads as follows:

(10) Any individual employed within the area of production (as defined by the Secretary), engaged in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products.

Those words quoted from present law are followed identically in the amendment. The words "handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing," and other similar words, are used to make clear and plain that this amendment does not attempt to upset or leave out practices or to insert new practices. This amendment pertains to the words "area of production" as defined by the Secretary.

Most unfortunately, when the original law was written, while it fully recognized the need and the problem with reference to the processing of agriculture and horticultural products, the Congress did not write out a legislative definition of what would be a legal "area of production." Some kind of provision had to be made to cover that very point. So the Congress wrote in the words "as defined by the Secretary," and that word "Secretary" refers to the Secretary of Labor. So for the lack of a better, more apt and more concrete plan to write into the law, even though the basic problem was recognized, the definition was merely written in to be defined by the Secretary—not by the Secretary of Agriculture, but by the Secretary of Labor.

Imputing nothing except good motives to Secretaries who have served all these years, naturally the Department is partisan and is at least semiaggressive with reference to the administration of affairs entrusted to it. So all the emphasis has been on making the law apply to a wider field, thereby cutting down on the definition of "area of production," remembering all the time that it applies to the first processing of agricultural and horticultural products. Included in these very words is the making of cheese, butter, or other dairy products.

Congress still recognizes the need for this exemption, and this bill which has been before the Congress and the committee for a long while, every line of which has had full consideration, still recognizes the need for this exemption, but it has not done anything, or it has not done enough to recommend a real congressional definition of "area of production."

If we enact the bill into law, we will have adopted by clear implication the definition of "area of production" now in effect, and which has been in effect for some time, as promulgated by the Department of Labor. The definition has been brought down to a very fine point, and has greatly limited the application of what was clearly the original intent of Congress, to exempt the processing part with reference to certain products.

A present interpretation now given to the words "area of production" states that if a cotton gin receives more than 5 percent of its cotton from a distance of more than 10 miles from the gin, or if a grain elevator receives more than 5 percent, or if a fruit and vegetable producer receives his fruits and vegetables from a distance of more than 15 miles, the rule is that such establishments are not in the area of production.

Anyone who knows anything about the present transportation of cotton to cotton gins knows that 10 miles is a very limited area, and a very short haul.

The gin must receive 95 percent of the cotton it gins within the small radius of 10 miles; otherwise the wage and hour law applies, and it will be said by the Department of Labor that that gin is not in the area of production.

That is contrary to the hard physical facts of life and all the practices of the industry. Even if the gin meets that requirement, and receives 95 percent of the cotton it gins within the small radius of 10 miles, still, if the gin is within 1 mile of a town or village with as many as 2,500 inhabitants, it still will be classed as being outside the area of production, and therefore will come under the wage and hour law.

In most areas of the Cotton Belt, 25 or 30 years ago, before we had rural electrification, and when electricity was available in small towns, many of the gins moved to town in order to get electricity, because it became the practical and cheapest way to supply the power, replacing steam.

Such gins have continued all this time to serve the rural areas. However, merely because they are located in town, having come to that place to get electricity, they are now classified as not within the area of production. To be perfectly frank about it, that is ridiculous with reference to the hard facts of life.

The amendment would change the definition of "area of production." I will come to exactly how it would be changed in a few minutes, and will give some illustrations under the new definition. I would like to give another illustration of the present definition of "area of production" under the Department of Labor's interpretation.

A creamery in a rural county in Mississippi, having a large commercial dairy herd, is considered as being in the area where the product is being produced if it is outside 1 mile of a village having a population of 2,500 or outside 3 miles of a city of 50,000.

However, if a dairy is located in that village, or within 1 mile of its corporate lines, it is said not to be in the area of production where the milk is produced. If the creamery is not within the area of production, I do not know how we can say that any creamery is. The milk could be processed nowhere else. Nowhere else in that area could it get the services and the market that a creamery would afford.

These are two illustrations of a rural area in a rural State where, merely because the processing plant is operated within a small town of 2,500, or within a mile of it, by the definition of a Department of Government, not by Congress, it is taken out of the category of being within the area of production.

I wish to proceed a little further with the illustration I gave about cotton. In the old days—and I well remember them myself—the cost of ginning and the packing that goes into a bale of cotton was not very high. Those who actually worked in the field and grew the cotton under contract, or even under an unwritten agreement, would get the benefit of whatever cottonseed was left after the ginning was paid for. It would usually take about a third of the seed to pay for the cost of the ginning. So the workmen, frequently colored people, would get the benefit of the rest of the seed. At the present time, the cost of the ginning has gone up so much under the wage and hour laws—and I checked these figures the other day in my home State—that with the current price of cotton seed, and under prevailing figures, when all the costs of ginning are paid, the packing is paid for, and the cotton is wrapped up, so to speak, only about $1 is left from the proceeds of the seeds.

That is what caused a colored friend of mine to say to me, in discussing this matter not long ago, "Mr. STENNIS, it got to where cotton don't have any seed."

Of course it has as many seeds as before, but he does not get any proceeds from those seeds. He is the man who has worked in tilling the ground and has taken the chances, paid for the fertilizer, and carried all the load. He lives in the rural area, and the gin is there. Merely because it is located in a small town, in order to get electricity, the result is that he is virtually left out of the picture.

Congress should act to correct this inequity. We ought to write a practical definition.

At this point, I think the RECORD ought to be kept straight, in order to be certain that this language does not go far afield. I have before me a list—and I shall refer to it in the debate—first, of processors in the area of production under the revised amendment. I am speaking with reference to cotton gins; the distance involved with reference to receipts for cotton gins, which is 10 miles from the gin.

The list deals also with cotton warehouses; and the distance involved is 20 miles.

It deals also with warehouses for corn and other grain, and the distance involved is 50 miles.

It deals also with cotton compresses, and the distance involved is 20 miles.

It deals also with creameries, and the distance involved is 20 miles.

Another classification is butter plants and cheese plants. The distance involved is 20 miles.

For fruit and vegetable packing plants, the distance involved is 15 miles.

Under a separate category of canneries, the distance involved is 20 miles.

The handling of livestock is included in the terms of the amendment although I do not have the distance involved in that instance.

In the Department of Labor "area of production" regulation, the definitions of "area of production" are based on population and distance. I have just given the various distances involved for receipts, and shall now refer to the population.

Under the division for 2,500 inhabitants, the distance involved is 1 mile from a town.

There is a population category of 50,000, and the distance involved is 3 miles from a city.

There is another category of 500,000 inhabitants, and the distance involved is 5 miles from a city.

With all deference, I do not see any really basic reason why the factor of population should be so highly controlling with reference to what is an area of agricultural production. However, such factors have been adopted, and I place them in the RECORD at this point for the information of anyone who may read the RECORD and wish to make comparisons.

The distance of 10 miles is for cotton gins. Yet under modern conditions, small trucks and large trucks can haul cotton to the gins in many areas of the South, where there are many small farmers. They own the trucks and can haul the produce many miles beyond 10 miles. But for those who do not own trucks themselves, there are those in the community who own trucks and are in the public business of hauling. So I know of my own knowledge that commodities such as cotton are hauled 10, 15, 20, or 25 miles.

A farmer may have five bales of cotton in the field. If the cotton should become wet, he might haul it himself, and think nothing of hauling it 30 or 40 miles to a special ginner who has special equipment to take care of wet cotton or cotton which has been soiled in some way.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true, in the good State which is so well represented, in part, by the Senator from Mississippi, and in other States of the old cotton-producing area of the South, due to the cut in cotton acreage, that the cut in cotton production has been very heavy; and that another factor which has led to cuts in production is the diversification which has been very generally recommended by the Department of Agriculture and the State experiment stations, and otherwise, and has been very generally followed by the farmers? Is it not true that that has expanded very greatly the area which would have an adequate production to supply a gin, compress, or any of the other facilities which the Senator has in mind?

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator is completely correct and has aptly described the situation.

Under present conditions, with improved roads, farm machinery, and trucks, together with gins which specialize in cleaning and taking care of damaged cotton, and that which is mildewed, there is a crosscurrent of traffic affecting the gins which extends clear across a county.

Sometimes the competition among them means the life of the trade, and the farmer gets the benefit of that competition. The competition may be so great that the ginners will send out their agents to solicit their business, before the cotton-picking time begins.

I was amazed, in examining into the problem, to see the narrow gage limitations which have been placed on the phrase "area of production." It cannot be explained in any way except as a conscious drive and a desire greatly to limit the application of the term.

This amendment is not drawn in such a way as to try to include packinghouses and businesses of that kind, which are further removed from the producer. The amendment is an effort to get down on the ground and bring relief to the man who has to take the chances which I outlined in the beginning; the man who has had to take the brunt of putting up cash money during the growing of the crop, while it was still highly uncertain whether any of it would be damaged or not.

He must consider the hazards of weather, because after the crop has grown, frequently storms and rains will come along and destroy it, sometimes in part, sometimes completely, leaving the producer with no income or no return, but with a great debt on his hands.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that the grower or producer has nothing which is salable, has nothing which can go to the market, until his cotton has been ginned and baled and is in such a package as to be subject to handling in the cotton market?

Mr. STENNIS. That is true. He does not have anything in the world. He has no source of income from this outlay. He has nothing except what he may realize on what he has grown.

Mr. HOLLAND. The product he has grown has no market and there is no place to sell it. There is no bidder for it until it has been subjected to the first processing and put into the shape of baled cotton which has been ginned. Is that not correct?

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator is correct. That is as much a part of the necessary steps now as the germination of the seed in the ground. If those things are not done quickly, there will be deterioration, loss of value, and, in many instances, loss of salability.

That is not true of cotton. If it is kept dry; it can be ginned later. It is true of vegetables.

The list of items which I mentioned a few moments ago, concerning which the Department of Labor had issued regulations, started with cotton gins and ended with the handling of livestock. I wanted to make clear that that list is the same as that which is covered in the proposed amendment. No other items are covered. I will repeat the list:

Cotton gins, cotton warehouses, cotton compresses, creameries, butter plants, cheese plants, fruit and vegetable packing plants, canneries, the handling of livestock, tobacco seed, and fruit-drying plants and other first processes.

Also, I may say for emphasis, the amendment follows even though it is repetition, the very wording of the present law with reference to being "engaged in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products."

I wish to make it clear that we are not trying to go outside the province of the limited application to which I have already referred, but that we are correcting the old law as to items, and merely want to write a practical definition of "area of production," one that will apply—I say frankly—partly from the standpoint of the farmer, the one to whom I have referred, who takes all the chances.

Mr. President, I have here a few specially prepared remarks which are partly repetition. But I should like to place them in the RECORD, for purposes of emphasis and illustration.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. As the Senator knows, in our State we limit the producers of cotton, although I completely and strongly approve of every statement the Senator has made with respect to cotton production.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. And I state that the cotton producer is one of our agricultural commodity producers who needs a little sympathy and help, because all of us know that in the last 2 or 3 years he has had to ask Congress for reductions of price supports and other things, so as to enable him to recapture foreign markets which he used to have and to enable him to compete with synthetic-fiber industries, such as those which produce rayon and similar commodities. So I am completely with the Senator.

But in connection with that, I desire to call attention to a problem which in my State is causing a great deal of trouble right now, because of the artificial giving of industrial status to a packinghouse if it happens to be within a certain distance of a village or town.

It happens that our State has been growing very rapidly. In the county in which I have lived all my life, the population has increased, since the enactment of this law, from somewhere around 30,000 to, today, 192,000. Our county is the largest citrus-producing county in Florida.

In the very nature of things, the packinghouses and processing plants which are covered by this law or amendment have encountered a great change. Many of them have grown within the towns, or let us say that the towns very close to them have grown around them. That has not only produced a hardship on those who continued to remain where they had been and continued to produce what they had been producing, but it has also brought about unfair competition and hardships as between plants which have grown into the class where now they are classified as an industry, rather than as an agricultural processing plant, and now they come under the provisions of the Wage and Hours Act. It seems to me that is a very artificial classification, and I very fully approve of what the Senator is trying to do.

I see on the floor the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], who is the senior member on the minority side of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He comes from the State of Vermont, where the creamery industry, or milk-production industry is of tremendous importance. I am sure he has found similar hardships to exist there, because of the artificial classification established, not by the Secretary of Agriculture, but by the Secretary of Labor, who knows very little about the matter—and, of course, upon the recommendation of the Administrator of the Wage and Hours Act, who is always, according to our observations, reaching out for more and more jurisdiction.

I hope the Senator from Vermont will have some comment to make on this matter, because I know, from private conversations with him, that he has encountered troubles in this field.

Let me say that I appreciate this opportunity to be heard briefly.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator from Florida for his contribution.

I have stressed cotton because I am more familiar with it and with its problems. But I am also interested in other commodities and their problems, whatever they may be, in the various States.

I know the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] is interested in this matter, because we have discussed it on the floor. So I am very glad to yield now to him.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, on the invitation of the Senator from Florida, I shall say that in the part of the country which I represent we do not now do the packing of agricultural commodities that we used to do. Today we are largely in the fluid-milk business.

Neither have we been blessed, or afflicted, with the tremendous increase in population that some of the other States have been.

But inasmuch as it has been mentioned, I should like to say that I have been greatly impressed with the change which has taken place in the cotton industry since the enactment of the legislation 2 years ago.

Last year, as the Senator may recall—I refer to the last marketing year, ending August 1, 1959—we exported only about 2,700,000 bales of cotton. This year—the year ending August 1, 1960—we have exported 6,982,000 bales of cotton, or almost 300 percent more than we did last year. In fact, we have done so well that the Commodity Credit Corporation's holdings of cotton have dropped almost 2 million bales, this year. I understand the Commodity Credit Corporation is now practically out of low-grade cotton, and that all the cotton that it has left on hand is of high quality, and that unless there is an abnormal change in the weather, so that the production greatly exceeds what it is expected to be at the present time, our production of cotton this year will not be any more than the consumption, and probably will be quite a little less. The exports are holding up beautifully. The first week in August, almost 200,000 bales were exported, in contrast to only a few thousand bales in the first week of August, last year. We have recovered our world markets. The mills in Western Europe have converted back to cotton, from synthetic fibers; and I think that today the cotton industry faces an exceptionally good future. In fact, the future now looks so good that is appears that there might be a substantial increase in the allocations of acreage, next year, or else some other method by which they may greatly expand the production of cotton in the South.

I am interested in that, although, as I have told the Senate more than once, I raised only one cotton plant in my life, and the bolls did not open. So I never crowded the market very much with my crop. [Laughter.]

But it is a tremendously interesting business, and I think they are on the right track.

The same holds true for corn and rice, which were included in the legislation of 2 years ago. It is simply amazing what an increase has occurred in the use of corn in the last few years. This year we shall use almost 1 billion bushels of corn more than we did only 5 years ago. This year we shall consume about 4 billion bushels of corn. Yet we still hear people talk about "Let us go back to the 3,200 million bushels produced a year." But that would leave us 800,000 bushels short of what we need.

Mr. President, I rose, not to make an agricultural speech, but because there was a good opportunity to express my pleasure at the greatly improved position of the cotton producer.

I believe that if we can run this program through another year, we shall see the corn producer in an equally favorable position. Those who raise corn to sell for the market—some 20 percent of the crop is held in the open market—have taken their reduction in price. But the other 80 percent of the production, which is fed to hogs and other livestock—including chickens, and so forth—enjoyed improved conditions, generally.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is not the point which the able and learned Senator from Vermont is making is that in these three agricultural industries, for which the Senate took action a few years ago, pursuant to the requests of the industries themselves, which were in trouble——

Mr. AIKEN. That is right.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not true that the committee was sympathetic to these industries; and is it not also true that the recommendations which were made were sympathetic ones, and that the Congress acted pursuant to the suggestions of those industries themselves, and that much good has resulted?

The recommendations were sympathetic. The Senate and the Congress acted pursuant to the decisions of the industry itself, and much better conditions are resulting. The point I am trying to make is that the cotton and other industries have had sympathetic attention from the appropriate committees, from the Congress, and from the President, because he had to sign the bills, and from the Department of Agriculture. They are bringing us back to sounder conditions. The pity is we cannot get the same kind of sympathetic hearing or consideration from the Congress on other questions such as this, which is handled by a Department which undoubtedly means well, but has little understanding of the problems of the producer.

I think that is the real lesson the Senator from Vermont makes out of the recital.

Mr. AIKEN. I have not studied the particular legislation which the Senator from Mississippi is discussing. I wanted to express my pleasure at the improvement which has taken place in certain commodities which we produce in large quantities in this country. Certainly, we do not want to do anything that will put them on the road back down the hill.

I assure the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Mississippi that I will study the legislation which is proposed before the time comes to vote on it, which I assume will not be before Tuesday.

Mr. STENNIS. It will not be today, either.

Mr. HOLLAND. If there is a nationally minded Senator in the Senate, who gives close attention to the agriculture industry of the Nation, regardless of whether it touches his own State or area, it is the Senator from Vermont, to whom I am very grateful. I am glad he is here in the Senate. I am glad to have his observations on this matter, and I say to him, where he can hear it said, that I think the control of these vital agricultural questions mentioned so ably by the Senator from Mississippi that have taken place under the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Act, and with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, have frequently been unsympathetic, have frequently been devoid of understanding, and have meant added expense, added trouble, and added difficulties for producers who, in many instances have been in trouble, which certainly has been the case with the cotton producers.

Our people in the citrus industry have had a relatively good situation, and I make no plea for them, but some of the regulations in the very set of regulations mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi, which affect the processing of fruit, are just as artificial, unfair, and overcostly as they can be.

Mr. AIKEN. I assure the Senator from Florida that I will give fair consideration to the proposal which is being discussed. I do want to hear the opposition to the proposal, if there is any—I presume there is—and I will try to be fair when the time comes to vote on it.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for his interest, and for his interest in all agricultural problems. The amendment in its present form has been stripped down and reduced in its application from what was originally proposed, and is limited strictly to an attempt to give legislative definition to area production, and puts it more or less on a county basis, excepting very large plants.

Mr. AIKEN. I certainly hope the Senator from Mississippi and the opposition, if any, may be able to sit down and get together and work out merely what is fair to everybody concerned.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

To bring clearly, by way, partly by summary and partly by illustration, the meaning of this highly important and at times technical proposal here, I will proceed with my prepared remarks.

This amendment as redrafted covers only those first processors of agricultural commodities itemized in present law, and is designed to carry out the original intent of the original exemption provided in the act. My amendment defines "area of production" to include all of the county in which an agricultural commodity is produced in commercial quantities, except that it would not include establishments with a gross annual volume of sales in excess of $1 million within the county.

When the Fair Labor Standards Act was first passed, Congress included exemptions for agriculture so that this law would not directly affect farmers nor add to the cost of selling their products. It is a known fact that minimum wage legislation has a very substantial, indirect effect on farmers in that they have to pay increased prices because of the increased wages in things which they buy; but insofar as their own farming operations are concerned, and the first processing and handling of their commodities, the cost of which they pay directly, they are protected by specific legislative exemptions from the wage and hour law. There were various reasons for this. Farm products are usually seasonal in nature. They generally require overtime work on an irregular basis. Congress recognized that farmers pay the bills for handling and processing operations and that they could not pass these costs on to the consumer in the form of increased prices. It was for this reason that the Congress included first processors of agricultural commodities in the exemption. Farmers were to be protected against this additional cost.

Congress left the interpretation of "area of production" to the Department of Labor. Their current definition is so narrow that it has virtually nullified the basic intent of the law.

The Department of Labor's early efforts to define "area of production" were invalidated by the courts. However, the most recent interpretation was validated by the Supreme Court in Mitchell v. Budd (76 S. Ct. 527).

Under this interpretation if a plant receives more than 5 percent of specified products such as milk or cotton from a distance of more than 20 miles from the plant, or if a grain elevator receives more than 5 percent of its grain from farms more than 50 miles from the elevator, or if a fruit or vegetable processor receives more than 5 percent of its fruit and vegetables from a distance of more than 15 miles from the plant, the ruling is that such establishments are not in the "area of production." Even where a plant receives 95 percent or more of the products it handles from within such limited radius, it is not considered to be in the "area of production" if it happens to be located within 1 mile of a village or town having a population of 2,500 or more, or within 3 miles of a city having a population of 50,000 or more, or within 5 miles of a city having a population of 500,000 or more.

Thus, under the current interpretation, a fruit packing shed in the center of the Sacramento Valley, a cotton gin in the Mississippi Delta, or a creamery in the center of the Wisconsin dairy area, is likely to be eliminated from the exemption by the application of the arbitrary criteria adopted by the Department of Labor in defining the term "area of production."

I remember being in south Mississippi 2 years ago, in a small area, and I was surprised to learn that the milk which was picked up there that morning was delivered by refrigerator trucks at Dallas, Tex., that afternoon, and was on the counters in the grocery stores there within a few hours after its arrival.

Mr. President, the purpose of the exemption has been defeated by this interpretation. The population of a city or town has no reasonable relationship to whether or not the plant is located within an area of production. The narrow radius within which a plant must obtain its supplies under this interpretation is unrealistic in terms of modern transportation.

My amendment would place in the statute a definition of "area of production" of an agricultural commodity. Exemptions are provided by present law for the first processing and handling of agricultural commodities in the area where they are produced. Such things as ginning cotton, pasteurizing milk, making butter, dressing chickens and the like, were intended to be exempt in the area the commodities were produced. Congress did not define the area, but left the definition up to the Department of Labor. The definition they employ has virtually nullified the exemption intended by Congress.

Let me illustrate the effect of the Department of Labor's definition. A creamery in a rural county in Mississippi having a large number of commercial dairy herds is not considered as being in the area where milk is produced if it is within 1 mile of a village having a population of over 2,500, or within 3 miles of a city of 50,000. The Secretary of Labor's rule also says that it is not within the area if it is within 5 miles of a city having a population of half a million.

It makes absolutely no sense to say that a creamery located within a mile of a village having a population of over 2,500 is not in the area where milk is produced. If milk were not being produced in that area, the creamery would not be located there. But, under the Secretary's definition, it is not considered as being located in the area where milk is produced.

If another creamery were located 8 miles from the nearest village or town, it would have passed the population test, but if more than 5 percent of the milk it receives in any month is transported more than 20 miles from the farm where produced, it is then not considered as being in the area of production of milk. The other 95 percent of the milk it processes may come from farms located within a mile or two, or even across the road. That would make no difference, according to the Secretary of Labor, whose definition would rule that particular creamery is not in the area of milk production.

That shows the modern transportation developments.

Another illustration is that a cotton gin located in one of the largest cotton-growing counties in the world would not be considered in the area where cotton is produced if it were within a mile of a village having over 2,500 people or if as much as 5 percent of the cotton going to that gin were hauled over 10 miles. As I say, with all deference to whoever drafted the regulation, as a practical matter it is ridiculous, because it denies the real facts of life with reference to the subject matter.

With reference to cotton, it is really not ready for the consuming market—that is, the brokers and the buyers of cotton—until it has been compressed and put in a warehouse for storage. This is a part of the processing. The warehouses must be located in the cotton-growing area, because the farmer must haul the cotton to the warehouses for weights, sampling, and such steps as are necessary as a prerequisite to the sale of that cotton, yet more than 90 percent of the cotton crop is handled by warehouses in the Cotton Belt, which are not considered by the Department of Labor to be in the area where cotton is produced.

Under the proposed amendment I say that the area of production of an agricultural commodity includes all of the county in which the commodity is produced in commercial quantities. One exception to this, as written in the amendment, would be that this would not include establishments with a gross annual volume of sales in excess of a million dollars. That follows the line of the bill as proposed by the committee, which uses the gross annual volume of sales as one of the guidelines. In drafting the amendment we merely took the guideline and transposed it to this problem. I trust that this will find favor with the subcommittee and with the committee which is handling the bill. I certainly trust it will find favor with the Senate itself.

This meets the realities of the occasion, when trucks come and go and the products are hauled many miles to market. The more competition there is the better it is for the business within the area, and the better it is for the man who produces the product.

Mr. President, even though farmers are exempt from the provisions of the act, they are nevertheless directly and seriously affected by it. The increased cost of handling and preparing agricultural commodities is paid by the farmer. The farmer must pay his hired workers more in order to compete for labor with industries covered by the act and he has to pay more for the things he buys, things manufactured by industries covered by this act.

Unlike manufacturers and other business enterprises, the farmer cannot pass on increased costs. Even if he could, he would lose markets now available to him. An example of this is the competition between industry's rayon and agriculture's cotton. U.S. mills pay 4 to 8 cents less per pound for staple fiber rayon than for cotton, on a waste-free, ready-to-spin basis. A rise in price resulting from additional wage costs would further affect the farmer's competitive position adversely.

I urge the Senate to consider this amendment when it is called up in the true spirit and original intent of Congress and vote its approval.

I emphasize that this whole approach is directed toward the man who takes the chances; the man who makes the investment in the soil, in the seed, and in the fertilizer; the man who spends many months of his time and that of hired labor in growing the products. This man takes all the chances with respect to weather. Finally, as the crop moves into the final stages, on a seasonal basis, he is under the pressure of time in almost every case, though the processing plants are in his own area. This is strictly a farming matter, and should not be subjected to the ordinary industrial regulations and control which plants primarily of an industrial nature undergo.

I thank the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] for his contribution to the debate. No one is more competent, on the basis of practical experience in the area, than the Senator from Florida. He is not only experienced as a legislator, as a former Governor and as an accomplished attorney, but also he has handled many of the complex problems in this field. No one could possibly be better equipped, and few, if any, are as well equipped to discuss this subject in the very fine way the Senator from Florida has discussed it. I especially appreciate his interest, as well as his contribution.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I surely thank the Senator for his more than generous comments.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR THE ELDERLY

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, 25 years ago, on August 14, 1935, the United States made a serious application for firm membership in the 20th century when President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed into law the Social Security Act. By this act, the American people thus pooled their common resources to solve the defects of complete dependence on so-called voluntary, individual—and charity—provisions against the economic hazards of old age in industrial society.

I repeat, that was 25 years ago. We cannot put off any longer a similar solution to the problems of ill health in old age, especially the costs of ill health. As part of that active younger generation in 1935, which fought for the initial social security legislation, and as part of the active senior citizen generation of today, I rise today to urge that we honor the silver anniversary month of the 1935 act by voting an amendment providing health protection, without charity, to the older population of America.

In early June, I presented a lengthy statement on the Senate floor, regarding the supporting arguments in behalf of S. 3503, the Retired Persons Medical Insurance Act, introduced on May 6 by myself and 23 other Democratic Senators. Since the time of that presentation, I have learned of the many enthusiastic responses to my detailed statement, not only on the part of Senators not originally on the list of cosponsors, but also from many individuals and organizations all over the country.

I should like to summarize here the basic points made in that document:

First. I started out by citing the facts indicating the special health problems of our aged citizens, in sharp contrast to the propaganda inspired by desperation which attempts to minimize and dismiss the urgency of the medical needs of older persons—their higher rate of chronic conditions, for example. One of the points I made needs repeating over and over again; namely, that many of the elderly men and women in America have handicaps which could have been prevented if they had received early and prompt medical attention.

Two. When the opponents of Government programs in this area of human needs fail to convince us that there are no special health problems among the aged, they then turn to their next line of attack; that older Americans are financially able to meet the costs of adequate health protection. The objective evidence against this type of numbers game is simply overwhelming. No one concerned with their needs is going to be convinced that the aged can truly afford to pay for adequate health care, without going into great debt or without having to resort to degrading charity care. Too many of them will simply have to go without. Two out of five of the aged have no liquid assets at all to fall back on. Those fortunate enough now to have liquid assets, such as savings, dread the real possibility of being wiped out. In contrast to younger employed persons, the aged cannot look forward to increasing or replenishing their savings.

In my comprehensive document of June 2, I set forth the evidence that the care of frequent and long-term illnesses among the aged cannot be financed from such sources as savings, personal property, and other assets.

Third. If we accept the meaning of the facts regarding the health and financial conditions of older Americans we also must face up to the ability of private insurance programs to solve the problem. In a lengthy section of my June 2 speech, I discussed this topic under four major headings: (a) "Estimates of How Many Older Americans Now Have Health Insurance Protection"; (b) "The Adequacy of Such Protection"; (c) "Projections of How Many Aged Might Be Protected in the Future"; (d) "The Probable Effect of Federal Legislation on the Future Role of Private Health Insurance Programs."

On the first three of these subjects, the basic conclusion is that adequate protection is and will be lacking for the vast majority of increasing numbers of older citizens.

As for the fourth item, Federal legislation will not only solve much of the deficit crisis experienced by the nonprofit insurance programs. It will also make possible better programs by commercial and nonprofit companies for the younger population, as well as provide opportunities for such companies to offer supplemental policies to millions of the aged, since no legislation contemplated will pay for all of the hospital and medical expenses of our senior citizens. Furthermore, legislation along the lines of S. 3503 and other social security-based bills would go far in solving the deficit problems of many hospitals around the country, which have had to absorb large proportions of the expense of hospital care for their older patients.

Fourth. Finally, my June 2 statement presented the basis for the provisions of S. 3503, entitled, "The Retired Persons Medical Insurance Bill." I should like to quote from this section:

> The real issue is to make sure that in deciding benefits we alert ourselves to the wisest counsel of authorities in the fields of medicine, hospital care, public health, and medical economics.
> The real issue is to assure the Nation that the philosophy of modern medicine will be applied in meeting the health needs of our senior Americans.

The benefits provided in S. 3503 would benefit all retired aged Americans, regardless of social security eligibility. As I stated in my earlier Senate speech:

> Here is the opportunity for the opponents of such legislation, including the Vice President, to show exactly how sincere they really are in objecting to the omission (under the Forand and other bills) of such persons as the 2 million old-age assistance recipients. If the charge by the opponents of the Forand bill has been leveled in a truly sincere effort and in the spirit of constructive criticism, they should be pleased to learn that we have accepted their criticism at face value and thus have proposed the inclusion of the aged men and women for whom all of us, even the opposition, have a deep concern.

SPECIFIC BENEFITS

Since the date of my June 2 speech, we have come a long way in reaching a widespread consensus that some form of medical care program, financed through social security, will be enacted before 1961. The Republican Party, which has stubbornly resisted the inevitable conclusion arrived at much earlier by the Democrats, has finally recognized the national responsibility in this field, although it still refuses to meet it effectively and most efficiently.

It seems to me, therefore, that when we come to evaluate any specific proposal in this area, we should use the following criteria based on the considered medical counsel of the best experts the subcommittee has been able to consult.

First. Preventive care through outpatient diagnostic services: Modern medicine, as I pointed out before, aims at keeping people out of hospitals. Therefore, I strongly urge the provision of a very inexpensive program of outpatient hospital diagnostic services through laboratory tests and X-ray examinations.

Second. Necessary hospitalization without any deductible feature: The provision of 90 days' hospital coverage, as in S. 3503, would protect the vast majority of the aged against the high costs of hospital care.

Third. Alternative and followup facilities for posthospital care: While hospital care is the core of any medical program, it can, by itself, become unduly expensive. It can result in incomplete and frustrating medical attention, unless the program also includes skilled nursing home care and supervised home medical care in the patient's residence. And if these services can be financed, they should be made available without any prior discharge from a hospital.

At any rate, hospitalization by itself is not good enough. For one thing, after basic hospital attention, an aged man or woman might need only good, skilled nursing care in a qualified nursing home. Or he might need only some form of occasional physical therapy in his home, after having had a stroke, for example.

In other words, hospital care, nursing home service, and home health care—all backed up with an outpatient diagnostic program—make up the core package of any really adequate health care plan for the aged of the country.

In addition, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare would be authorized to initiate a program, within the actuarial limits of the program, of payments for a portion of expensive drugs and medicines, after the rest of the program has been in effect for 2 years.

The benefits I have described here would also be made available to the aged not under social security.

I am making these remarks today to notify my colleagues of the kind of health legislation they ought to stand for, since I am sure there will be strong efforts at compromises of various kinds, and there might be some I shall agree to. Naturally, I am aware of the fact that most bills in Congress do not remain unchanged. But I did wish to outline today the criteria that should be used in judging this or that ultimate change.

Frankly, I feel that with a little creative thinking and examination, we could find a practical way to finance this rather minimum program of much needed health care protection for senior Americans. Those who have taken the trouble to read S. 3503 have discovered that it is not a carelessly constructed bill, but rather a well-considered, balanced program of medical benefits.

It was written also with the problems of financing in mind. I hope that we do not get bogged down by any rigid commitments to some old ruts of thinking and planning for this program, fostered by high priest actuaries. In other words, I think it would be tragic if we allow an inflexible notion of "level premium" cost—which is based on very rough cost estimates through the year 2050 and beyond—to lower our sights on a necessary, balanced program of benefits.

What we need, instead, is to follow the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Social Security Financing, created by the Congress, that decisions about OASDI financing should be based on 15- to 20-year estimates and not on the meaningless and restrictive, long-run level premium estimates which are based on 100-year or longer cost estimates.

Given the position that we should not increase the social security tax by more than one-half of 1 percent now, with which I agree, it seems to me that the benefits should be determined by the cost estimates based on realistic early year costs, and not on estimates calculated into infinity, which is what the level premium approach does.

I think it is more honest, more practical, and just as fiscally responsible, if not more so, to stipulate in a bill the early years' tax—say, for the first 10 years—and then to stipulate the later years' tax, with the traditional understanding that Congress will review the need for any changes after experience with the bill in operation.

This, of course, is what we have proposed in S. 3503, which has also been introduced as a substitute amendment to H.R. 12580. As of 1972, the rate would go up an additional one-eighth of 1 percent each for employee and employer, and three-sixteenths of 1 percent for the self-employed.

I am confident, after having reviewed the opinions of the Chief Actuary of the Social Security Administration, that the core package of benefits I have outlined can be financed on this basis, for retired aged citizens.

According to the analysis of the Staff of my Subcommittee on Problems of the Aged and Aging, based on figures from the Social Security Administration, the following benefits can be provided:

Benefits	Early year percent of payroll	Level premium percent of payroll
1. 90 days of hospitalization	0.43	0.68
2. 180 days of recuperative nursing home care, upon hospital release (or 2 days for every unused hospital day)	.005	.01
3. 240 visits of home health care, upon hospital release (or 2⅔ visits for each unused hospital day; 1½ days for each unused nursing home day)	.005	.01
4. Outpatient diagnostic services	.05	.07
Total	.49	.77

Early year dollar costs $1.03 billion.

In other words, for the early years, the 0.50 figure can more than finance this program which I have modified slightly from my original bill S. 3503. I will submit my modified bill in the next few days.

As far as the level premium estimate of 0.77 is concerned, let me state that Robert Myers, the Chief Actuary of the Social Security Administration, in his letter dated August 2, 1960, concluded that the financing of the modified bill is "in actuarial balance."

I have had a lot of experience with actuaries, and as a result I know that actuaries have a tendency to overestimate costs and to underestimate receipts. If he asserts that the system is sound, I guarantee that it is ultrasound.

Let me repeat, I believe it would be tragic, and also unnecessary, to legislate a social security tax of one-half percent and then to turn around and provide less than a one-third percent program of health benefits for persons 68 and older in the early years. Unless we are hypocrites, this would mean that the health benefits would have to remain unchanged for eternity. It might also mean that we could never bring in the millions of retired Americans under the age of 68.

What I am suggesting instead is that between now and 1972 we use a one-half percent of payroll rate, and then raise to three-fourths of 1 percent for employees and to nine-sixteenths of 1 percent for self-employed. On the basis of a maximum $4,800 taxable wage, this would mean a stupendous increase of 50 cents a month per worker after 1971. Is there any one who doubts that the worker of 1972 will be able to afford an extra 12 cents a week to finance a sound program of health protection for his years of retirement?

As for the numbers to be covered through non-OASI payments, the yearly costs would call for Federal appropriations for the little more than 3 million people involved—a number, by the way, which will be decreasing as the years go by. The new additional costs, over and above what we are already spending for veterans and old-age assistance recipients, would be no more than $150 million. And, to repeat, these figures would decline as the population involved also goes down.

Another major part of my bill allows for the pension and annuity funds of retirees of railroads, Federal civil service, and State and local governments to "buy into" the health insurance fund created by the bill.

Mr. President, "boldness" seems to be the order of the day in our national atmosphere. Let us therefore be less than timid in this particular pressing need for a truly adequate program of financing the health costs of our senior citizens.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE FUNDS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1961

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on Thursday, August 11, during floor discussion of the freezing of Department of Defense funds for fiscal year 1961, which was revealed by Secretary Gates' answer to my letter of July 28, I remarked that the Secretary had not yet answered my letter of August 2. In this letter, I asked him to give us his specific recommendations as to any additional amounts which could be effectively used during 1961 for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense. I also stated that Secretary Gates' reply would be placed in the RECORD as soon as it was received.

Therefore, Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point my letter of August 2 to the Secretary of Defense and his reply of August 12, which was delivered to my office a few hours ago.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, D.C., August 2, 1960.

Hon. THOMAS S. GATES, Jr.,
The Sercetary of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: During the forthcoming session of the Congress, consideration will be given to the need for additional funds for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense.

This consideration will cover such programs as Army modernization, Navy modernization, airborne alert, acceleration of ballistic missile programs, acceleration of military satellites, airlift, antisubmarine warfare, augmentation of manned bomber capabilities, augmented troop strengths, expanded research and development, and other high priority programs.

I should appreciate your advising me now whether such additional funds would be used, in the event that the Congress, in discharging its constitutional responsibility of providing for the national defense, should decide to make additional funds available.

If so, I should also appreciate your specific recommendations as to the amounts that can be used effectively during fiscal year 1961, what could be accomplished with such funds, and which programs the Department of Defense believes should be augmented or accelerated in order to assure that America's future military strength will be unquestionably second to none.

Sincerely,

LYNDON B. JOHNSON.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., August 12, 1960.

Hon. LYNDON B. JOHNSON,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: This is in reply to your further letter dealing with the question of additional defense appropriations for fiscal year 1961.

I believe my reply to your July 28 letter and the President's message of August 8 clearly expressed our judgment that the 1961 budget assures America of a continuing military strength second to none.

As indicated before, however, before this fiscal year closes additional funds will be needed to meet newly imposed costs—for example, the new civilian pay rates established by Public Law 86-568 which will increase defense costs by about $200 million annually. As earlier indicated, this being a Government-wide problem, the executive branch will request a supplemental appropriation on a Government-wide basis after completing its current evaluation of these additional costs.

I also pointed out previously, as did the President in his August 8 message, that we may in due course need a modest additional sum for military personnel and operation and maintenance in connection with the readiness measures we are taking.

Otherwise, I foresee no additional requirement. But, as stated, in replying to your July 28 letter, all our programs, force levels and deployments are kept under constant review. As you know, all of our defense programs are continuously influenced by changes in the world situation, by technological developments and by schedule changes developing during the course of the year. We are now assessing the impact of all such changes in connection with the preparation of the fiscal year 1962 budget. This work will have an important bearing on long leadtime procurement programs and will in itself constitute another appraisal of the level of our defense effort. The decisions pertaining to these programs will involve both fiscal years 1961 and 1962. This is an illustration of the fact that at this time of year budgets become commingled, pointing up once again the impracticality of programing our defense efforts in terms of annual cycles.

We would, of course, carefully consider any defense actions by the Congress, but we cannot now predict whether we could prudently utilize additional funds which the Congress might appropriate. But, this I can assure you—should we conclude that additional programs are required for the Nation's defense, the necessary funds will be requested regardless of the amounts involved.

There is one related matter on which I urge your help—the critically needed military assistance appropriation.

The President in his 1961 budget requested $2 billion for this purpose. The House appropriated $1.8 billion. The Senate, with more than 5 weeks of the new fiscal year already over, has yet to act on the appropriation. These funds, so crucial to the free world security, more especially now in these days of increasing Communist truculence are required in the full amount requested by the President. I earnestly hope that you will find it possible to use the full weight of your office to secure approval of the full amount required for this vital element of our overall national security.

Sincerely,

THOMAS S. GATES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If I read the Secretary's letter correctly, it makes no change in the position taken in the earlier Department of Defense reply to my inquiry. In essence, the Secretary of Defense states that he sees no need for additional funds at this time and feels unable to predict whether any additional amounts would be utilized by the executive branch.

In other words, the situation can be summarized simply as follows:

On June 9, 1960, the Office of the Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum to the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, outlining instructions received at a Cabinet meeting held the preceding week. This memorandum included the following statement:

> If the Congress makes available more funds for fiscal year 1961, than are requested, and where the law does not require expenditure, agencies should reserve the increases and carry them forward to the maximum practical extent to fiscal year 1962.

In acting on the Department of Defense appropriation bill for 1961, the Congress made increases of over $1¾ billion and also made various program reductions of about $1.1 billion. This resulted in a net increase in appropriations of $661,608,000.

When the 1961 budget was submitted to the Congress on January 18, the Department of Defense issued its first financial plan for fiscal year 1961. This plan showed that all the funds expected to be available in fiscal year 1961 would then be used.

On July 7, after the appropriations had been made for fiscal year 1961, the Department of Defense issued a revised financial plan. This revised plan, apparently carrying out the instructions contained in the Secretary of Defense's memorandum of June 9, called for freezing $1,097,633,000 of the funds made available for fiscal year 1961.

On July 28, I wrote a letter to the Secretary of Defense asking him to tell us whether it was still administration policy to freeze the additional funds provided by the Congress, or whether these funds would now be used. On August 2, I sent the Secretary of Defense another letter asking him to give us his specific recommendations as to any additional amounts which could be used effectively during fiscal year 1961 for the programs essential to a strengthened national defense.

On August 9, Secretary Gates replied to my letter of July 28. His reply revealed that there had been a partial thaw in the funds that had been frozen on July 7, a month and 2 days earlier. Whereas, $1,097,633,000 had been frozen on July 7, the amount frozen was now $621,302,000. In addition, $978,749,000 had been apportioned to the military departments, but they were instructed not to proceed to place orders or contracts until completion of reviews being made by the Secretary of Defense and specific release of the items or programs in question.

Thus, as of today, the Department of Defense tells us that $978,749,000 is temporarily frozen, but is expected to be released for use during fiscal year 1961 after completion of current reviews.

In addition, there is $621,302,000 available for fiscal year 1961 which is frozen, since the Department of Defense has no plans to release these funds for use during fiscal year 1961.

Finally, the Secretary of Defense makes no recommendations for any additional defense appropriations at this session, nor is any commitment given that any additional funds provided by the Congress would actually be used.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1960

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3758) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I change my amendment, designated "8–12–60—C," by adding before the semicolon on line 11, of page 2, the following:

Unless such establishment would have been exempt under the provisions of this paragraph as in effect prior to the enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendment of 1960.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is modified accordingly.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we had a very long and, in part, fruitful week. I appreciate the attendance and diligence of Members of the Senate. Particularly do I appreciate the diligence, and attendance, and the contribution made by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK]. I commend him for his attention to the duties in the Senate and for the courteous and fair manner in which he has worked.

If there are no Senators who care to address the Senate at this time, pursuant to the order previously entered, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 44 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, under the order previously entered, until Monday, August 15, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Report From Congress

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, August 13, 1960

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, with the resumption of Senate activities, I am again issuing my periodical reports to my constituents in South Dakota. I would like, at this point, to make this report a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS, THE CONVENTIONS, AND THE BIG CAMPAIGN

The three words "Congress," "conventions," and "campaigning"—added to the ugly word "communism"—pretty well totalize and typify the activities occupying the minds of most thoughtful Americans today when they permit their thoughts to stray beyond their own immediate problems and their home environments.

Incidentally, the usually slow-moving Senate is off to a fast start with four rather significant rollcall votes during the first 3 days of the session beginning August 8. The first vote tested the sentiment but did not decide the issue of whether this Congress will do anything to redeem the promises both major party platforms made about civil rights in their July conventions.

Of greater immediate concern to South Dakota, of course, is the question of farm legislation. Both political conventions pledged themselves to develop new comprehensive farm programs designed to expand net farm incomes and to promote agricultural prosperity. Few expect that in this short session of Congress, an entirely new approach to farm legislation can be evolved and adopted. But many had—and some still have—high hopes some corrective action would be taken on our most urgent farm problem, that of mounting wheat surpluses and inadequate prices for annual wheat crops. Action may still occur, but the fact the House Agriculture Committee is not meeting and that indications point to a delay in recruiting a quorum of that committee prior to August 22, place a damper on optimistic hopes for effective wheat legislation during this short extra session of Congress, now planning to adjourn September 3. In all events, inaction thus far has deferred correctives too late for the current crop year. It is imperative that something helpful be done, however, in time for the crop year of 1961.

Communism never rests and seldom sleeps. The men in the Kremlin continue to stir up or sponsor trouble in Cuba, in the Congo, at the United Nations, by threats about Berlin, and in a dozen different ways and places. Firmness by America and the consistent Eisenhower policy of nonappeasement of the Communist overlords, however, continue to perpetuate peace and circumvent new Communist successes while our military might stands as a formidable warning to all those who would wage war to win friends or intimidate people.

Now, with regard to the big campaign. Thus far, politics have been present in all sessions of this extra session of Congress but not to the extent that some had feared. It may get better—or worse—time will tell. But up to now the public business has had prior consideration. After vote one on civil rights, the second and third dealt with the ratification of the so-called Antarctic Treaty which required the necessary two-third vote. The fourth vote, on August 10, gave approval to the recommendations of the Senate Appropriations Committee (of which I am a member) on civil works. It contains several very important projects and items for South Dakota on which much work was done in committee, and I am happy to report all of them were accepted by the Senate action last Wednesday.

Naturally, like any other candidate, I would much prefer to be back home in South Dakota visiting your communities, shaking hands, attending meetings, and "shaping up the fences" instead of being back here for my duties in connection with this recessed session of Congress. However, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, for example, I felt I should be here to protect our South Dakota projects and interests as, after all, this is the job I am paid to do. Whenever opportunity permits during the session, I shall return home to South Dakota but so long as there are important decisions to be made here, I shall have to leave campaigning to my friends and others and strive to represent your views and protect your interests on the Senate floor and in committee.

Fortunately, during the recent recess, I was able to get around in a good bit of the State, bringing to 217 the towns and cities I have personally visited since September last, when Mary and I made our annual tour of the State, including visits in every county of South Dakota. Actually, these annual visits which I have made each year during the congressional recess are among the most enjoyable and interesting phases of a Senator's job. "Shaking hands with the folks back home" and holding conferences around the coffee cups is well worth the travel and the time, and I shall be at it again as I have always done in the past, when this session of Congress finally adjourns. In the meantime, I recognize the importance of pending problems here and the protection required if our taxpayers and our opportunity system are not to be crippled or curtailed by excesses and extremes which can so easily be enacted by a Congress on the eve of a presidential campaign and in the heat of August in Washington, D.C.

SENATE

MONDAY, AUGUST 15, 1960

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 11, 1960)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

Rev. Wallace Fridy, minister, Washington Street Methodist Church, Columbia, S.C., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, in whom our fathers trusted and in whom we trust, Thou art great in power, unlimited in wisdom, and infinite in all of the resources of Thy being.

We thank Thee for the heritage that is ours, for the dreams and ideals which have been handed down to us, for this, our native land, and our priceless treasures of freedom. We thank Thee for patriotic men and women who give of themselves in public service and who place love of country above selfish gain.

Grant to us this day, we pray, the help and strength we need. Free us from—

Fear of the future,
Anxiety of tomorrow,
Cowardice in face of danger,
Bitterness toward anyone.

But fill us with—

Love which knows no barrier,
Faith which cannot be shaken,
Courage to meet life's demands,
Loyalty to Thy Kingdom's goal.

Help us to know that we never move beyond Thy watchful care or out of reach of Thy bountiful love.

Through Jesus Christ, our Lord, we pray. Amen.

(See the remarks of Mr. MURRAY when he introduced the above joint resolution, which appear under a separate heading.)

COLD SPRING HARBOR—MARINE BIOLOGICAL RESERVE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its proper referral.

This joint resolution, Mr. President, has as its objective the preservation in perpetuity of one of our very important scientific resources which has been threatened with destruction. I refer to the inner harbor of Cold Spring Harbor, Long Island, N.Y. This area, quite small in extent, is vastly important to American science and, indeed to scientists throughout the world. It presents an unusual confluence of fresh and salt water in a protected area containing particularly rich marine flora and fauna. No doubt somewhat similar areas can be found elsewhere but none at all can be found which, possessing these attributes, has also been the subject of scientific research for a period of more than 70 years.

It is this combination of factors, Mr. President, which renders this area of unique importance to the world of science. Here the science of ecology had its birth in the United States. Here continuing studies of the adaptation of living organisms to a particular type of environment have been carried on for more than half a century. Here is a natural laboratory which should be preserved as such for centuries. To it three generations of scientists have journeyed from all the globe. To it countless generations of future scientists should be able to come secure in the knowledge that they can carry on the research of their predecessors in the same environment and under the same conditions. Yet this unique resource is threatened with destruction. Already, approximately one-fifth of this underwater area has been irrevocably ruined through ill-considered dredging operations; and the research data developed under the auspices of the Carnegie Institute and the Long Island Biological Association in that part of the area, by three generations of scientists, has been rendered valueless for future use. Now, the town of Oyster Bay has entered into a contract for dredging the balance of the inner harbor which, if carried out, would destroy what remains of this uniquely valuable resource.

This deplorable situation, Mr. President, was called to my attention by a Mr. John J. Drury of Garden City, Long Island, who contended that "if we permit this destruction, our country will stand disgraced in the eyes of the thinking world," and expressed the belief that "surely our Government puts a higher value on a scientific treasurehouse than it does on a few thousand cubic yards of sand and gravel which can easily be had elsewhere."

I have had Mr. Drury's contentions investigated, Mr. President. I find them to be very well founded indeed. Not only do university scientists throughout our country and in other countries find the work being carried on in this area by the Carnegie Institute and the Long Island Biological Association of value but so too does our Government. During the last 5 years alone, the National Science Foundation and the National Institutes of Health have made grants of more than $700,000 to these two organizations because of the value of the work they are engaged in at Cold Spring Harbor. Their work must be encouraged. Its continuity guaranteed. Therefore, and again in accordance with Mr. Drury's suggestion, I have introduced this joint resolution providing for the acquisition of the underwater area by the Secretary of the Interior, for its administration by the National Park Service, and for its dedication to such scientific and educational uses as may be agreed upon by the directors of the National Science Foundation, the Long Island Biological Association and the Carnegie Institute. I hope the Congress will enact it into law just as soon as possible.
